*TINSLEY v. KIRBY.

[1. Principal and Surety ¶59.]

A surety is a favorite of the law, and has a right to stand on the strict terms of his obligation.

[2. Sheriffs and Constables ¶157.]

Quære: Under the terms of a lawful constable's bond, requiring him well and truly to perform the duties of his office, would his sureties be liable for a penalty imposed upon him for collecting excessive fees?

[3. Sheriffs and Constables ¶157.]

Beyond the irregularities of the constable's bond here sued on—the requirements of law as to oaths, number of sureties, the clerk's approval and certificate, not being complied with—it was utterly void, as there is not and cannot be a regularly commissioned constable in this State, the legislature not having directed the manner by which they shall be chosen. Const., Art. IV, § 21.

[4. Estoppel ¶22.]

A surety is not estopped from denying his liability as such on a constable's bond, where the bond itself alleges that the constable had been appointed to office by a trial justice.

[5. Principal and Surety ¶83.]

The rule that prohibits sureties from denying facts stated in obligations signed by them applies only to facts recited in obligations legal in themselves.

[6. Officers ¶126.]

[7. Officers ¶123.]

That a voluntary bond of a public officer is binding upon him and his sureties is a principal applicable only where the office was authorized by law, and no obstacle existed in the way of its being filled.

[8. Officers ¶125.]

It does not apply to one as an officer de facto, if the office itself does not legally exist.

For other cases, see Officers, Cent. Dig. § 219; Dec. Dig. ¶125.]

[This case is also cited in Cavender v. Ward, 28 S. C. 474, 475, 6 S. E. 302, and distinguished therefrom.]

Before Thomson, J., Spartanburg, October, 1879.

Action by T. A. Tinsley against Marcus Kirby and A. H. Kirby, commenced March 4, 1878. The opinion makes a full statement of the case.

Messrs. Bobo & Carlisle, for appellant, cited Const. Art. IV, § 21; Genl. Stat. (1872) 205, §§ 1, 2, 3; Brandt Sur., §§ 11, 12, 451; 22 Ind. 207; 4 La. Ann. 372; 60 N. Y. 421.

Mr. J. S. R. Thomson, contra.

The appellants are estopped from denying the recitals of the bond sued upon. Brandt Sur., §§ 29-31, 444; Big. Estop. § 272; 17 How. 442; 2 Pars. Cont. 789; 7 Rob. Prac. 389. A common law or voluntary bond of a public officer is valid and binding upon said officer and his sureties. 1 Bail. 211; 2 McC. 107; 7 Rich. 232; 38 N. J. 324; 2 Brock. 96; High Inj., § 961; Brandt Sur., §§ 12, 13, 445; 10 Wall. 395; 1 Chit. Cont. 7. Under the terms of the bond in this case, both the defendants are responsible for the wrongdoing of M. Kirby. 8 S. C. 114; 1 Hill, 227; 15 Stat. 608, § 11.

March 18, 1882. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. This was an action on what purported to be the official bond of a constable as follows:

"Know all men by these presents, that we, Marcus Kirby and A. H. Kirby, are held and firmly bound unto the State of South Carolina in the penal sum of five hundred dollars, to the payment of which well and truly to be made we bind ourselves and each and every of us, our heirs, executors, and administrators, firmly by these presents, sealed with our seals, and dated this 16th day of December, 1873. Whereas, the above bound Marcus Kirby has been appointed to the office of Constable by J. B. Tollison, Trial Justice, now the condition of the above obligation is such that if the above-bound Marcus Kirby shall well and truly perform the duties of the said office, as now or hereafter required by law, during the whole period he may continue in said office, then the above obligation to be void and of none effect, else to remain in full force and virtue."

(Signed) "M. Kirby. [L. S.]
"A. H. Kirby." [L. S.]

This bond was filed in the office of the clerk of the county, on December 16, 1873. Attached to it was a paper addressed to the clerk as follows: "Capt F. M. Trimmier: I hereby appoint Marcus Kirby my constable by his compliance with the law. Dec. 15, 1873. (Signed) J. B. Tollison, Trial Justice." At the time the bond was filed Marcus Kirby took and subscribed the constitutional oath, Section 30, Article II., and entered upon the duties of the office.

While acting as constable under this appointment, he was employed in that capacity by Trial Justice B. H. Steadman, in a case before him against one T. A. Tinsley, for assault and battery. Tinsley was convicted and fined five dollars and costs. Marcus rendered his bill of costs, which were taxed, and Steadman gave him a special appointment in writing to collect the money, fine and costs, which he did. Tinsley sued Marcus for extortion and oppression in office for charging and collecting improper fees. In that case it appeared that he had taxed and collected $10.96 in excess of his lawful fees, and Tinsley had a judgment for ten times the amount under the act upon the subject, which judgment was affirmed by this court. 8 S. C. 114.

The execution against Marcus was returned nulla bona, and now the plaintiff Tinsley sues the surety A. H. Kirby on the bond for the amount recovered against Marcus. The presiding judge charged the jury that the bond sued on was sufficient to sustain an action against Marcus for misconduct in office, and also against A. H. Kirby as surety; that Marcus having assumed to act, was a constable de facto, and responsible for acts done in that character, and A. H. Kirby as surety was liable for the amount of the recovery against Marcus for official misconduct. The jury found for the plaintiff $273.09, the amount of the recovery against Marcus and the costs therein. A. H. Kirby appeals to this court and asks that the judgment be reversed on the ground of error in the charge of the judge.

The recovery against Marcus Kirby was not on the bond, but under the statute which declares that "if a constable shall charge any other fees or for any other service than herein allowed, such constable shall be liable to forfeit to the party injured ten times the amount of excess of fees so improperly charged, to be recovered by suit in the Court of Common Pleas." Gen. Stat. 208. The execution on the judgment recovered being returned nulla bona the plaintiff now sues the surety, A. H. Kirby, on the bond to make him liable for the penalty recovered against Marcus, upon the ground that such illegal charging on the part of Marcus was a breach of his official bond, and the penalty imposed by law on him must be the measure of damages against the surety.

A rule never to be lost sight of in determining the liability of a surety is that he is a favorite of the law, and has the right to stand on the strict terms of his obligation, when such terms are ascertained. This is a rule universally recognized by the court, and is applicable to every variety of circumstances.

If this bond were free from objection as to its validity, there would be at least a question whether the surety should be made liable upon it for penalties imposed upon his principal for malfeasance in office. The words of the bond are, "That if the above-bound Marcus Kirby shall well and truly perform the duties of said office as now or hereafter required by law, during the whole period he may continue in said office, that the above obligation to be void and of none effect; else to remain in full force and virtue." To remain in full force and virtue for what purpose? Might not the answer be to pay all *damages that may result from the failure of the principal "well and truly to perform," but not the penalties which may be imposed on him for a quasi-criminal violation of his duty?

Does not this consideration touch at least the quantum of damages? Before the act of 1846 (11 Stat. 358) the sureties of a sheriff were held not to be liable for the penalties imposed by acts of the legislature for not returning execution and not paying over money within ten days after demand. Treasurers v. Hilliard, 8 Rich. 412. In that case Judge O'Neill pertinently says: "The undertaking of the securities is, that the sheriff shall discharge the duties of his office; his failure to pay over money collected by him or to return the execution in his office according to law are violations of his duty, and consequently breaches of the covenant contained in the condition of the official bond; and the securities became thereby liable to respond in damages to the parties interested. But penalties imposed on the sheriff for a violation of his duties are not damages sustained by the parties affected by his default. They are punishments inflicted by the law on the sheriff himself for a quasi-criminal neglect of duty. If the penalties were in the nature of liquidated damages, it is possible the sureties might be liable, but there is nothing in the acts which authorizes us so to regard them."

But it is unnecessary to make any ruling on this point. There can be no doubt that as a statutory obligation this bond was utterly void. It was not executed as the law directs, the requisite oaths were not taken, and the required number of sureties were not given. The clerk did not approve the bond in writing or issue a certificate of appointment.

But beyond all these irregularities, it is a remarkable fact that there is not and cannot be a regularly commissioned constable in the state. What the office was intended to be, its duties and fees, are laid down in detail; but the law fails to afford the means by which the office can be obtained. "Constables shall be chosen in each county by the qualified voters thereof in such manner as the general assembly shall direct, for the term of two years." Const., Art. IV., § 21. The legislature has not directed the manner in which a constable may be chosen by the qualified electors, and the result is, that there can be no regular constable in the state. There is an authority for making a temporary special appointment in the proviso of the second section of the constables act, which declares, "nor shall any person not so qualified exercise the powers of constable. Provided, that nothing herein contained shall prevent a presiding judge or a trial justice from appointing a constable to act by virtue of such appointment, only on a particular occasion to be specified in writing." As was said in the case of the State, Ex Rel. McCall, v. Cohen, 13 S. C. 201: "The court is bound to take judicial cognizance of the fact that there is no such office in the state as a regular constable, inasmuch as the constitution provides that such officer shall be chosen in each county by the qualified voters thereof in such manner as the general assembly shall direct, and the statute-book fails to show that any such direction has ever been given."

It is said, however, that the bond recites that Marcus Kirby was constable, and the parties who signed the bond are estopped from denying it. We suppose where recitals are referred to, all the recitals must be taken into consideration. While this bond does recite that Marcus Kirby had been appointed to the office of constable, it also recites that the appointment was made "by J. B. Tollison, Trial Justice," which was impossible and illegal, making the alleged appointment simply a nullity. The general rule is that sureties are estopped to deny the facts recited in the obligations signed by them, and this whether the recitals are true or false; having once solemnly alleged the existence of the facts, they cannot afterwards be heard to deny them. But as we understand it, this rule applies to facts in connection with bonds possible and legal in themselves. If such bond could not be legal, we cannot see how a false assertion could dispense with the law and make it valid. A surety is not in all cases estopped to deny the facts recited in the obligation signed by him. Thus, a court had appointed a guardian for a minor, and while such appointment was unrevoked, appointed another, who gave bond with a surety, reciting that he had been appointed guardian. In a suit on this bond against the surety, it was held that the appointment of the last *guardian was absolutely void, and that the surety might show the fact. Thomas v. Burrus, 23 Miss. 550. The court said: "It is certainly true that where a party makes a distinct and clear recital of any fact in a deed or other valid obligation he will be estopped from denying the truth of such recital. But this doctrine presupposes a valid legal obligation, and we do not know any authority, and reason is certainly against the proposition, that the party is estopped by any recital contained in an instrument from showing that the instrument is absolutely null and void."

Again, a defendant was taken under a bail writ, and the sheriff by mistake took a bond for the prison bounds, which recited the defendant's imprisonment to have been under a ca. sa. Held, the bond was void, and that the surety was not estopped to show that there was no ca. sa. Miller v. Bagwell, 3 McC. 429. The ground of the decision is stated as follows: "It is a general rule of law, and a correct one too, that a man cannot aver against his own deed; but that is where he has alleged some particular fact within his own knowledge, and which forms a part of the consideration for his undertaking, and that is the whole extent to which the cases relied on go. But the principle cannot be extended to an allegation coming from the other party, and which can be necessarily known only to him, although contained in the recital of a deed made by the defendant. The person supposed to be estopped is the very person imposed on.*

The case before us is even stronger than that; for here, probably, both the clerk who furnished the bond and the parties who signed it were mistaken upon a question of law. No falsehood in fact was recited, but an erroneous conclusion of law that J. B. Tollison could appoint Marcus Kirby a regular constable.

But it is urged that at common law a voluntary bond of a public officer is valid and binding upon him and his sureties. It is true that a bond, whether required or not, is good at common law, if entered into voluntarily, for a valid consideration, and if it is not repugnant to the letter and policy of the law; and the surety on such bond is bound thereby. This *is upon the just principle, that parties shall not be allowed to take advantage of their own wrong, and, after enjoying the benefits which the bond secured, then deny their liability. But in all the cases in which the principle has been applied, the office, the performance of whose duties was secured by the bond, was authorized by law, and no obstacle existed in the way of its being filled.

We have been referred to no case in which the surety was held liable on a bond, purporting to be official, where there could be no such office as that claimed. In reference to the office of constable, the statute declares: "Nor shall any person not so qualified (by election, etc.) exercise the powers of constable." This is a positive prohibition, which could not be set aside by the agreement of the parties to disregard it. The alleged appointment of Trial Justice Tollison was against both the letter and policy of the law: "Thus a statute provided that express companies should not do business in the state, without recording, in every county in which they did business, a statement showing the stockholders' names, residences, etc. An express company, without complying with the law, appointed an agent, who gave bond for the faithful performance of his duties. The agent collected money for packages sent, and failed to pay it over, and it was held that the surety was not bound. The bond being given for the performance of an illegal act, viz., sending packages by express, was void." Brandt on Suretyship, § 11; Daniels v. Barney, 22 Ind. 217.

In the case of Cross v. Gabeau and Hunt, 1 Bail. 211, there was a legally appointed collector of fines in the regiment, the difficulty being that no bond was required by law.

In the case of Stevens ads. Treasurers, 2 McC. 107, the legal office of sheriff existed, and the only difficulty was in respect to irregularities in the execution of the bond required by statute. And so in reference to the State v. Toomer, 7 Rich. 232, Mr. Laurens had been elected to the office of master in equity. And so in all the other cases cited.

It is true that under some circumstances the sureties of an officer de facto will be held liable just as if he were an officer de jure. But the surety will not be held liable in such case, *unless the office in reference to which the transaction takes place actually exists. A party who volunteers to perform the duties of an office which does not exist, and which, in the manner assumed, is in fact prohibited by law, can not, in any just sense of the term, be called an officer de facto, but a mere usurper. "A state treasurer was re-elected, and accepted a new commission and took a new oath, and continued to discharge the duties of the office, but failed to file a new bond within the time prescribed by law, which failure by law worked a forfeiture of the office. Held, that this was not a holding over of the old term: but the treasurer was an officer de facto, holding as of a new term; and that sureties on a new bond, afterwards filed by the treasurer, which recited his election as treasurer, were estopped to deny that he was holding as of the new term de jure. The court said it would have been otherwise if he had been a mere usurper, and not an officer de facto."—Brandt Sur., § 445.

17 S. C. 9

BRADLEY v. RODELSPERGER.

[1. Pleading ⚡220.]

The decision of an issue raised by a demurrer to the complaint does no more than adjudge the point of law involved.

[2. Homestead ⚡141.]

That a childless widow is entitled as against her deceased husband's debts to the homestead allowed to the head of a family by the constitution and laws of this state, was the only point decided in Bradley v. Rodelsperger, 3 S. C. 227.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Yoe v. Hanvey, 25 S. C. 97; Jeffries v. Allen, 29 S. C. 508, 7 S. E. 828; Broughton v. Broughton, 93 S. C. 28, 75 S. E. 1027.

[3. Homestead ¶51.]

All proceedings in the Court of Probate, whether pending or completed, for the assignment of a homestead as against debts contracted prior to 1863, are without the jurisdiction of the court, and therefore void ab initio, and hence in such proceeding there can be no adjudication binding upon any person.

[4. Judgment ¶660½.]

Long silence and acquiescence, induced by ignorance of the law in regard to the right of homestead, do not operate as an estoppel upon creditors.

*10

*Before Kershaw, J., Newberry, November, 1880.

The opinion fully states the case.

Messrs. Suber & Caldwell, for appellant.

March 18, 1882. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. Richard L. Bradley died prior to 1868, leaving a widow, Emeline A. Bradley, as his executrix and sole legatee. His estate was insolvent, and on Nov. 15, 1869, the widow Emeline filed her petition in the Probate Court of Newberry county for homestead in the real estate of her late husband. Peter Rodelsperger, a specialty creditor of her husband, demurred to the petition on the ground that, as it appeared on its face that the petitioner was childless, she was not the "head of a family" and entitled to homestead. The judge of Probate sustained the demurrer. She appealed to the Circuit Court, which sustained the judgment of the Probate Court, and she then appealed to this court, which, at the November Term, 1871, decided that a widow without children might be entitled to homestead, reversed the judgment below, and remanded the case to the Probate Court "for further consideration," saying that "the facts on which the decree was based not having been fully brought before us, we cannot finally adjudicate the right of the claimant to a homestead exemption." 3 S. C. 226.

The case went back, and on September 30, 1872, the Probate judge issued a writ directing commissioners to set off homestead for the applicant. To this writ the commissioners made return on the same day that they had set apart for such homestead a lot in the town of Newberry, being the lot on which the deceased husband had resided at the time of his death, and on which the applicant then resided. This return was filed in the Court of Probate November 28, 1872, and thus the case stood without exception being either filed or served to the return, and without order of the court confirming the return, until April

24, 1876, when exceptions were *filed on the grounds that petitioner was not entitled to homestead, and if she was, that the quantity set off was excessive. On March 30, 1878, other creditors of the husband, who had not been made parties, filed a petition In Re, asking to be allowed to come in and defend. The judge of Probate allowed them to be made parties, and upon their motion set aside the return of the commissioners and dismissed the petition. From this order of the Probate Court Mrs. Bradley appealed to the Circuit Court, and Judge Kershaw dismissed the appeal. From this order she appeals to this court upon the following exceptions:

1. Because the petitioner's claim of homestead has been heretofore adjudicated in her favor by competent courts of the said State.

2. Because the creditors of Richard L. Bradley, the petitioner's husband, acquiesced in and consented to her claim of homestead in such manner as to estop them from further contesting the same.

3. Because under the laws of the state and the facts of the case the said petitioner is entitled to the homestead exemption claimed by her in this proceeding.

As to the claim that the matter has been adjudged. The decision of an issue raised by a demurrer to the complaint does no more than decide the point of law involved. If there are facts in the case other than those stated in the complaint the decision does not touch them, but they are referred to the proper tribunal for hearing and determination. The only question in the case which went to the Supreme Court was the question of law whether a childless widow as against her deceased husband's debts is entitled to the homestead allowed to "the head of a family" by the constitution and laws of this state. That question was decided and cannot be again mooted, but nothing more was decided. The case was referred back "for further consideration." Accordingly the case went back, and the judge of Probate, accepting the point decided, that the applicant was not excluded from homestead only for the reason that she had no children, proceeded with the case and issued a writ to set off homestead, which was returned executed.

*12

*The return lay in the Probate Office without being excepted to or confirmed until 1876, when exceptions were filed. This was after the publication of the decision in the case of Cochran v. Darcy, 5 S. C. 125, which, following Gunn v. Barry in the Supreme Court of the United States (15 Wall. 610 [21 L. Ed. 212]), held that so much of our constitution and laws as purports to allow a homestead against a debt older than the constitution was in violation of the Constitution of the United States and void. We have no doubt that the new light thrown upon the subject by that decision led the creditors of Bradley in 1876 to file exceptions and contest the

In the view which the court takes it is not material to inquire what was the stage or condition of the proceedings in the Probate Court at the time the creditors filed exceptions—whether the proceeding had been completed or was still pending. The deceased debtor died before the adoption of the constitution in 1868 allowing homestead, and it is therefore clear that all his debts had been contracted before that time, and as against said debts, any and all proceedings instituted by the widow for homestead, whether such proceeding was still pending or in form concluded, were absolutely void. There can be no binding adjudication of any kind against any person in a proceeding void ab initio, which may be set aside in any manner direct or collateral, wherever and whenever encountered. "The plea of res judicata cannot prevail for several reasons, but it is only necessary to state that the whole proceedings were without jurisdiction and void." Douglass v. Craig, 13 S. C. 374.

The question of estoppel from long silence and acquiescence, on account of ignorance of what the law was in these homestead cases, was a question of some difficulty; but it has been fully considered by this court, and we suppose it can hardly be necessary to do more than to refer to the repeated decisions upon the subject. It has been held that there was no estoppel even in the case of a judgment creditor under whose judgment the homestead was assigned, and who received his pro rata of the proceeds of sale outside of the homestead assigned in ignorance of the real state of the law. Douglass v. Craig, 13 S. C. 371; Bull v. Rowe, Id. 355.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

[This case is also cited in Wilson v. Kelly, 19 S. C. 169, and distinguished therefrom.]

Before Pressley, J., Kershaw, June, 1881.

The case is fully stated in the opinion of this court.

Messrs. W. H. Lyles and J. T. Barron, for plaintiff.

Messrs. Chesnut & Workman, contra.

March 18, 1882. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. B. F. Watkins in his lifetime (1858) sold a tract of land known as "Rock Hill" to Mrs. Esther A. Cunningham for $12,000, taking her bond for the purchase—money, payable in instalments, with John Brown and Anthony M. Kennedy as sureties, who, to indemnify themselves as such sureties, on the same day took a bond and mortgage from Mrs. Cunningham on the said tract of land. Sundry payments from time to time were made by Mrs. Cunningham on the bond for the purchase, but not sufficient to satisfy the bond. In the mean time Mrs. Cunningham contracted to sell "Rock Hill" to John D. Kennedy, and let him into possession on condition that he would pay off the balance of the debt to Watkins, but executed to him no deed of conveyance. While so in possession, John D. Kennedy, having made several payments to Watkins, mortgaged the said "Rock Hill" plantation in November, 1865, together with a tract of land adjoining the same, known as the "Doby Place," of which he was the owner in fee, to Misses Susan M. Lang and Murray Lang, to secure a bond for $3,000, payable in gold. On November 16, 1869, Mrs. Cunningham, B. F. Watkins, and John D. Kennedy entered into a tripartite agreement, by which Mrs. Cunningham bound herself to execute title for Rock Hill to John D. Kennedy in trust to pay the bond of Watkins, recognizing, however, the mortgage of the Misses Lang as the first lien upon Rock Hill after the Doby Place was exhausted, and directing that the same should be first paid. The title to John D. Kennedy was executed in accordance with this agreement.

Affairs stood in this condition until 1872, when John D. Kennedy was adjudged a bankrupt, and all his interest in both tracts of land were ordered to be sold in bankruptcy. In the mean time John Brown and Anthony M. Kennedy had become insolvent and Murray Lang had died, leaving Susan M. Lang her sole heir and distributee. She administered upon the estate of her deceased sister, and having fully administered the same, retained the bond of John D. Kennedy as her own property in severalty. At the sale of the property of John D. Kennedy, ordered by the bankrupt court, Susan M. Lang purchased all his interest in the aforesaid tracts of land. The rent of Rock Hill for the year 1872 was assigned by J. D. Kennedy to William M. Shannon, Esq., for Watkins and Miss Lang.

*B. F. Watkins died, and his executrix, Elizabeth C. Watkins instituted these proceedings, asking to be subrogated as creditor to the rights of the sureties John Brown and Anthony M. Kennedy in the bond and mortgage of Mrs. Cunningham to them, and for foreclosure of the said mortgage. Judge Hudson heard the case, and held that Mrs. Watkins as executrix was not entitled to be subrogated to the rights of John Brown and Anthony M. Kennedy; that Miss Lang purchased the two tracts of land at the bankrupt sale in trust, first to pay her own debt of $3,000 and then to pay the balance due upon the bond of Mrs. Cunningham to Watkins, and referred it to the master to ascertain the amounts due on the bond of Esther A. Cunningham to B. F. Watkins, and also on that of John D. Kennedy to Miss Lang; and also, as agreed by the parties, to take an account of Susan M. Lang, as trustee, for the rents, issues, and profits arising from the "Rock Hill" and "Doby" plantations.

Under this decree the master, John M. De Saussure, Esq., took much testimony and made his report. Both parties excepted, and the case came up on the report and exceptions before Judge Pressley, who made a decree, simply sustaining some of the exceptions as numbered and overruling others.

From his order both parties appeal upon the following exceptions:

Plaintiff's Exceptions.—"1. For that his Honor overruled plaintiff's exceptions to so much of the Master's report as allowed interest with annual rests on the bond of J. D. Kennedy to the Misses Lang after the maturity thereof.

"2. For that his Honor did not construe the receipt endorsed on said bond of April 17, 1871, so as to allow a credit thereon of two hundred and fifty dollars in addition to all interest on said bond up to date.

"3. For that his Honor sustained defendant's exceptions to so much of the master's report as refused to allow her credit for the taxes claimed to have been paid in 1876 for the year 1875.

"4. For that his Honor allowed the defendant a further *opportunity to introduce evidence as to the diligence used by her to collect the rents of the 'Rock Hill' and 'Doby' places for the years 1877 and 1878, and refused to allow plaintiff to introduce further testimony as to the value of the 'Doby' place."

Defendant Lang's Exceptions (omitting one abandoned).—"1. For that his Honor confined the privilege of the defendant to prove due diligence in collecting the rents, issues, and profits of Rock Hill and Doby places and failed, through no fault of hers, to the years 1872 and 1873.

"2. For that his Honor overruled the defendant's fifth exception to the master's report and denied to the defendant the right of showing by the books of Wm. M. Shannon, deceased, the agent and attorney of the defendant, who attended to the renting, of these places—Rock Hill and Doby—and the collection of the rents, the actual amount received by him therefor, and the amounts actually paid out by him therefrom during the time he acted as her attorney and agent in the business, and as casts upon the defendant the burden of showing what amounts of rent cotton she failed to receive and why she so failed, and that the same was not for want of due diligence on her part."

The Circuit decree decides the numerous exceptions to the referee's report simply by confirming, overruling, or recommitting them by number without any explanation of the subject considered, and, therefore, in order to prevent confusion and make the rulings intelligible, we will not consider the exceptions seriatim, but endeavor to classify them according to subject-matter:

First, as to the mode of computing interest on the bond of J. D. Kennedy to Miss Lang. There is no copy of the bond in "the Case," but we find in the report of the master, John M. De Saussure, Esq., that the condition is in these words: "Three thousand dollars in American gold coin in three equal annual instalments from this date, with interest payable annually until the whole be paid; that is to say, one third with interest on the whole November 10, 1866; one other third with *the like interest on November 10, 1867; and the other third with the interest November 10, 1868, without fraud, etc.

The bond was executed on November 10, 1865, which was before the Act of 1866 (Gen. Stat. 318), allowing parties to agree upon any specific rate of interest, but there is no question of usury in the case. No point is made as to the rate of interest, nor as to the manner in which it should be calculated, up to the time the last instalment fell due, November 10, 1868, but simply as to whether after that time the interest should be calculated with annual rests as before. The question is purely one of construction. What was the intention of the parties as shown by the bond itself? Most of the cases relied on refer to the rate of interest and not the manner of counting it, but the questions are analogous and the rules of construction the same. The referee in the case counted the interest with annual rests and the Circuit judge confirmed it. Was that error? The proposition of the appellant is that there is in the bond no contract, express or implied, for the payment of any interest after November 10, 1868, and consequently the legal rate, as well as the manner of counting the interest, without compounding, attached at that time.

One of the first rules of construction is that every word of a written contract should, if possible, have its proper meaning. The bond here contains the words "with interest payable annually," and if the debt were payable at twelve months, or at a shorter time than twelve months, in order that the word "annually" could have some meaning, it would be necessary to construe the contract as extending beyond the time when the money fell due. O'Neill v. Bookman, 9 Rich. 80; Sharpe v. Lee, 14 S. C. 341; Mobley v. Davega, 16 S. C. 75 [42 Am. Rep. 632]. In the case last cited it was said that the word 'annually' conveys a distinct idea that the matter might not stop at the end of one year, but go into years beyond. It is defined as follows: 'Yearly,' 'returning every year,' 'year by year,' etc. The instalments of the bond before us were not all due within a year, but in one, two, and three years, and the word "annually" might have some meaning within the period of the stipulated credit, being three years, and therefore, if there was nothing *else in the bond, this word "annually" alone would not be conclusive of the intent of the parties that the contract was to extend beyond the maturity of the bond. O'Neill v. Sims, 1 Strob. 115; DeBruhl v. Neuffer, Ib. 426.

But there may be other words in the bond or note which show that it was the intention of the parties to extend the contract beyond maturity. It is not usual for bonds to be paid the very day they fall due, and is it probable that while the parties were stipulating about interest they would omit entirely to make provision for the time the money might remain unpaid after due? Every case must be decided upon its own facts and circumstances. No two cases are in all respects precisely alike. The purpose is to ascertain the intention in each case as it arises, and, in order to do this, it is proper to consider the whole instrument in the light of surrounding circumstances.

There is no such inflexible, settled rule of construction as would authorize us to say that the decision was erroneous in the case of Wright v. Eaves, 10 Rich. Eq. 582, which held that "on a bond conditioned to pay the principal sum in three equal annual instalments, with interest from date, payable annually as it becomes due, the interest annually accruing after the last instalment fell due as well as that then and before due bears interest." So in the case before us there is more than the phrase "with interest payable annually" in the superadded words "until the whole be paid." This declaration would seem to be conclusive as to the intention of the parties.

But it is ingeniously argued that these words are qualified by those which immediately follow: "that is to say, one third with interest on the whole November 10, 1866; one third with like interest," etc. If this were the proper view, and it had been the intention that the interest should stop upon the falling due of the instalments respectively, the expression would probably have been "until the whole becomes due," instead of "until the whole be paid." The videlicet, "that is to say," manifestly had reference to and was intended to particularize the words going before—"three equal annual instalments." Some seeming confusion may be avoided and the intention made plain if we consider the parts of the condition transposed, *and, taking the paragraph about interest out from the context where it stands, read it last, "with interest payable annually until the whole be paid." We agree with the referee and Circuit judge that such was the intention of the parties.

Second, in regard to the receipt on the bond of J. D. Kennedy to Miss Lang, April 17, 1871. Wm. M. Shannon, Esq., a lawyer of Camden, was the attorney of Miss Lang in renting the lands held in trust and collecting money due her. He had possession of her Kennedy bond, and at various times, as he received money, entered credits on it. One of these credits is very obscure, and the question made was as to its proper construction. A photograph of the receipt is in the case, and is in these words: "April 17 1871 Recd of J D K one hundred and ninety-two dollars ($192) in currency on this bond, on account of last years interest. Greenbacks at 10 per cent loose receipt." Signed, W. M. Shannon.

The receipt appears to have been written over pencil marks previously made, and opposite the signature in small writing, as if added afterwards, are these words: "and balance of int and int on Chesnut's bond in full paid 1 Feby 70 by 250 cash." The master allowed a credit of only $250 in currency. The plaintiff excepted for that he did not allow, in addition thereto, the sum of $192, and all the interest thereon up to November 10, 1870, and also a payment of $33.33 January 8, 1873. The judge sustained the exception so far as to construe the receipt to be a payment in full of all interest then due on the bond to date of receipt, April 17, 1871, and allowed the $33.33. The plaintiff again excepts, claiming two hundred and fifty dollars in addition to all interest up to date of receipt.

The receipts endorsed on the bond show that the obligor made payments at different times to keep down the annual interest; that these payments were made up of various items, cash, currency, due bills, etc., but never exceeded the interest due. These payments thus made had been credited and the interest discharged up to November 20, 1869, and from that time until April 17, 1871, the date of the receipt,—one year and five months,—the interest and interest on interest was due, which, calculated as the receipts show the parties had done it *before, amounted to about as much as the aggregate of both sums indicated in the receipt. The memoranda were short, not intended to be full entries, but merely to recall the transactions to the mind of Mr. Shannon, and it is greatly to be regretted that he is not here to explain them. After inspection of the original bond and the credits on it, we see no better solution of the matter than that given by the judge, that all the payments went in liquidation of the interest up to that date. We cannot say that his decision in this particular was error, and it is affirmed.

Third, in reference to the account against Miss Lang as trustee of the two tracts of land, Rock Hill and Doby. In charging the trustee the master did not take proof of the rents and profits actually received, but charged her with the annual rental value, according to the proof of witnesses, being eleven bales of cotton each year from 1873 to 1878, inclusive. To this the defendant excepted, claiming that without fault on her part certain rents were not received, particularly in the years 1877 and 1878, when one McLeod was her tenant, and that the master erred in excluding as evidence the professional books of Wm. M. Shannon, Esq., her attorney in law and fact, which would have shown that there were rents in each year not received. Judge Pressley sustained the master as to the incompetency of the books as evidence for Miss Lang, but sustained the exceptions so far as to allow the defendant to prove due diligence in her efforts to collect the rents for the years 1877 and 1878, the burden of proof being on her. From this ruling both parties appealed to this court: the defendant, because the opportunity to exonerate herself from liability in not collecting the rents in all the years was not allowed, and the books of Shannon were excluded; and the plaintiff, because such opportunity was allowed as to the years 1877 and 1878.

The defendant, Miss Lang, was declared to be a trustee as to the two tracts of land in question, and she was liable to account according to the principles which apply to the accountability of trustees generally. One of the most important of them is, that the trustee must make such faithful endeavors to do his duty as a prudent man would exert in respect to his own *property; but if, notwithstanding such endeavors, there is loss without fault upon his part, he is not liable. As we understand it, Judge Pressley did not disregard this principle, but on the contrary in his rulings recognized it.

Miss Lang prima facie was chargeable with the value of the rents. The testimony was taken on the subject on both sides, and the master reported a fixed amount for each year. The judge recommitted the report so far as it related to the years 1877 and 1878, giving the defendant an opportunity to show that after due diligence she had failed to collect the rents of those particular years, but as to the other years in which she had possession, it seems that he thought the showing was not sufficient to justify him in having the subject re-examined, and he confirmed the report. The question was substantially as to the propriety of recommitting the report in whole or in part after the case had been heard before the master, and upon that subject the Circuit judge must have a large discretion, with which this court will not ordinarily interfere.

There was no legal right to have the report recommitted on account of error on the part of the master in refusing to admit in evidence the office account-books of Mr. Shannon, the agent and attorney. His account-book was not competent evidence in this case in behalf of his principal, Miss Lang, for the purpose of proving that rents due her had not been collected. Upon the point ruled adversely to the defendant there was concurrence between the master and Circuit judge.

The plaintiff also excepted because the judge refused to open the report and recommit for further testimony the question as to the value of the Doby place. The same rule applies here. The question had been fairly considered. No testimony offered had been improperly excluded. There was no claim of accident or surprise. It is important that litigation should have an end. The master had considered all the testimony offered and made his report. The judge thought that no injustice had been done, and that there was no necessity for having the matter re-examined, and we cannot say that he erred in declining to open up the question a second time.

*In the accounting against Miss Lang for rents she was allowed credits for taxes paid on the lands, but as she was unable to produce the receipts for the taxes of the year 1875 ($145.12), the master refused to allow her credit for the same. The defendant excepted and the judge sustained the exception, but making it incumbent on her to show by proper evidence the amounts assessed upon said tracts of land for that year.

Being in possession it was the duty of the trustee to pay the taxes, which were a charge on the land. Taxes are said to be very certain, and there is no claim that either some one else paid these taxes or that they have not been paid. The land has never been forfeited for non-payment. Having paid the taxes every other year, both before and after 1875, it would seem that she had no motive to refuse payment for that year. As a lady; unaccustomed to business, she did not attend to the matter herself, and her trusted friend and agent, who was employed to do it, is dead. The judge held that the circumstances authorized the presumption of payment by Miss Lang, and we cannot say that such ruling was error.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

*23

*Before Mackey, J., Charleston, February, 1881.

The case is fully stated in the opinion of this court.

Messrs. Lord & Inglesby, for appellant.

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. Mrs. Emma R. Moses on the 8th day of July, A. D. 1880, applied by petition to the Probate Court for Charleston county for letters of administration upon the estate of C. C. Bowen, late of said county deceased. Before action by the Probate Court, the appellant, G. W. Dingle, filed a caveat, and subsequently, to wit, on 22d January, 1881, petitioned to be appointed himself, on the ground that he was a large creditor.

At the same time respondent, John H. Ostendorff, made application for the appointment. The petition of Ostendorff was recommended by a large number of the creditors, with claims amounting in the aggregate to $17,769.67; besides, Ostendorff claimed to be a creditor to the amount of $4202.54 in his own right. The appointment of Ostendorff was also requested by the widow. Mrs. Moses, it seems, had withdrawn her application.

Upon the hearing in the Probate Court evidence was introduced that Dingle, as the administrator of Wm. B. Dingle, represented a judgment for some $6000; also a simple contract debt for about $4000. The Probate judge granted letters to Dingle, stating in his order of appointment "that he was the largest judgment creditor; was a gentleman who would bring to the work of administrator an intimate knowledge of the duties of his office and of the status of the estate;" and that the best interests of the estate would be subserved by his appointment.

Ostendorff appealed to the Circuit Court, Judge Mackey presiding, who reversed the decree of the Probate judge, and ordered letters to issue from the Probate Court to Os-tendorff *upon his entering into good and sufficient bond as prescribed by law.

This decree of Judge Mackey was founded upon the facts that Ostendorff was a large creditor of the deceased, that he was the choice of the widow and a majority of the creditors, and also because Dingle was the administrator of a creditor, and not a creditor in his own right.

Under an act of the general assembly the Probate judge of the county where the intestate resided is invested with the power of granting letters of administration, and the validity of his decree and judgments thereunder must be determined by the requirements of this act. The act upon this subject is found incorporated in Gen. Stat., p. 451. It provides that administration shall be granted in a certain order. In Subdivision 6 of Section 1 it is enacted: That in default of the previous classes the greatest creditor or creditors shall receive the appointment. Here there was default of all the previous classes, and the contest was between two parties, each claiming to be a creditor. According to the terms of the act in such case, it was the duty of the Probate judge to ascertain which of the two was the greater creditor. That being determined, the act became imperative.

But it is said that Ostendorff represented a majority of the creditors and also the widow. This, no doubt, was true, and if the act had given the widow the authority to nominate or a majority of the creditors to recommend, then the Probate judge would have been bound to yield to these suggestions. This, however, would have delegated to the widow and the creditors the power of appointment instead of to the Probate judge, which has not been done. On the contrary, this authority is expressly conferred upon the Probate Court without qualification or limitation, except that the appointment shall be made in a certain order.

The cases of Thompson v. Hucket, 2 Hill, 348, and McBeth v. Hunt, 2 Strob. 338, are not in conflict with this position; on the contrary, they support and confirm it. In the first the contest was between two strangers. The court held that in the absence of kindred and creditors it was discretionary with the *Ordinary, under the act of 1789, as well as at common law, to whom he should grant the letters. In the latter the contest was again between two strangers. This was under the act of 1839. The Ordinary had appointed the nominee of the widow under a mistake of the law, which he supposed required him to make the appointment in accordance with the request. The court, while sustaining the appointment, distinctly declared that the widow's request or nomination carried no legal force whatever with it. The court said "that it was true the law gave to the widow the right to administer and it cannot be denied her. But it by no means follows from this that she may transfer her right to a stranger." This the court said would be giving her not only the right to administer, but also the power of appointment, thus substituting her discretion for that of the Ordinary.

When no one applies in the order prescribed by the act, it would not be improper for the Probate judge, in reaching a conclusion as to a suitable appointee, to listen to the suggestions of those who, if they applied, would be entitled; but such suggestions are not controlling. They would be simply advisory, and if rejected would give no ground for an appeal. This applies to the recommendations of creditors as well as to the widow and other kindred. McBeth v. Hunt, supra. This disposes of the first ground upon which the Circuit judge reversed the decree of the Probate judge.

The judge held, secondly, that Dingle was not a creditor in the sense of the act, but that Ostendorff was, and therefore by the terms of the act he should have been appointed. It seems that the amount represented by Dingle was admitted to be much the largest of any other single creditor, and that, as we have seen, the recommendation of the other creditors had no legal force; so that unless the position that Dingle, being only the administrator of a creditor, was not such a creditor as is contemplated by the act be correct, it would seem to follow that the judge was in error in reversing the Probate judge's decree on that ground.

Administration vests the legal title of the personal effects of the intestate in the administrator. It is true the administrator,

*26

*as to such assets, occupies somewhat the position of a trustee but he is none the less the legal owner thereof, and becomes as much entitled to exercise all the rights of ownership as if he were in possession of it as his individual property.

We see nothing in the terms of the act, or in its purpose and spirit, which limits the term creditor to one who only claims in his individual capacity and excludes one claiming in a representative right. Nor does there appear to be any inconsistency in the two positions. Dingle was in fact as much a creditor of the estate as Ostendorff, and, being the largest creditor, was entitled under the law to the administration.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed, and that the case be remanded to be determined in accordance with the principles herein adjudged.

FERGUSON & MILLER v. GILBERT & CO.

[1. Attachment  $\hookrightarrow$ 293.]

A void judgment (as where the absent debtor, whose property was attached, was never served personally or by publication) may be vacated by a junior attaching creditor; and a motion to vacate is a proper mode of proceeding in such case.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Crocker v. Allen, 34 S. C. 461, 13 S. E. 650, 27 Am. St. Rep. 831.

For other cases, see Attachment, Cent. Dig. § 1034; Dec. Dig.  $\hookrightarrow$ 293.]

Notice of motion to vacate a judgment was served upon the attorney of record and not upon the judgment creditor, and the motion was resisted on its merits in the Circuit Court by such attorney. Held, that it was too late to raise the objection in this court that service on the attorney was insufficient.

Before Kershaw, J., Greenville, April, 1881.

This was a motion made by P. W. Dalton & Co., judgment creditors of H. D. Gilbert & Co., to vacate a judgment of Ferguson & Miller v. H. D. Gilbert & Co. The notice of the motion was served upon the attorneys of record for the plaintiffs in the judgment sought to be vacated. The motion was based upon an affidavit in words following:

Personally appears before me Julius H. Heyward, who upon being duly sworn says, that he is the Attorney for P. W. Dalton & Co.; that on the 24th day of January, 1881, the *said P. W. Dalton & Co. obtained in the Trial Justice Court a judgment against H. D. Gilbert and J. W. Walker, partners doing business under the firm name of H. D. Gilbert & Co., for the sum of sixty-eight 07-100 dollars, with interest from the 13th day of September, 1880, and costs; that on the 15th day of February, 1881, a transcript of said judgment was filed in the office of the clerk of the Court of Common Pleas for Greenville County, and duly docketed therein; that on the same day execution was issued and lodged in the office of P. D. Gilreath, sheriff of said county, with instructions to levy forthwith and satisfy the same out of the property of the defendants; that at the time of issuing the summons in said action an attachment was issued and levied by the said sheriff upon certain goods, the property of the defendants, then in the hands of the sheriff; that subsequent to said levy the said sheriff proceeded to sell said goods, and now refuses to apply the proceeds thereof to the satisfaction of said judgment, for the alleged reason that the same are claimed by Messrs. Ferguson & Miller, the plaintiffs in a certain action entitled Ferguson & Miller v. H. D. Gilbert & Co.; that the summons and complaint in said action of Ferguson & Miller v. H. D. Gilbert & Co. have never been served upon either of said defendants as required by law.

The ground upon which the plaintiffs, Ferguson & Miller, obtained their warrant of attachment is thus stated in their affidavit: "That the said defendants cannot after due diligence be found within this state; that this deponent believes that the defendants have departed from this state, with intent to defraud their creditors, the grounds of his belief being that they have sold most all of their goods and have gone to North Carolina to remain, as this deponent is informed and believes, and not return to this state."

The presiding judge simply "ordered that the motion be dismissed, with five dollars costs against P. W. Dalton & Co." Dalton & Co. appealed upon the following exceptions:

1. Because it is respectfully submitted that his Honor erred in declining to consider the questions of law presented on said motion.

*2. Because it is respectfully submitted that his Honor erred in refusing to allow a junior attaching creditor to attack, on motion, an illegal and void attachment claiming priority.

3. Because it is respectfully submitted that his Honor erred in declining to declare void the lien of the supposed attachment of Ferguson & Miller.

4. Because it is respectfully submitted that his Honor erred in declining to declare void the supposed judgment of Ferguson & Miller. Other facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Julius H. Heyward, for appellants.

Proceeding by motion is the proper mode, and according to the established practice in this state. 1 McC. 116; 3 Id. 345; Harp. 219; 1 Strob. 239; 4 Id. 290; 1 Rich. 438; 4 Id. 561; 4 Abb. Prac. 393. Service by copy left under the amendment to Section 157 of the code (15 Stat. 869) is not sufficient in proceedings by attachment under Section 250. Besides, the defendants were not temporarily absent. Defendants being absent, jurisdiction of their persons cannot be taken, but only of the property attached. 1 Bail. 245; 4 Rich. 561; 33 N. Mr. M. F. Ansel, contra.

March 22, 1882. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. This is a contest between two attaching creditors over a fund in the hands of the sheriff of Greenville county, arising from the sale of certain property of an absent debtor. The respondent's attachment was issued on October 11, 1880, and levied upon the goods of the absent debtor. The summons was served on the same day by leaving *a copy with the wife of one of the defendants. There was no publication. The appellant's attachment was issued by a trial justice on November 19, 1880, and levied upon the same goods, the summons being regularly served by publication.†

†This is the statement of the brief. It does not appear, however, by whom the order for publication was granted. There is no power in courts to reach by its process non-resident defendants, except through property within its jurisdiction, and only so far as that property is affected. There is also no power by which a court can make an absent defendant a party to a cause by a publication of summons, unless expressly authorized by statute to do so. Bailey v. Whaley, 14 Rich. Eq. 81; Galpin v. Page, 18 Walt. 367 [21 L. Ed. 959]; Pennoyer v. Neff,

Both respondents and appellants obtained judgments, the former in the Court of Common Pleas for $353.91, on November 19, 1880, and the latter in the Trial Justice Court for $69.67, a transcript of which latter was filed in the clerk's office on February 15, 1881. At the April Term of the court, 1881, appellants moved the court to vacate and set aside the judgment and attachments of the respondents, upon the ground that they were void for want of legal service of the summons. The judge dismissed the motion on the ground, as is stated in the brief, that a rule upon the sheriff was the proper remedy, and not motion. The only question on the appeal is whether the appellants could be heard on motion.

If it had been the purpose of the appellants to assail the proceedings of the respondents on account of irregularity merely, they could not have been heard under any form of procedure, because it has often been decided in this state that no one but the absent debtor himself could complain of errors consisting in irregularities simply. Foster v. Jones, 1 McC. 116; Chambers & Sadler v. McKee, 1 Hill, 229; Camberford v. Hall, 3 McC. 345; Kincaid v. Neall, 3 McC. 201.

But there is a wide distinction between irregular and void process, between voidable and such as are absolutely void. This distinction has been frequently recognized in our courts, and while it has been often held, as stated above, in attachment proceedings, that no one but the debtor himself can take advantage of the first, yet in cases vulnerable for the latter cause, junior attaching or judgment creditors may assail such judgments in a prompt and summary manner, and the practice to have them vacated has been by motion. Thus in Lindau v. Arnold, 4 Strob. 290, where a domestic attachment was issued against an absent debtor by a magistrate, a creditor who had proceeded by foreign attachment on motion vacated the domestic attachment on the ground that the domestic attachment could not issue against a debtor absent from the state, and therefore that the attachment in that case was void. Judge O'Neill said: "If it had been merely irregular, then indeed third persons, garnishees or creditors, could not take advantage of the irregularity. But the domestic attachment being void, it follows that the levy under it is as nothing, and the levy of the foreign attachment must prevail."

In Byne v. Byne, 1 Rich. 438, junior attaching creditors were permitted on motion predicated on a rule to set aside a junior writ. See also Gardner v. Hust, 2 Rich. 601; Weyman v. Murdock, Harp. 125; and Walker er & Bradford v. *Roberts, 4 Rich. 563. In the latter case the authorities in our state and elsewhere are collected and discussed.

We think the failure of the respondents to have their summons served by publication, if true, was something more than a mere irregularity. Without service of summons as required by the law, when not dispensed with by acceptance, appearance, or in some other way, the court has no jurisdiction of the party, and the judgment in such case is a nullity; and where the want of jurisdiction appears the judgment may be treated as a nullity wherever it is met with.

It does not appear that the presiding judge made any ruling upon the merits of the question involved below. He dismissed the motion on the ground that motion was not the proper proceeding, but that plaintiff should have commenced by rule on the sheriff. It may be that a rule would not have been objectionable, yet the practice in the cases referred to above seems to have been by motion; and upon the authority of these cases we think the judge was in error in declining to hear appellants' application.

The respondents in the argument before the court raised the question that they had not been made parties below to appellant's motion; that the service of notice of the motion had been made upon their attorneys instead of themselves; and on the authority of Duncan, Malony & Co. v. Brown, 15 S. C. 414, they claimed that they were not before the court. If this ground had been taken tice derives no express authority from Sections 248, 249 [250, 251] of our code to grant an order of publication, and the power cannot be taken by implication—certainly not unless the implication be necessary. Nor can he derive any such authority from Section 88 [91], Subd. 15, of the code. It would seem to follow that the order for publication required in the chapter on attachments cannot be granted by a trial justice, but must be granted by one of the officers designated in Section 156 [158]. If it be objected that it could not have been the intention of the legislature to authorize an order of publication to be granted by an officer not connected with the court in which the proceeding is pending, the reply is that this same section does that very thing in the power granted to a Probate judge to order publication in actions for partition and foreclosure where there are unknown defendants. See, too, Section 136 [138], and Trapier v. Waldo, 16 S. C. 276.—REPORTER.

5 Otto, 714 [24 L. Ed. 565]. To authorize publication of a summons by order of a trial justice the statute power must be shown. There is no such statute. Section 156 [158] of the code relates only to cases in courts of record. See Section 148 [150]. The term court, therefore, in that section does not include trial-justices' courts. This further appears from the use of the words trial justice in this same section, in connection with service upon persons confined in prisons, &c., within the state. On turning, however, to Sections 248, 249 [250, 251] of the code, we find jurisdiction given to trial justices in attachment where the defendant is a non-resident. In New York under its revised statutes the right of the justice in attachment to proceed against the property is perfect upon an ineffectual effort to serve the summons. 1 Wait's Law and Prac. 76. So it is in this state in a matter of claim and delivery of personal property. Code, § 77 [80]. The trial jus-

below and overruled, we might consider it. But there is nothing in the brief which entitles the respondents to raise this question here. So far as it appears in the "Case" as agreed upon, the respondents were regularly in court. They appeared by counsel and resisted the motion. In the judge's order it is stated, "after argument of counsel for plaintiffs and P. W. Dalton & Co. to set aside the judgment and attachment in this case, it is ordered"... It is too late now for respondents to raise this question, even if they had better ground to warrant it than the facts as appear from the affidavit of Mr. Heyward would imply.

he is a creditor is not before us. All *that we decide is that the questions which he attempted to have adjudicated may be brought before the Circuit Court on motion.

It is the judgment of this court that the order of the Circuit Court be reversed, and that the case be remanded for such further proceedings as may be deemed advisable.

On appeal to the Circuit Court from an order of the Probate Court revoking letters of administration, the Circuit judge committed no error in refusing to submit to a jury issues of fact involving questions of fraud and waiver.

[This case is also cited in Ex parte White, 38 S. C. 47, 16 S. E. 286, and distinguished therefrom.]

Before Kershaw, J., Charleston, July, 1881. The opinion states the case.

Mr. W. J. Whipper, for appellant.

March 22, 1882. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. Within a few days after the death of William Rollin, late of Charleston county, Frances A. Whipper, wife of W. J. Whipper, applied to the judge of the Probate Court of said county for letters of administration. *The petitioner represented that she and her three sisters were the heirs of the deceased. Upon this showing the letters were granted.

Within a month afterwards, Margaret Rollin filed a petition claiming that she was the widow of the intestate, and therefore entitled to administration; that by reason of her absence she was ignorant of the application of Frances Whipper, and she now applies for the revocation of the letters granted to the said Frances. Upon this petition the Probate judge revoked the appointment of the said Frances, and ordered that citation be issued under the application of the said Margaret Rollin. From this order Frances A. Whipper appealed to the Circuit Court.

On this appeal the following issues of fact were submitted as raised by the pleadings: 1st. Whether or not fraud was practised by Frances Whipper in obtaining letters. 2d. Whether or not the respondent in the case, Margaret Rollin, waived her primary right to the letters. The appellant below demanded a jury for the trial of these issues. The judge declined to submit the issues to a jury, and having heard the case, dismissed the appeal with costs. The appellant below, Frances A. Whipper, has appealed from this order of Judge Kershaw upon four grounds in form, but really upon but one, to wit: that his Honor erred in refusing to submit the questions of fact raised in the appeal to a jury.

Section 62 of the code provides that upon appeals from the Probate Court to the Circuit Court "such court shall proceed to the trial and determination of the questions according to the rules of law, and if there is any question of fact or title to land to be decided, issue may be joined thereon under the direction of the court, and a trial thereof had by the jury." This section requires, first, that the appeal shall be heard according to the rules of law, and then provides for a jury, where according to the rules of law a jury can be demanded. This must be the meaning of this section, otherwise the right of trial by jury would be enlarged in appeals from the Probate Court without reason. Any other construction would bring this section in conflict with other sections of the code on the *subject of the trial of causes, and produce discord in the system.

Section 276 specifies the character of facts which must be tried by a jury, unless a jury trial is waived. In such cases the parties interested have a legal right to demand a jury, and its refusal would be legal error. In every other issue the court may try the questions involved or may order to a jury or referee, as may be deemed advisable. § 277.

The issues of fact raised in this appeal do not belong to any of the classes mentioned in Sec. 276, where a jury may be demanded as a legal right. These classes are: 1st, actions for the recovery of money; 2nd, for specific real or personal property, and 3d, for divorce on the ground of adultery. (This was when divorces were allowed.)

In this case the issues of fact submitted were fraud and the question of waiver on the part of the widow of the deceased. These facts, if entitling the appellant to any relief, appealed to the equity side of the court instead of the common law. They involved fraud, and the doctrine of estoppel invoking equity jurisdiction. In such cases it is discretionary with the judge whether he will hear the facts or seek the aid of a jury. In either event this discretion is unappealable.

But in addition to this, the decision of the issues of fact, especially the issue of fraud, could have had no influence upon the final judgment. It made no difference as to the right of the respondent to administration upon the estate of her husband whether the Probate judge was kept in ignorance of her existence through fraud or inadvertence. Under the act (Gen. Stat. 451), she was entitled to administration. She above all others had the legal right to administer in the first instance. She applied within a month after her husband's death. This was as prompt as necessary, and the Probate judge did not transcend his powers in revoking the letters granted on the application made within a few days after the death of the intestate. Thompson v. Hockett, 2 Hill, 348.

In no event, therefore, was there error in the order of the Circuit judge in sustaining the decree of the Probate judge. It is the judgment of this court that the order of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

[1. Election of Remedies ◊3.]

Where a judgment creditor purchases at sheriff's sale the "land assigned as a homestead" to the judgment debtor, supposed at the time to include an entire tract, he or his assignee are not thereby estopped from afterwards bringing an action as owner of a junior judgment to set aside as fraudulent a prior deed covering such part of the tract as has been judicially ascertained not to have been included in the sheriff's sale and deed. No question of election of remedies is here involved.

[2. Judgment ◊540.]

According to the Duchess of Kingston's case (2 Sm. Lead. Cas. 424), three things are necessary to sustain the plea of res judicata: 1, the parties must be the same, or their privies; 2, the subject-matter must be the same; 3, the precise point must have been ruled.

[3. Judgment ◊683.]

An assignee of a judgment is a privy of his assignor only in regard to the judgment, and is not bound by an adjudication in an action between the assignor as purchaser of land covered by the lien of such judgment and a third person.

[4. Judgment ◊735.]

An assignee of a junior judgment is not estopped from attacking a deed of the debtor as fraudulent, because that, subsequent to the assignment, in action between himself (as purchaser, prior to the assignment, of the judgment-debtor's land under a senior judgment) and a grantee of such debtor by deed intermediate the judgments, a part of the land was recovered by the grantee on the ground that it was not included in the sheriff's sale and deed, no question of fraud in the grantee's deed being there made. And the assignee not being estopped, a subsequent purchaser from him is not estopped.

[5. Judgment ◊724.]

A judgment is not conclusive of every question which might have been made in the case, as is sometimes erroneously said, but only of matters that had of necessity to be determined before the judgment could have been given.

Before Thomson, J., Greenville, March, 1880.

Walker, Mary A. Walker, Sarah C. *Good, and Valentine G. Wood—the last three being made parties under order of Judge Pressley. The facts and the order of the Circuit judge sufficiently appear in the opinion of this court. The exceptions are long, but they raise only the precise questions considered by this court.

Mr. T. H. Cooke, for appellant.

April 5, 1882. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. This was an action to set aside certain deeds of land as fraudulent and void. A short statement of the facts is necessary to make the judgment intelligible. John Bates, Sr., of Greenville, became embarrassed, and on March 5, 1867, Turner and Barton recovered judgment against him, and in May, 1869, E. A. Kelly and J. W. Coleman and other creditors obtained judgments against him. On October 23, 1867, he made a deed to his son, John Bates, Jr., of his lands, consisting of two tracts, which for convenience we will call No. 1 and No. 2, consisting in the aggregate of 492 acres. The deed expressed the consideration of $385.63.

John Bates, Jr., on Oct. 26, 1869, conveyed back to John Bates, Sr., a part of tract No. 2 (87 acres) in trust for his daughter, Sarah C. Good, the consideration stated being $125, and the remainder of that tract, 199 acres, to the defendant Green L. Walker, in trust for his wife, Mary, another daughter of John Bates, Sr., upon the consideration stated of $175. John Bates, Jr., still lived with his father on No. 1 until 1874, when he moved to tract No. 2. John Bates, Sr., and Green L. Walker are now in possession of tract No. 2. On July 16, 1869, while John Bates, Sr., was living on tract No. 1, he had a homestead assigned to him by metes and bounds, represented as containing 410 acres, more or less, and believed to embrace all the lands covered by the deed from John Bates, Sr., to John Bates, Jr.

In this way John Bates, Sr., and his family held all his lands until 1876, when Turner and Barton, whose judgment was not only older than the constitution allowing homestead, but also older than the deed to John

Bates, Jr., had the "homestead" *assigned to John Bates, Sr., levied on and sold, and one A. A. Hart became the purchaser and received sheriff's titles; which described the land levied and sold as that which had been assigned to John Bates, Sr., as his "homestead." After this sale John Bates, Sr., removed to the parcel of tract No. 2 which had been reconveyed to him as trustee for his daughter, Mrs. Good, and A. A. Hart, the purchaser, under some proceeding ousted John Bates, Jr., from tract No. 1. About that time Hart discovered that his deed conveying the land which had been assigned as homestead did not include tract No. 2, and he purchased the judgments of Kelly and Coleman, and had them levied upon tract No. 2. He became the purchaser also of that tract and took sheriff's titles.

In 1877 John Bates, Jr., brought an action against A. A. Hart for tract No. 1, from which he had been ousted. Hart stood on his first deed from the sheriff, describing the land purchased by him as that which had been "assigned as homestead," but when that was located it was found not to cover 151 acres of tract No. 1, for which Bates had a verdict and Hart for the remainder. This recovery must have been founded upon the original deed from John Bates, Sr., and in this action the question of its bona fides was not made. There was no appeal.

There was still a balance upon the judgments unpaid, and in 1879 A. A. Hart assigned them to his wife, Sarah J. Hart, who as assignee of the judgments instituted these proceedings to set aside as fraudulent and void the deed from John Bates, Sr., to his son, the said John Bates, Jr. The plaintiff offered proof that the deed was without consideration and void as to creditors. The defendants offered no evidence, but moved to dismiss the complaint on the ground mainly that the question of the bona fides of the deed from father to son had been adjudged in the case of Bates v. A. A. Hart, and that Sarah J. Hart was a privy of A. A. Hart, the defendant in that case, and could not now assail the deed as fraudulent. The plaintiff replied that as assignee of the judgments she was not a privy of A. A. Hart in respect to the deed to John Bates, Jr.; but if she were such privy, the fact that the deed was fraudulent was not known at the time of the trial of the case of Bates v. A. A. Hart, but was discovered afterwards, and being subsequently discovered, the question was not made and could not have been adjudged in that case. There was no evidence going to show that the plaintiff or her assignor had knowledge of the alleged fraud at the time of the trial of the former case. On the contrary, the plaintiff showed that she had no knowledge of the alleged fraud until after said trial, and that she heard of the same for the first time in the latter part of 1878, and only shortly before the judgments were assigned to her. There was evidence showing that the alleged fraud had been talked about on the streets of Greenville many years before the plaintiff brought her action, but none showing that the plaintiff or her assignor had any knowledge of the same until the latter part of 1878. There was no evidence introduced to establish the fact that on the trial of the case of Bates v. Hart the question of the mala fides of the deed to John Bates, Jr., was in any way considered.

The presiding judge held as matter of law that while there was no proof of such issue having been made and determined, "he took it for granted it had been done," and dismissed the complaint. The plaintiff appeals to this court. The exceptions are long and numerous to the rulings both of law and fact, but we do not think it necessary to consider them all seriatim, as enough has been stated to present the questions which, according to our view, must decide the case.

One of the findings of fact, however, should be considered before we reach the main point. The presiding judge found as follows: "That the plaintiff's assignors had exhausted their remedy under the executions, and should not be remitted to another mode of relief affecting the same property; that having exhausted their measure of relief by sale, their assignee again presents the executions and asks that the land be sold—not indeed under the executions, but what is substantially the same thing, for their payment. This approaches a case of election of remedies where a choice is presented, and such election having been made by the sale of the property, the parties are bound by it."

*According to the facts stated in "the case," this appears to be a misapprehension of both fact and law. The piece of land containing 151 acres of tract No. 1, which John Bates, Jr., recovered from Hart, and which substantially is the subject of this controversy, was never sold under the executions at all. The very ground upon which Bates recovered it from Hart was that the sheriff at his first sale sold only "the homestead," and when that was located it appeared that the sheriff's deed did not include this particular parcel, which had not been sold at all.

It is a mistake to say that "the creditors have exhausted their remedy under the executions." They could now levy and sell all the interest of John Bates, Jr., in the 151 acres, being outside of the lines of "the homestead." But as the parcel is claimed by John Bates, Jr., under the deed from his father, it was better possibly to make the issue of fraud in the deed, so as to remove that cloud from the title before levy and sale. That A. A. Hart for a time supposed that "the homestead," which he had purchased and which called for 410 acres, covered this parcel, could not alter the fact that it did not. The parcel of land in controversy was never sold under the executions either by the plaintiff or her assignors, and as to that the question is still open. A. A. Hart made a mistake as to what lands his deed from the sheriff covered, which was corrected in the first case; but that affords no reason why he should not be allowed to conform his actions to the facts as they were established by the decision of the court. We see nothing to raise a question of election.

The presiding judge held as matter of law "that the action of plaintiff prayed relief by a sale of lands, a portion of which, in a suit between her immediate assignor, A. A. Hart, and John Bates, Jr., had been declared the property of the latter, which judgment had not been reversed; that this suit was between parties who were privies in interest, and the right in question was adjudged." The question is was this ruling error.

As we understand it, the object of this action was not to sell the land but to set aside deeds, so that it could be sold under the executions as the property of John Bates, Sr.

At all *events we shall consider that as the scope of the proceeding. The judge did not consider the evidence of fraud, in the deed, but, disregarding it entirely, dismissed the complaint; and therefore, in considering the question whether he committed error, we may assume that fraud was or could be proved.

matter once litigated should not again be drawn in question between the same parties or those claiming through them. But whilst it is important to maintain the principle in all its integrity, it is no less important that it should be clearly defined and kept within its proper limits. All agree as to its utility and necessity, but there has been difference of opinion as to its precise limits and its application in particular cases.

As we understand it, the rule established in the Duchess of Kingston's case is, "first, that the judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction, directly on the point, is as a plea in bar or as evidence conclusive between the same parties upon the same matter directly in question in another court; secondly, that the judgment of a court of exclusive jurisdiction directly upon the point is in like manner conclusive upon the same matter between the same parties coming incidentally in question in another court for a different purpose. But neither the judgment of a concurrent or exclusive jurisdiction is evidence of any matter which comes collaterally in question, though within their jurisdiction, nor of any matter incidentally cognizable, nor of any matter to be inferred by argument from the judgment." 2 Smith's Lead. Cases, 424, and notes. It seems, therefore, that to make out the defence at least three things are necessary: the parties must be the same, or their privies; the subject-matter must be the same, and the precise point must have been ruled.

Was the judge right in holding that Sarah J. Hart, the plaintiff, was a privy in interest with A. A. Hart so as to be bound by whatever in the case of Bates v. Hart was decided against him? The parties in this action are certainly not the same as in that of Bates

v. Hart, nor is the cause of action the *same. In the first Bates, Jr., sued Hart for land, and in this Sarah J. Hart sues John Bates and others to set aside as fraudulent the deed to Bates covering this same land. The defence therefore cannot prevail as a plea in bar, but it may be offered in evidence as an estoppel of the plaintiff, Sarah J., if she is a privy of A. A. Hart, the defendant in the first action, and the precise question she now makes was then decided against him.

Privies are defined to be "those who are partakers or have an interest in any action," and are of three kinds—in blood, in law, and in estate. Sarah J. Hart was neither privy in blood nor law of A. A. Hart; was she a privy in estate? She purchased the judgments from A. A. Hart, and as his assignee was his privy as to all questions affecting these judgments, and is bound by all that was binding against him in regard to them; but that does not make her his privy as to any other matter. Nothing decided in the case of Bates v. Hart touched the judgments. It is true that at the time of the trial they were the property of A. A. Hart, and that circumstance may confuse the mind; but the question decided had no connection with the judgments. The only question decided was one of location as to what land passed under the words, "the homestead of John Bates, Sr."

A. A. Hart did not defend as owner of the judgments but as purchaser of the land. Indeed, at the time he purchased "the homestead" under these judgments he did not own them. He afterwards purchased them for another purpose and owned them at the time of the trial, but that was an accidental circumstance, which cannot affect his assignee. If Hart himself had instituted these proceedings it would have been in a character different from that in which he defended the case of Bates. "A judgment against one as executor does not bar his individual claim." Charles v. Charles, 13 S. C. 385.

But suppose that Sarah J. Hart, as assignee of the judgments, was a privy of A. A. Hart, not only as creditor but as purchaser, the question then next in order is whether the fraud alleged in this case was conclusively decided in the former suit. The argument for Bates is that he could recover a parcel of the land only upon the assumption that his deed from his *father was bona fide, and whether in the former suit Hart made that question or not he might have done so, and the mere omission to avail himself of a defence which the nature of the case and the scope of the pleadings allowed estops him and his privies from making that question in another action.

The form of the proceeding in the two cases was certainly not the same. The first was an action at law for land, and this, as stated, is a proceeding in the nature of a bill in equity to set aside a deed of that land for fraud. It may be that the defence of fraud might have been made in the first suit. Fraud vitiates everything, and in one sense all courts take cognizance of it; but the jurisdiction to set aside a deed for fraud is most appropriately exercised through equitable proceedings. In the case of Bradley v. McBride, Rich. Eq. Cas. 204, it was held that after a trial at law, in which lands were recovered, the losing party might go into equity, and have the deed upon which the recovery was based, set aside for a fraud perpetrated before the first trial. Judge O'Neill said, "The recovery in equity is more convenient, and as the jurisdiction of this court over this class of cases is unquestionable, I think the recovery at law cannot conclude the complainant."

But both law and equity are now administered in the same court, and there is not the same difference in the forms of proceeding as formerly. It seems to be now settled that, though the proceeding is in another jurisdiction and for a different purpose, the judgment will be conclusive, provided the court has jurisdiction and the judgment was directly on the point. "A decision by a court of competent jurisdiction is binding upon all other courts of concurrent power." Maxwell v. Connor, 1 Hill Eq. 22.

It is claimed, however, as a sequence of this rule that the defence of res judicata extends to every question which could have been made, whether it was considered or not. There are cases which seem to go to that extent; but we think the decided preponderance of authority maintains the more reasonable doctrine, "that a judgment is not technically conclusive of any matter, if the matter is not such that it had of necessity to be determined before the judgment could have *been given—that it was not merely collateral, nor to be inferred by argument from the judgment." 6 Wait's A. & D. 785, citing Hunter v. Davis, 19 Ga. 413, and other cases. Or in the language of Mr. Justice Miller of the U. S. Supreme Court, in his dissenting opinion in the case of Aurora City v. West, 7 Wall. 106 [19 L. Ed. 42]: "The rule is, that when a former judgment is relied on, it must appear from the record that the point in controversy was necessarily decided in the former suit, or be made to appear by extrinsic proof that it was in fact decided. This is expressly ruled no less than three times within the last eight years by this court, viz., in the Steam Packet Co. v. Sickles, 24 How. 333 [16 L. Ed. 650]; Same v. Same, 5 Wall. 580 [18 L. Ed. 550]; Miles v. Caldwell, 2 Wall. 35 [17 L. Ed. 755]."

The record in the case of Bates v. Hart did not show that the question of fraud in the deed to Bates had been necessarily decided, nor was it shown as matter of fact by extrinsic proof. On the contrary, there was proof tending to show that neither the plaintiff nor her assignors ever heard of the fraud in the deed until 1878, a short time before this proceeding was instituted. The judge "remarked that while there was no proof of such issue being made and determined, he took it for granted that it had been done." It surely cannot be that a judgment must be considered as conclusive not only of the matters actually decided by it, but of every question which by probability could have been made in the trial, including that of fraud in one of the deeds in evidence, fair on its face, which fraud was not then known to the party now to be estopped, for not then alleging it.

It is true the deed had been regularly recorded, and the plaintiff must be held to have had notice, but surely notice as it stood expressed to be for valuable consideration. The fraud had then been perpetrated, but it did not appear on the face of the deed. The registry gave no clue to it, but on the contrary tended to conceal it by misrepresentation. The fraud in the deed was conceded by the party who now claims advantage from having been able to keep the secret so successfully as to escape discovery. It was in its character collateral and exceptionable.

*Fortunately fraud is not universal. The charge of mala fides is not expected to be made as matter of course against every deed offered in evidence. There is yet some faith in fair dealing. The general rule certainly is, that deeds expressed to be for valuable consideration are what they purport to be. The charge of laches cannot justly be brought against one for omitting to assail a deed for fraud, when he had no knowledge of the facts constituting such fraud. To assail a deed for fraud without satisfactory evidence would be inexcusable. It cannot be necessary for every suitor to assail as fraudulent every deed proved on the other side in every case in order to escape the penalty of being precluded from doing so at a future time, in case he should discover evidence that would justify such charge.

In the great leading case of Le Guen v. Gouverneur & Kemble, 1 John. Cas. 494, after holding the doctrine that a judgment is not only final as to matters actually determined, but as to every other matter which under the pleadings might have been determined, Mr. Justice Radcliffe said, "It is, however, admitted that cases in which there are no laches or neglect form exceptions to the rule. Thus where a party has no notice of a defence to which he is entitled, or can make it appear that material evidence has been subsequently discovered which would probably support that defence and alter the determination, he ought not to be concluded."

The Court of Vermont has held as follows: "The rule is, that when the jurisdiction of the courts of law and equity is entirely concurrent, the adjudication of the former is conclusive upon the latter, except in the cases of new matter discovered subsequently to the trial at law, or of fraud by the opposite party, or of mistake or accident. But when a party has equitable rights not cognizable in a court of law but only in equity, a court of equity will grant him relief from such adjudication." Dunham v. Donner, 31 Verm. 249.

We think it was error to hold that the plaintiff was estopped from making the question of fraud in the deeds.

The statute of limitations is not pleaded, but lapse of time and adverse possession are informally set up as matters of defence. The judgments now owned by the plaintiff were obtained in May, 1869, and this action was brought January 8, 1879, within less than ten years. Besides, the statute did not commence to run until the discovery of the facts constituting the fraud. Beattie v. Pool, 13 S. C. 379.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed and the case remanded for a new trial.

McCREARY v. BURNS.

[1. Wills ⚭616, 675.]

The provisions of a will were: "I desire that the land and other property remaining shall continue in the possession of my beloved wife L. during her life, believing she will make use of it to the best advantage for the benefit of our children as well as her own comfort. At her death, I wish the property sold and an equal division made. If it should be deemed advisable by the executors to dispose of or exchange the property, I authorize them to do so, having confidence that they will in all things consult the best interest of the family." The widow was executrix. Held, that under the will construed as a whole L. took only a life-estate, with no power of consuming the corpus and without any trust during her life, enforceable by the courts, in favor of the children.

Before Kershaw, J., Anderson, February, 1881.

Action for partition and account instituted by Alice J. McCreary against Thomas Burns, Robert Burns, and others, devisees and heirs at law of Anderson Burns, deceased. The opinion states the case.

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. Anderson Burns died in 1846, possessed of a small tract of 140 acres of land and some personal property. He left eight children, all minors, six daughters and two sons, viz., Maria Burns, Robert Burns, Thomas Burns, Nancy Stephens, Harriet Hunt, Hester Rochester, and Mary Reese (who has died since, leaving distributees, John Reese, Lucy Woolbright, and Sidney Reese, now also dead, leaving heirs in Virginia whose names are not known), and also Sarah Grogan, who died after the death of her father, but before her mother, leaving as her sole heir Alice J. Grogan, who intermarried with L. C. McCreary.

The deceased left a will, of which his widow Leah was the sole qualified executrix, and which provided as follows: First. I wish as soon as convenient that my debts, of which there are not many, shall be paid. Secondly. I desire that the land and other property remaining shall continue in the possession of my beloved wife, Leah Burns, during her life, believing she will make use of it to the best advantage for the benefit of our children—as well as her own comfort. Thirdly. At her death I wish the property sold and an equal division made, except *that the sons, none of whom have had the advantages of education, shall each have one hundred dollars over and above an equal distributive share, and each of the daughters now under ten years of age (three) to have fifty dollars over and above an equal distributive share. If, as I expect, another should be added to the number either of boys or girls, I wish it included in the provisions of this clause. Fourthly. If it should be deemed advisable by the executors to dispose of or exchange the property, I authorize them to do so, having confidence that they will in all things consult the best interests of the family.

The widow alone qualified. There were some but not many debts. The family continued to live on the place. The mother and the two sons managed, and by the work of all the family was barely supported. As the children grew up they married and moved off. Robert remained four years after he came of age before he married prior to 1860. When he left, his mother gave him her note for $400 for his services after he came of age. Afterwards she conveyed 40 acres of the land to pay this note, but when she was about to sell the land he reconveyed to her, still retaining her note. After Robert left, Thomas became the head of the family, remaining with his mother, giving his labor and being clothed and supported for thirteen years after he came of age.

In May, 1869, having incurred some debts, and among them that to Robert, Mrs. Burns sold the homestead to one E. G. Roberts for $2000 in currency, which was reduced somewhat by being brought to a gold basis, and on July 5, 1880, another tract of land was purchased from one Alonzo J. White for $1000, the titles of which were made to Thomas Burns. To this place the family removed, then consisting of Mrs. Burns, Thomas, and Maria (who had never married), and the grand-daughter, Alice J. Grogan, whose mother had died years before, and who had been reared from infancy by her grandmother. Thomas conveyed 100 acres of the land to Robert, who now lives on it. Alice Grogan married and went off, and things remained in this general condition until 1876, when the widow, Mrs. Burns, died. There has been no administration upon her estate.

*In 1879 Alice J. McCreary instituted these proceedings, alleging that the White tract of land now in possession of Thomas and Robert was paid for with the proceeds of the sale of the homestead, and therefore falls under the provisions of the will and is subject to partition among the brothers and sisters and the children of those who have died since the testator. Thomas and Robert answered in substance that Mrs. Burns, by authority of the will, had directed titles made to Thomas, with the consent of the other children, in payment for his long and faithful services to her and the family, and that there was no estate to divide. The case came on to be heard before Judge Kershaw, who decreed that under the will Mrs. Burns was simply a tenant for life, and as such trustee for the remaindermen; that the White place had been purchased with proceeds of the sale of the homestead and was subject to partition. He directed a sale, and ordered an account of the rents and profits since the death of Mrs. Burns, and also ordered that Robert should pay back $400 of the purchase-money which he got in satisfaction of the note his mother had given him, as stated, for his services.

Thomas and Robert appeal to this court upon the exceptions: I. "That under the will Mrs. Burns was not merely a life-tenant, holding the property in trust for the children at her death, but entrusted with it for the benefit of herself and children, with a superadded power to sell and dispose of the property as would be most conducive to their best interest.

II. "That the testimony does not show that more than $500 of the proceeds of the homestead were invested in the tract of land purchased by Thomas Burns.

III. "That the decree that Robert Burns should pay $400 was not asked for in the complaint, and was a surprise, and all the facts in regard to the transaction not inquired into either by the plaintiff's or defendants' counsel.

IV. "That Alice J. McCreary, the sole plaintiff, having received, as shown by the testimony, far more than her distributive share of the estate, even if she was entitled to anything, is estopped in equity and conscience from her present unconscionable demand.

*V. "That Alice J. McCreary, the sole plaintiff, being a granddaughter of the testator, has no interest under the will of the testator, and therefore cannot maintain this action.

VI. "That the action has been prematurely brought, no administration upon the estate of Leah Burns, deceased, having been taken, nor any decree fixing her liability, nor evidence showing the inability of her estate to respond to any demand against it, growing out of the trust estate.

VII. "That the statute of limitations is a bar to the recovery of the plaintiff, as the deed to Thomas Burns was made and recorded more than six years previous to the institution of this or any other action to impair its validity, and the circumstances connected with the purchase of said tract of land were known to the plaintiff at the time of the purchase."

The fundamental rule prescribed for the construction of wills is that the intention of the testator, to be collected from the whole will, must govern, and that if possible it must be so construed that the whole must stand together and effect be given to every provision in it. What was the intention of Burns the testator? Did he mean to give his little property to his wife to use and enjoy during her life, paying his debts and rearing his family upon the usufruct alone, and at her death the whole corpus to go over to his children—in other words, to make her simply a tenant for life with limitation over to the children; or did he intend to give his property to his wife in trust for herself and children, not only with the right to use it, but with the power to dispose of it, to consume it in the use, to spend it all if necessary in rearing his family? If the latter, it would be necessary that the representative of Leah, the trustee, should be made a party to account for the property and to show whether it was necessary to sell it, and also whether the proceeds of sale were properly and necessarily spent in the support and maintenance of the family. But if the former, the ordinary principles as between tenant for life and remainderman must be applied.

The first part of the second paragraph of the will undoubtedly gives a simple life-estate to Leah. There is no direct gift in terms, but being in a will the word "desire"

*means that. If the clause had stopped there, no doubt could exist that she took a life-estate pure and simple; but these words were added: "believing she will make use of it to the best advantage for the benefit of our children as well as her own comfort." Should these words change the construction of the clause so as to make Leah a trustee of the property "for the benefit of the children," giving them an equitable charge on it during her life for their support, or were they simply expressions of faith intended to stimulate the discretion given to her?

With some hesitation we concur with the Circuit judge in taking the view that Leah Burns was simply a life-tenant, and as such trustee of the property for the children as remaindermen. No such trust for the children was created in Leah during her life, as the court would compel her to execute. The purposes were too vague and uncertain, and the word "believing" was not intended to be more than precatory.

Without going into the numerous authorities upon the subject, we content ourselves by citing the remarks of Mr. Justice Story: "The doctrine of construing expressions of recommendation, confidence, hope, wish and desire into positive and peremptory commands, is not a little difficult to be maintained, upon a sound principle of interpretation of the actual intentions of a testator.

It can scarcely be presumed that every testator should not clearly understand the difference between such expressions and words of positive direction and command, and that in using the one and omitting the other he should not have a determined end in view. It will be agreed on all hands, that when the intention of the testator is to leave the whole object, as a pure matter of discretion, to the free-will and pleasure of the party enjoying his confidence and favor, and when his expressions of desire are entrusted as mere moral suggestions to excite and aid that discretion, but not absolutely to control and govern it, then the language cannot and ought not to be held to create a trust. Now, words of recommendation and others precatory in their nature imply that every discretion as contradistinguished from peremptory orders, and therefore ought to be so construed, unless a different sense is irresistibly forced upon them by the context. Accordingly, in more modern times a strong disposition has been indicated not to extend this doctrine of recommendatory trusts, but as far as the authorities will allow, to give to the words of wills their natural and ordinary sense, unless it is clear that they are designed to be used in a peculiar sense." 2 Story Eq., § 1069; Harding v. Glynn, 2 White & Tudor's Equity Cases, 1833, and notes; Lesesne v. Witte, 5 S. C. 450.

The fourth clause is not in conflict with the construction that Mrs. Burns was a tenant for life of the property. In that the testator "having confidence that they will in all things consult the best interest of the family" gives to the executors the power "to dispose of or exchange the property as they think most advisable." We cannot suppose that by this he meant that the executors might dispose of the property, in the sense of consuming or spending it without accountability for the proceeds. That view is negatived by the words which follow in the same connection "or exchange." The third clause is in harmony with this construction, for it presupposes that the property will remain unexpended at the death of Leah, and in that event provides that "the property shall be sold and equal division made," etc.

The determination that Leah Burns took simply a life-estate substantially disposes of most of the other questions in the case. The principle is well established that the tenant for life is a trustee for the remaindermen, and, whilst entitled to the use, must preserve the estate in the same general condition in which he received it. The execution of the power given conferred a good title on the purchaser, and the purchase-money constituted the estate, and "so long as it can be traced and distinguished it will inure to the benefit of the cestui que trusts, and all claims of the creditors of the trustee must be postponed until the trust is discharged." McNeil v. Morrow, Rich. Eq. Cas. 172; 2 Wait A. & D. 449.

The homestead place was sold to E. G. Roberts for $2000 in currency—something less when reduced to a gold basis. What became of the money? It appears with reasonable certainty that $1000 went to pay for the White place. Mr. Gail*lard says that as the agent of White he sold the place. Thomas Burns asked him if it was for sale, and Cyrus Stephens, a son-in-law of Mrs. Burns, came and made the purchase. He paid $500 cash and gave a note of E. G. Roberts for $500, payable to Mrs. Burns as executrix. This made the purchase-money $1000. Another portion of the purchase-money, $400, was paid to Robert in liquidation of the note before referred to as given to him by his mother for services rendered before he married. It does not appear what became of the remainder of the purchase-money. The White place then became part of the corpus of the estate.

It is claimed, however, that at least $500 of the purchase-money was paid to Thomas by his mother, by virtue of her large powers under the will, for his long and faithful services in charge of her business and family. It really does seem as if in justice he should receive more than his equal share as compensation for his services. All agree that he was industrious, close, and faithful. No doubt the mother wished to compensate him, and most of his brothers and sisters seem willing that he should have it. But in strict law, according to the proper construction of the will, Mrs. Burns had no right to receive services and pay for them out of the corpus of the estate. She and her family were entitled merely to the usufruct, which was her only means of paying debts. Thomas chose to stay with her, and possibly he may have been compensated in the comfortable living he received or by the surplus of crops which he controlled; but if not it is his misfortune.

The same may be said as to Robert and the $400 of the purchase-money he received. In reference to him it is said that the complaint only asked partition of the White tract of land as part of the corpus of the estate, and the decree against Robert for the money cannot stand, as there is nothing in the complaint to sustain it. It is true the complaint did not specifically state this matter, for the reason probably that it was not known; but Robert was a party. He admitted that he got the money, and the third paragraph of the prayer for judgment did ask "that an accounting be had before W. W. Humphreys, master." This was enough to cover this particular matter as *an incident to the scope and general allegations of the complaint.

The objection is made that Alice J. McCreary, the sole plaintiff, cannot maintain this action, for the reason that she is not a child, but a grandchild of the testator, and as such not entitled to a distributive share under the will. The third clause of the will does not expressly declare that the division at the death of Mrs. Burns should be among his "children," but as in that clause he speaks of "sons" and "daughters," that was manifestly his intention. The children then living took a vested interest in remainder to be reduced to possession after the death of Mrs. Burns. Sarah Grogan, the mother of Alice, was then living, and took a vested interest in a child's share, which upon her death was transmitted to her only heir, Alice J. McCreary, the plaintiff. Bentley v. Long, 1 Strob. Eq. 43 [47 Am. Dec. 523].

It is further said that the plaintiff before her marriage received more than her mother's distributive share of the estate and therefore a recovery upon her part would be inequitable. If true, this is no matter for counter-claim or equitable set-off. It appears that her mother, Sarah Grogan, soon after her marriage died, leaving her an infant, and she was taken by her grandmother and reared in the family. It may be that in this way she enjoyed a support and maintenance furnished by her grandmother, at least in part, from services, which she is now unwilling to have paid out of the corpus of the estate; but she lived with her grandmother and Uncle Thomas by invitation, and they cannot now raise that voluntary support into a charge. It is not the province of the court to consider questions of gratitude or moral propriety, but to announce the law.

The statute of limitations is also pleaded. Without going into the general law upon this subject, it is enough to say that as against a remainderman the statute does not begin to run until the death of the life-tenant. Mrs. Burns died in 1876, and this action was brought in 1879. Mrs. McCreary was living with her grandmother in 1870, when the title to the White place was made to Thomas, and she went with her grandmother to live on that land with Thomas, where a short time *after she was married. There is proof that the matter of the ownership of the land was talked about in the family, she being present; but there is no proof that she ever agreed to or was consulted about the arrangement with Thomas and Robert, or bound herself not to make a claim for a share of the estate. Mere knowledge before the life-estate fell in would not put the statute in motion.

Mrs. McCreary is the sole plaintiff, none of the other remaindermen joining with her in the prayer for partition and account. On the contrary, it appears that Cyrus Stephens and his wife and probably others were consulted and agreed to the arrangement by which Thomas was paid by having the titles of the White place made to him, and Robert also by having his note paid. Such of the adult remaindermen as were consulted and agreed to the arrangement aforesaid should not now be allowed to disturb it or receive a part of the estate, when partitioned at the instance of the sole plaintiff, Alice J. McCreary. An inquiry upon this subject will be included in the order of reference.

After the death of Mrs. Burns the remaindermen stood as to each other as tenants in common, and the account for rents and profits of the land should be stated according to the principles announced in the case of Jones v. Massey, 14 S. C. 307.

The order of reference to the master should be so enlarged as to require him to report whether any of the adult remaindermen consented and agreed to the arrangement by which Robert Burns was paid his note and the White tract of land was conveyed to Thomas Burns, and if so which of them—with leave to report any special matter.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court, except as herein modified, be affirmed.

Before Hudson, J., Charleston, November, 1881.

Indictment against Edward Beadon. The report of the presiding judge was as follows: This indictment shows on its face jurisdiction in the Court of General Sessions, and concludes contra formam Statuti. The finding of the jury may be referred to either count of the indictment; to the first count, ignoring the attempt to kill, or to the second count simply. In either view it is sustained by a good count. Hence I declined the motion in arrest of judgment.

Mr. S. J. Lee, for appellant.

April 7, 1882. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. This was a prosecution for assault and battery. The indictment contained two counts. The first charged that the defendant committed an assault and battery upon one Caesar Dunning "with a deadly weapon, viz., a shovel, with intent to kill." The second simply charged an assault and battery with a shovel, in the usual form, without the intent to kill. The jury found the defendant "guilty of an aggravated assault and battery," who moved in arrest of judgment, and, that being overruled, appeals to this court upon the following exceptions:

*I. "Because his Honor erred in refusing to arrest the judgment on the ground that the indictment is fatally defective in that it does not charge the accused with committing an assault and battery of an aggravated nature.

II. "Because his Honor erred in refusing to arrest the judgment on the ground that the verdict of the jury finds the defendant 'guilty of an aggravated assault and battery,' of which offence the Court of General Sessions had no jurisdiction as appears on the face of the indictment."

We do not understand the point of the second exception, as the jury had the right to find the defendant guilty of "an aggravated assault and battery," unless it may be upon the view that the indictment did not sufficiently charge an offence of that character and therefore there was nothing to support the verdict. Assuming that to be the point made, the only question in the case is, whether the indictment contained the charge of an assault and battery of a high and aggravated nature.

Under our constitution and laws the offence of assault and battery is divided into two classes: Those which are not of a high and aggravated nature, of which trial justices have exclusive jurisdiction; and those which are of a high and aggravated nature, of which the Courts of General Sessions have exclusive jurisdiction. State v. McKettrick, 14 S. C. 347. The line of demarcation between the two classes has not been very clearly defined. Petty is distinguished from grand larceny by a fact easily ascertained—the value of the property stolen; but whether an assault and battery is of a high and aggravated nature does not depend upon any particular fact, but upon the character of the act itself, which must always, to a large extent, be matter of opinion and judgment. The combinations of circumstances which may enter into the offence are infinitely various, and therefore it is hard to establish a fixed rule upon the subject. The question is ever recurring as to the facts of different cases as they arise, and all that can be done is to indicate the general outline, which must be observed. Besides the uncertainty which arises from its resting in opinion, there is an additional source of confusion in the absence of provision as to whose judgment shall determine the matter. It is, however, neces*sary that the distinction should be maintained, as upon it depends the jurisdiction of the Court of General Sessions in regard to the offence of assault and battery, and we must draw the line as well as the nature of the subject will admit.

In the leading case upon the subject, that of McKettrick, cited above, the difficulties were foreseen, and the chief justice, whilst announcing the law, endeavored to give certainty to the practice by indicating some general rules upon the subject. It is decided in that case that the character of the charge is not to be determined conclusively by the trial justice, and it follows that the fact of the case being sent up to the Court of Sessions is not conclusive of the question. It was also determined that the indictment should contain something more than was necessary in the ordinary form of charging the offence, "that it should show on its face that the assault and battery charged is of a high and aggravated nature—serious bodily harm, intent to kill, intent to commit a felony, the use of a stick or deadly weapon, or something showing aggravation should appear."

In the case before us the indictment did not charge, in the language of the law, that the assault and battery committed was "of a high and aggravated nature." That was not necessary. The matter to be set out is the fact or facts which make it an assault of a high and aggravated nature, not the mere statement in words characterizing it as such. This indictment did charge in the first count that the assault and battery was committed "with a deadly weapon, viz., a shovel, with intent to kill," and in the second without the intent to kill. We do not think the judge committed error in ruling that "the verdict may be referred to either count: to the first count charging the attempt to kill, or to the second count simply. In either view it is sustained by a good count."

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

[This case is also cited in Ex parte Schmidt, 24 S. C. 366, without specific application.]

Before Hudson, J., Charleston, November, 1881.

The opinion of the court states all the matters that appear in the brief.

Mr. S. J. Lee, for appellant.

Mr. Solicitor Jervey, contra.

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. This was a prosecution for resisting an officer in the discharge of his duty, and for assault and battery.

There were three counts in the indictment: First, "That Prince Bowen, with force and arms, etc., in and upon one Samuel G. Gordon an assault did make, the said Samuel G. Gordon then and there being a peace officer, to wit, a policeman of the city of Charleston, an incorporated city in the county and state aforesaid, and then and there being in the lawful discharge of his duty as such policeman, and the said Prince Bowen then and there well knowing the said Samuel G. Gordon to be a policeman as aforesaid, and him the said Samuel G. Gordon then and there did beat, bruise, wound, and ill-treat, and did then and there resist, obstruct, hinder, and oppose the said Samuel G. Gordon in the discharge of his duty as said policeman, etc." The second count charged "an assault with a deadly weapon, to wit, a wooden piling, with the intent *him the said Samuel G. Gordon then and there to kill and murder;" and the third charged "an assault and battery with a wooden paling," omitting the charge of "intent to kill."

The evidence showed that Gordon was a policeman, and was acting without process, but in the discharge of his duty in keeping the peace, when the assault and battery was committed upon him. The jury rendered the following verdict: "We find the defendant guilty of resisting an officer and assault and battery." The defendant moved in arrest of judgment on the grounds stated in the exceptions. The circuit judge refused the motion, and sentenced him to one year at hard labor in the state penitentiary, and he now appeals to this court upon the following exceptions:

"1. Because his Honor erred in refusing to arrest the judgment on the ground that resisting an officer acting without process is not an indictable offence at common law, and has never been made criminal by any statute in South Carolina.

2. Because his Honor erred in refusing to arrest the judgment on the ground that the indictment is fatally defective in not alleging that the officer resisted was engaged in serving process.

3. Because his Honor erred in refusing to arrest the judgment on the ground that the indictment is fatally defective in that it does not charge the accused with committing an assault and battery of an aggravated nature.

The first and second exceptions make the point that a policeman in an incorporated city, which by authority of the legislature has the power to appoint police officers to preserve the peace and good order of the city, has not, without a process for that purpose first issued, the right to arrest a disorderly person in the act of disturbing the peace of said city, and in attempting to do so may be assaulted with impunity. All the offences which fall under the general head of "obstructing justice" are considered to be of a very grave and high character, for the *obvious reason that they strike at the very foundation of authority and government, and tend by the strong arm to defeat the administration of justice and to overthrow all peace and order. There is no doubt that it is a criminal offence to resist an officer in the discharge of his duty. "The resisting of judicial process is at all times an offence of a very high and presumptuous nature, but more particularly so when it is an obstruction of an arrest upon a criminal process." 4 Bl. Com. 129; State v. Sotherlen, Harp. 414; State v. Hailey, 2 Strob. 73; 1 Bish. on Crim. L., § 465.

It is said, however, that resisting an officer in the discharge of his duty means an officer authorized to arrest, and no one can be so authorized without he is armed with a warrant regularly issued. The law is very tender of the liberty of the citizen. The general rule certainly is that one shall not be arrested except by authority of a warrant issued by a proper officer upon information under oath. "It is fitting to examine upon oath any party requiring a warrant, to ascertain that there is a crime committed, without which no warrant should be granted." Gen. Stat. 196. But there are exceptions, growing for the most part out of the nature of the offence and the necessity for immediate action, which are as well established as the principle itself. Blackstone says there are four ways in which arrests may be made: by warrant, by an officer without warrant, by a private person without warrant, and by hue and cry. Our law provides that any trial justice "shall be authorized to command all persons who, in his view, may be engaged in violent and disorderly conduct to the disturbance of the peace, to desist therefrom, and to arrest any such person who shall refuse obedience to his command." Gen. Stat. 198. The same right is given to constables, Ib. 207. And the same right is given to the City Guard of Charleston. 12 Stat. 421.

But it is further urged that the case of a policeman in an incorporated city is not one of the officers who are authorized, either by the common law or the statute, to make such arrests without warrant. While the old writers do not,* in express terms, speak of police officers as among those who have the *right as conservators of the peace to make arrests without warrant, they do refer to a class of officers, conservators of the peace, as having that right. It is said in 1 East's Pleas of the Crown, 314, "With regard to such ministers of justice who in right of their offices are conservators of the peace, and in that right alone interpose in the case of riots and affrays, it is necessary, in order to make the offence of killing them amount to murder, that the parties concerned should have some notice of the intent with which they interpose. If the officer be within his proper district and known, or but generally acknowledged to bear the office he assumes; or if in order to keep the person he produces his staff of office or any other known ensign of authority," etc. This is a declaration of the rights of conservators of the peace, and we take it that when new officers of that class are created they come within the reason of the principle, and should have the same protection as those formerly existing.

Municipal corporations as now established by law are of comparatively modern origin. They are agencies to assist in the conduct of local civil government, and what the state constitutionally empowers them to do may be considered as done by the state. If they are authorized to create officers, as conservators of the peace, they are state officers within the limits of the authority given. Mr. Dillon, in his excellent work on Municipal Corporations, observes that "the office of a police officer is not known to the common law; it is created by statute, and such an officer has and can exercise only such powers as he is authorized to do by the legislature, expressly or derivatively. When police officers are by statute invested with all the powers of constables, or conservators of the peace, this gives them authority to arrest upon view intoxicated persons while guilty of disorderly conduct, or other persons violating the laws; and to detain them until they can be brought before a magistrate." 1 Dillon, § 149. And in a note it is said, "Power to a city corporation to make ordinances for the security or good order or government of the place, and to appoint or elect officers to carry out ordinances, authorizes the appointment of city guards or police officers or peace officers, and such officers may arrest without *a warrant persons engaged in breaches of the peace, when such a course is not repugnant to the general law of the state." Commonwealth v. Hastings, 9 Metc. 259; Bryan v. Bates, 15 Ill. 87; State v. Lafferty, 5 Harr. (Del.) 491; White v. Kent, 11 Ohio St., 550; 2 Whart. § 1295; Thompson v. State, 30 Ga. 430; City Council v. Payne, 2 N. & McC. 475.

In the last case cited, concerning an arrest in the city of Charleston by a policeman without warrant, our view is so well expressed that we simply adopt it. "From time immemorial constables and watchmen had authority without warrant to arrest those whom they saw engaged in an affray or breach of the peace, and to detain them until they should find proper sureties. This practice was not only sanctioned by the common law, but by the usage which I believe prevailed in all the large cities of the Union, without which a populous town must frequently be subjected to scenes of violence and disorder. I regarded the city guard, who were peace officers of the city, in the light of watchmen and constables, as possessing the same powers as those officers, and thought that an arrest by the guard was no greater infringement of the rights of the citizen than an arrest under similar circumstances by a constable or a watchman," etc.

We agree with the Circuit judge that the first count of the indictment described an offence cognizable in the Court of General Sessions, and it will therefore be unnecessary to consider the other grounds of appeal.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

17 S. C. 62

STATE v. SMALLS.

[1. Criminal Law, ¶93.]

An indictment charged in its first count an assault with a barrel-stave with intent to kill, and in its second count an assault and battery with a barrel-stave. Held, that the assault and assault and battery charged, were of a high and aggravated nature, and therefore within the jurisdiction of the Court of General Sessions.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 161; Dec. Dig. ¶93.]

[2. Assault and Battery ¶97.]

But a verdict on such indictment of "guilty of assault and battery" *convicts of no offence within the jurisdiction of the Court of General Sessions, and upon such verdict that court cannot pass sentence.

The words "of assault and battery" in the verdict qualify the meaning of the word "guilty," and cannot therefore be rejected as surplusage, so as to make the verdict a conviction of the offence charged in the indictment.

Before Hudson, J., Charleston, November, 1881.

Indictment against Prince Smalls. The opinion fully states the case. The report of the presiding judge was as follows:

This indictment is in due form, and charges an offence within the jurisdiction of the Court of General Sessions, setting forth the murderous intent and aggravated circumstances of the assault and battery. The proper construction of the verdict is that it finds the beating, etc., to have been done with the ugly weapon used, but not with the intent to kill. Such being the reasonable interpretation of the verdict, I refused the motion in arrest of judgment.

Mr. S. J. Lee, for appellant.

April 7, 1882. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. This was a prosecution for an assault and battery heard in this court in connection with that of Prince Bowen just decided (ante, p. 58). The indictment contained two counts. One charged that the defendant committed an assault upon one Kit Jackson "with a deadly weapon, viz., a barrel-stave, with intent to kill and murder," and the other with an assault and battery "with a barrel-stave," omitting the intent to kill. The jury found the defendant "guilty of assault and battery," and he was sentenced to six months at hard labor in the state penitentiary. The defendant moved to arrest the judgment, and that being refused, appeals to this court upon the following exceptions:

"1. Because his Honor erred in refusing to arrest the judgment on the ground that the indictment is fatally defective in *that it does not charge the accused with committing an assault and battery of an aggravated nature.

"2. Because his Honor erred in refusing to arrest the judgment on the ground that the verdict of the jury finds the defendant guilty only of assault and battery, of which offence the Court of General Sessions had no jurisdiction."

According to the decision just rendered in the case of the State v. Beadon (ante, p. 55), both the counts in this indictment stated circumstances of aggravation sufficient to bring them within the jurisdiction of the Court of General Sessions. The first charged two matters of aggravation: that the assault was committed with a barrel-stave, and also with intent to kill and murder. The second charged that an assault and battery was committed with a barrel-stave, but omitted the intent to kill.

Each charged an offence of a high and aggravated nature, and therefore the defendant's first exception is not well taken. State v. McKettrick, 14 S. C., 354.

There is more difficulty as to the second exception, that the verdict shows the jury only intended to convict the defendant of a common assault and battery without aggravation, of which offence the Court of General Sessions has no jurisdiction. It is one thing to charge an offence properly, and quite another to make it out and establish it by the verdict of a jury; and until both are done the accused cannot be legally punished. Two things are necessary: the indictment must show that an offence cognizable by the court is charged, and the verdict must show that the party has been convicted of such offence.

It is not allowable in criminal matters to charge one offence and convict of another. There are some cases in which a conviction for a lesser offence of the same character than that charged in the indictment will be sustained upon the principle that the whole includes all its parts. For example, where murder is charged a verdict for manslaughter will be sustained, but in all such cases the court has jurisdiction of both the greater and the smaller offence. That is not true as to assault and battery. This is not a case in which the whole includes all its parts; for the moment that there is a failure to establish the charge with aggravation, there is an entire failure and the case *falls out of the jurisdiction of the court. There is no doubt that if there had been another count in this indictment charging an assault and battery in the usual form without any circumstance of aggravation, it would have been bad. That was the very defect in the case of Mc-

Kettrick, supra, in which the judgment was arrested.

Now in the light of these principles what was established by the verdict of the jury—"We find the defendant guilty of assault and battery"? The natural meaning of the words is that the defendant had been guilty of an ordinary assault and battery without aggravation. If that is the proper construction (and we think it is), the verdict was not responsive to either of the counts in the indictment charging an assault and assault and battery with circumstances of aggravation, but the offence of common assault and battery was found, which was not charged, and if it had been, would not have been maintainable. If it had been a general verdict of "guilty," it might have been referred to any good count in the indictment, for in that case there would be a presumption that the jury spoke with reference to the record; or if it had been "guilty on first count" or "guilty on second count," it would have been good as to that count. The verdict cannot be referred to the first count, for the reason that it does not find "the intent to kill" and finds a battery; nor to the second count, as it negatives the aggravating matter therein charged of the use of "a deadly weapon, a barrel-stave."

The jury did not refer to either count or leave it to presumption to ascertain what they meant, but expressed it themselves—"guilty of assault and battery," that is to say, a common assault and battery. It was in effect a special verdict, and we cannot retain the word guilty and reject as surplusage the additional words "of assault and battery." It is only when a verdict before certain and valid has been cumbrered by the addition of useless matter, not qualifying the previous meaning, that the addition can be rejected as surplusage. In an action to recover a penalty imposed by an ordinance of the City Council of Charleston for keeping spirituous liquors without a license in certain places mentioned in the ordinance, *the declaration to meet the terms of the ordinance charged the offence variously in different counts. The jury found the defendant "guilty of having liquor in the back shop." Held, that the words immediately connected with "guilty" could not be rejected as surplusage, and that the verdict as it stood did not find the defendant guilty of violating the ordinance.

In general verdicts, modo et forma, being merely technical words, may be supplied; if, however, after supplying technical words the intention of the jury be left doubtful, the verdict is insufficient. City Council v. Weikman, 2 Speers, 374, citing 11 Pick. 45; [Patterson v. United States] 2 Wheat. 221 [4 L. Ed. 224]. In that case Judge Wardlaw said, "The certainty essential to that ascertainment of fact upon which judgment is to be pronounced has not been attained. Any doubt left after reasonable construction must arrest the judgment; any reasonable construction infers that the mention of one of the several particulars is the exclusion of others, that part of a whole adopted is the rejection of the remainder, and that material omissions occurring have been intentional."

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed.

17 S. C. 66

DEVEREUX v. CHAMPION COTTON PRESS COMPANY.

[1. Trial ¶191.]

In an action for damages for obstructing a public street, and for other acts injuriously affecting the plaintiff's property, the Circuit judge committed no error in refusing to charge "that the measure of the damages in this case should be the loss of rent sustained by the plaintiff by reason of the abandonment of his premises by his tenant, caused by the wrongful acts of defendants," for it assumed the existence of facts then in issue before the jury.

[2. Trial ¶233.]

Where the facts are in dispute they should be hypothetically stated in requests to charge upon propositions of law involved in their consideration.

[3. Appeal and Error ¶1068; Damages ¶217.]

And, moreover, the verdict for defendant was a finding that no injury had been done to the plaintiff's property, and it is now immaterial whether there was error in the judge's charge as to the measure of damages.

[4. Appeal and Error ¶1032.]

The rule governing the correction of errors of law requires two things *to be made clear by the party alleging error: 1, that some erroneous ruling has been made; 2, that he has been prejudiced thereby as to the merits of his case.

[5. Damages ¶217.]

But the pleadings having raised the issue of nuisance and injury to the plaintiff's property, and the judge having instructed the jury that the true measure of the damages is the injury to the plaintiff's property, to which interest might be added, he did not entirely take away from the jury the consideration of loss of rent as an element in the injury, and therefore committed no error in refusing a charge which made the loss of rent the exclusive basis of a verdict of damages.

[6. Damages ¶117.]

The mode of estimating damages in cases of tort is different from that in cases of contract. In the latter the consequences of a breach can be generally ascertained by calculation, but not so in the former.

Before Kershaw, J., Charleston, July, 1881.

This was an action by John H. Devereux against the Champion Cotton Press Company, commenced January 10, 1879. The case was once before in this court on appeal, and will be found reported in 14 S. C. 396. The opinion of the court, together with the judge's charge, fully states the case.

The charge of the judge, omitting points having no bearing upon the case presented to this court, was as follows:

In cities where great works have been erected and carried on, which are the means of promoting the public welfare, persons are not to be encouraged to stand upon their extreme rights, and to bring actions in respect of every matter of annoyance, as, if that were done, business would be seriously obstructed and the general interests would suffer. The injury, therefore, in such cases must be real, tangible, and must be capable of estimation and of compensation. It must not be fanciful, trivial, or a matter of fastidious taste. All persons have a right to use the streets for the purpose of receiving and removing their goods, and no temporary obstruction of the streets will be improper or illegal if due diligence was used.

The jury cannot take into consideration anything which occurred since the 10th January, 1879, though that evidence might tend somewhat, when coupled with the evidence of how the business was carried on before, to lead the jury to believe *that that was the habitual mode of conducting the business. The damages must be confined to compensation for the impaired value of the property of the plaintiff, if you find for the plaintiff. In no case could the verdict go beyond the value of that property. If the defendants stored cotton in violation of the city ordinances, and the plaintiff suffered any damage to his property in consequence thereof, he is entitled to recover to the extent of such damage. The testimony of the clerk of the city council does establish that the city gave the authority to the defendants to establish a cotton press in the place where it was afterwards established, and would have the same effect as if they had given a formal license.

The storing of cotton within the limits of the city of Charleston south of Calhoun and west of East Bay streets is unlawful, and in itself constitutes a nuisance; and if any damage resulted, in violation of that law by these defendants, to the plaintiff's property, the plaintiff is entitled to recover to the extent of such damage. The evidence must satisfy you, however, that they did violate that law; that the ordinance which prohibits the storage of cotton within the limits mentioned was violated; and if you find for the plaintiff on that ground you must find that they did not only pursue the business of a Cotton Press Company, but stored cotton there as a business. You have heard the testimony. You will first determine whether they did store cotton; and, if they did, was it in a building such as was authorized by the ordinance.

The jury has simply to find whether the property of the plaintiff has been injured by the wrongful acts of the defendants; and, second, to what extent it has been injured.

The plaintiff requests the court to charge "that the measure of the damages in this case should be the loss of rent sustained by the plaintiff, by reason of the abandonment of his premises by his tenant, caused by the wrongful acts of the defendants, and the difference between the value of his, the plaintiff's, property before and the depreciated value of the property since the commission of the acts complained of."

I have charged you adversely to that proposition. I think the true measure of damages is the injury to the plaintiff's *property. I don't think we can go into the matter of what rents might have been received. If you find for the plaintiff the extent of the damage to his property, you may add to that a computation of the interest from the time of such injury up to the present time. The plaintiff is entitled to recover the impaired value, if any, of his property, and such interest as would be proper to compensate him if he is entitled to recover at all.

Messrs. McCrady & Son, for appellant.

His Honor erred in withdrawing from the jury the loss of rent as an element of damages, as the action was based upon such loss and there was no other testimony as to damages before the jury. The question of rent being withdrawn, there was nothing left for the jury to base a verdict upon, and the charge was therefore equivalent to a direction to find for the defendant. The weight of authority clearly shows that the loss of rent should be considered as an element of damages. Abb. Tr. Evid. 643, ¶ 9; 4 Wait Act. and Def. 777; 53 N. Y. 155; 67 N. Y. 270; 9 Wend. 326; 55 N. Y. 664; 2 Speers, 550; Wood Nuis. 887. Where the injury complained of is transient, and capable of being removed by the abatement of the nuisance, then the measure of damages must be the loss of rental value during the continuance of the nuisance.

Messrs. Simonton & Barker and S. Lord, Jr., contra.

April 7, 1882. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice MCGOWAN. This was an action against the Champion Cotton Press Company for injury to the value of a house and lot belonging to the plaintiff, alleged to arise from the operation of the machinery of the company and the manner in which they conducted their business. The plaintiff owned a house and lot on the east side of Cumberland street in the city of Charleston, which was leased to one Guillemín. About 1875 the defendant corporation erected in the neighborhood of the said house and lot a steam cotton-press and warehouse, and has since carried on the business of pressing cotton by ma*chinery driven by steam, called a "steam cotton-press." The plaintiff alleged that the defendant corporation in prosecuting their business blocked Cumberland street with cotton bales, and "still continues so to do, and impedes and sometimes completely obstructs the passage of vehicles and persons in the street, and by which means the said dwelling-house and store of the plaintiff was and is subjected to increased risk of fire and thereby rendered insecure, unsafe, uncomfortable, and of less value, and by reason thereof the said Guillemín had abandoned the said house as a tenant. That plaintiff has not been able to lease the same. That said defendant had rendered the said buildings unfit for business as a store or habitation as a dwelling-house, to the nuisance of the plaintiff and to his great damage ten thousand dollars;" and prays that the defendant corporation should be enjoined from continuing said nuisance and for damages already sustained ten thousand dollars, etc. The corporation denied all unlawful conduct on their part in the use of their own property, and all damage alleged to have been sustained by the plaintiff caused by the operation of their cotton-press.

The case was heard by Judge Kershaw. On the trial, evidence was introduced by the plaintiff tending to sustain the allegations of the complaint, and also the loss of rent by the plaintiff in consequence of the abandonment of the premises in question by his tenant, caused by the danger, annoyance, and inconvenience arising from the erection of the steam press, and by the conduct of business by the defendant and by the inability of the plaintiff to obtain other tenants at an adequate rent in consequence of the same; which evidence on the other hand was met by the defendant with evidence tending to prove the contrary, and to show that the plaintiff had suffered no such loss in consequence of such abandonment of the premises by his tenant, nor by such danger, annoyance, and inconvenience, nor by his inability, in consequence thereof, to obtain other tenants.

Upon this evidence the case went to the jury. The judge was requested by plaintiff's counsel to charge certain propositions of law, and he charged as requested in every particular *except one hereafter referred to. The jury found for the defendant. The plaintiff moved for a new trial, and that being refused, he appeals to this court upon the single exception, "Because his Honor refused to charge the jury as the plaintiff requested, 'that the measure of the damages in this case should be the loss of rent sustained by the plaintiff by reason of the abandonment of his premises by his tenants, caused by the wrongful acts of defendants, and the difference between the value of his, the plaintiff's, property before and the depreciated value of the property since the commission of the acts complained of.'"

This request in the terms proposed the judge declined; but he did charge as follows: "I have charged you adversely to that proposition. I think the true measure of the damages is the injury to the plaintiff's property. I do not think we can go into the matter of what rents have been received. If you find for the plaintiff the extent of the damages to his property, you may add to that a computation of the interest from the time of such injury up to the present time. The plaintiff is entitled to recover for the impaired value, if any, of his property and such interest as would be proper to compensate him, if he is entitled to recover at all."

The latter part of the request does not seem to be in entire unison with the first part. If the judge charged that the difference between the value of the plaintiff's property before and since the commission of the acts complained of was the proper measure of damages, it could not be that the loss of rent alone could constitute that measure. No objection, it seems, is made to the charge in regard to the latter part of the request, but the complaint is that he did not also charge the first part, claiming, as we understand it, that the measure of damages should be the loss of rent up to the time of trial, and after that the depreciation in the property. In no view of the case could the judge have charged the first part of the request in the terms stated, for it took for granted that the rent was lost, and by the illegal acts of defendant, which were both questions of fact for the jury. If, in directing attention to propositions of law, such charges are not carefully put upon a *statement of facts hypothetical in character, the facts involved in the proposition seem to be assumed as true. Thomp. Char. Jur., § 47.

The verdict was for the defendant, which indicates that in the judgment of the jury no injury had been done. In the question submitted to the jury two propositions were involved: first, whether the press of the defendant corporation was a nuisance; if not, then there was an end to the matter. But if it was, then, second, what injury, if any, had it inflicted upon the property of the plaintiff. If, in considering these distinct propositions in their order, the jury never reached the subject of damages and it did not enter into their verdict, it would seem to be immaterial now whether there was error in the judge's charge as to the measure of damages. "The rule governing the correction of errors at law requires that two things be made clear by the party alleging error: first, that some erroneous ruling has been made; and, second, that he has been prejudiced thereby as to the merits of his case." Trotter v. Robinson, 6 S. C. 410.

As the question of damages was secondary, and could not arise until the question of injury had been determined in the affirmative, and the verdict was generally for the defendant, it is not clearly perceived how the plaintiff was prejudiced, even if the judge committed error in indicating the mode of ascertaining the damages in case there should be a recovery. In the case of O'Brien & Fryer v. Bound et al., 2 Speers, 501 [42 Am. Dec. 384], it was held that "the jury having found the contract of the defendants to be joint, the charge of the presiding judge that the jury might find against one, even if a misdirection was immaterial, as it could not have influenced the verdict." Vide [State v. Resolved Slack] 1 Bailey, 330; [Peoples v. Smith] 8 Rich. 103; 3 John. 533; 10 John. 451.

The plaintiff makes no other complaint against the charge than as to the mode suggested for measuring the damages; but he insists that, this being a case in which damages were the essence of the action, the charge as to the mode in which they should be ascertained was in such terms as to confuse the jury and induce a verdict for the defendant, and therefore was error in law affecting the main point of the case. It must be kept in *mind that the judge did not exclude but admitted the evidence as to rents. In charging the jury he said: "I think the true measure of damages is the injury to the plaintiff's property. I don't think we can go into the matter of what rents have been received. If you find for the plaintiff the extent of the damage to the property, you may add to that a computation of the interest from the time of such injury to the present time," etc. Was there any error in this? That must depend to a large extent upon the nature of the action and the issue joined.

This was not an action against the corporation for a breach of contract, but for a tort, in so using their property as to injure that of their neighbor. It is true statements are made in the complaint alleging a contract with a certain tenant to lease plaintiff's house and lot, which he abandoned, but the defendant corporation was not privy to that. The extent of their liability was the injury to the plaintiff's property resulting from their unlawful acts. The mode of estimating damages in cases of tort is different from that in cases of contract. In the latter the consequences can be ascertained generally by estimating the benefit the party would have received from the performance of the contract, but not so as to the former class.

As Mr. Wood expresses it: "In the case of a contract, the measure of damages is much more strictly confined than in cases of tort. As a general rule, the primary and immediate result of the breach of contract can alone be looked to. The principle seems to be, that in matter of contract the damages to which the party is liable for its breach ought to be in proportion to the benefit he is to receive from its performance. * * * Actions for tort are governed by a far looser principle. Torts are divided into two classes—injuries to the property and to the person or character. The difference is, that in cases of contract and in some cases of tort to property a rule can be applied to the facts so accurately as to make the amount a mere matter of calculation. In the other class of offences the rule goes no further than to point out what evidence may be admitted and what grounds of complaint may be allowed for. But when this is done the amount of damages is entirely in the disposition of the jury." Woods Mayne on Damages, Sect. *11, 47. The following cases cited and relied on by plaintiff were cases for breach of contract: Dewint v. Wiltsie, 9 Wend. 326; Ruff v. Rinaldo, 55 N. Y. 664; Tappans & Noble v. Harwood, 2 Speers, 550.

The judge charged "that the measure of damages was injury to the plaintiff's property. The plaintiff is entitled to recover for the impaired value, if any, of his property, and such interest as would be proper to compensate him." Did that not fairly cover the whole ground both before and after the trial, "from the time of such injury up to the present time"? Taking the whole charge together, we do not see that he took from the jury entirely the consideration of the rents, which was only one kind of evidence of injury. "Injury to the plaintiff's property" was more comprehensive, and covered all the elements that entered into the quantum of the jury. The general included all the particulars.

The jury, being told that it was for them to estimate that injury with the right to add interest as damages, were thereby authorized to consider "injury" of all kinds not only in annual rental, but deterioration from any cause. Whilst the alleged loss of rents under the charge might be considered along with other evidence upon the subject of general injury, the judge informed the jury that they could not go into the matters of rent as the exclusive basis of their verdict. Proof of loss of rent was admitted, but as the only evidence of injury to the property it was not only inadequate but unreliable. The loss of rent might arise from various causes other than the proximity of the cotton-press. In particular localities in cities it sometimes happens that rents rise or fall from causes which are difficult to understand.

The complaint did state matters of agreement between the plaintiff and his tenant in regard to the house and lot in question, but with that, as before stated, the defendant corporation had nothing to do. It may be true also that the plaintiff limited his testimony to the matter of rents and the alleged cause of their falling off, but the issue made by the pleadings was broader than that: "The said defendant has rendered the said buildings unfit for business as a store or habitation as a *dwelling-house, to the nuisance of the plaintiff and to his great damage ten thousand dollars, wherefore the said plaintiff demands damages in the sum of ten thousand dollars already sustained by the plaintiff in the premises." The plaintiff's objection amounts substantially to this, that in the matter of measuring the damages the jury were allowed too wide a latitude, although that latitude was not inconsistent with the nature of the case or the issue made in the record.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

BARRON v. DENT.

[1. Judgment ⇨291.]

Quære: Will the filing of the original proceedings before a trial justice in the clerk's office make the justice's judgment a judgment of the Circuit Court?

[5. Evidence ¶158.]

The Circuit judge, upon an inspection of a trial-justice's book of civil cases, seeing that it contained only entries of indorsements upon the original papers, which were already in evidence, rejected the book as testimony. In this there was no error.

Before Pressley, J., Richland, July, 1881.

Action for partition instituted by Jacob T. Barron against Alice Dent and others, heirs at law of Samuel Dent, deceased. The plaintiff purchased the interest of James M. Dent, the *other heir at law of Samuel, at sheriff's sale in 1881, under the judgment of Gooding & Son against J. M. Dent obtained in December, 1880, and also claimed title under an execution of Stokes v. J. M. Dent then in the sheriff's office, issued in November, 1876, for $94.32, under transcript (or rather original proceedings) lodged in the clerk's office same day—the original judgment having been obtained before a trial justice in December, 1874. The deed of James M. Dent to the other heirs of Samuel Dent, in consideration of an indebtedness to the estate of Samuel in excess of his distributive share, was executed and recorded in January, 1880.

After the testimony was taken before the Circuit judge the case was submitted to him without argument. After a statement of the case his decree was as follows: The validity of the plaintiff's title rests upon the validity of the Stokes judgment. This was a judgment of an inferior tribunal, and "if the proceedings show upon their face a want of jurisdiction, or fail to show that which was necessary to confer jurisdiction, the whole is an absolute nullity." An inspection of the record offered fails to show that the said James M. Dent was ever served with the summons or otherwise brought within the jurisdiction of the court rendering the judgment against him. This defect the plaintiff proposed to remedy, and offered to prove by a witness that the said James M. Dent voluntarily appeared at the trial upon which judgment was rendered against him. The plaintiff was not permitted to prove such appearance by parol, and the record of the trial justice offered failing to show that the party against whom the judgment in question was rendered was ever brought within the jurisdiction of the trial justice, the judgment was a nullity, and could therefore lend no aid in perfecting a sale otherwise ineffectual to pass the title herein sought to be enforced.

It is therefore ordered, adjudged, and decreed, that the complaint be dismissed with costs.

Other matters, and also the points raised by the exceptions, are fully stated in the opinion.

Mr. W. H. Lyles, for appellant.

Mr. Justice McIVER. This was an action for partition of real estate, which belonged to one Samuel Dent at the time of his death. The plaintiff's claim rested upon an alleged purchase by him at sheriff's sale of the interest of James M. Dent, one of the heirs of Samuel Dent, while the defendants, who were the other heirs, claimed the same interest under a deed from said James M. Dent. The interest of James M. Dent in the land was levied on and sold by the sheriff under an execution in favor of A. F. Gooding & Son against James M. Dent, but it appeared that prior to the recovery of the judgment upon which this execution was issued the said James M. Dent had conveyed all his interest in the land to the defendants.

The plaintiff then sought to sustain his claim by an alleged judgment recovered by one M. A. Stokes against James M. Dent prior to the date of said conveyance, and the question made by this appeal is as to the validity of the Stokes judgment. This purported to be a judgment recovered before a trial justice, a transcript of which was lodged in the clerk's office and execution issued thereon. The case was tried before the judge without a jury; and as it did not appear from an inspection of what was called the judgment roll, which had been filed in the clerk's office as the transcript of the judgment, that the defendant therein had ever been served with process, he held that the alleged judgment was a nullity, inasmuch as the proceedings failed to show on their face that the trial justice had acquired jurisdiction of the person of the defendant therein.

The plaintiff offered parol evidence to show that the defendant in the case before the trial justice had voluntarily appeared and thereby waived the necessity for service; but this evidence was rejected, and this is relied upon as one of the grounds of appeal. It seems also that the book kept by the trial justice was offered in evidence, but it was conceded that this showed nothing more than the indorsements on the original summons found in the judgment roll. The indorsements on the summons showed the taxation of costs, and among the items were charges for "hearing," "for examining one witness," for "one subpoena writ," and for constable's costs. There was also an indorsement, not signed by any one, however, in the following language: "I have served the defendant with a copy of the within summons. 21st November, 1874"—which seems to have been the date of the original summons.

The appellant contends, first, that after the transcript was filed in the clerk's office it became a judgment of the Court of Common pleas, a court of general jurisdiction, and therefore that it was not necessary that all the jurisdictional facts should appear affirmatively upon the record. Waiving the inquiry whether the filing of the original proceedings before the trial justice in the clerk's office was a compliance with the provisions of the code authorizing the filing of a transcript of a trial justice's judgment in the clerk's office, and thereby imparting to it the character and efficiency of a judgment of the Superior Court, it is sufficient here to say that before such a transcript can be filed in the clerk's office there must be a valid judgment of the trial justice, and if the trial justice never acquired jurisdiction over the person of the defendant, then the so-called judgment was a nullity—and no transcript of it could impart any vitality to it.

Second. Next it is contended that the Circuit judge erred in not finding that the proceedings before the trial justice did show that the defendant therein had been served with the summons. This ground rests upon the position that the unsigned indorsement, copied above, was sufficient to show that the summons had been served by the trial justice himself, inasmuch as one of the witnesses, who was the clerk of the trial justice, testified that all the indorsements on the summons were made by him, in the presence and under the direction of the trial justice; and it was therefore argued that it was the same in substance as if the trial justice had signed this indorsement and thereby declared that he had served the defendant with a copy of the summons. But even assuming this to be true, improbable as it appears, yet the law requires that where process is served by a person other than the sheriff, proof of such service shall be made by the affidavit of the person making the service, and hence his mere certificate will not answer.

Third. Again, the appellant contends that the fact that the defendant appeared and made a defence may be inferred from the indorsements upon the summons, showing that there was a hearing and examination of witnesses, which would not have been necessary if the defendant had not appeared. But Subdivision 8 of Sec. 90 of the code of procedure expressly provides that "in case a defendant does not appear and answer, the plaintiff cannot recover without proving his case." The provision in the next subdivision cannot be regarded as nullifying the provision of the preceding subdivision, but must be construed in connection with it, and its terms show that it does not apply to a case of default, but to a case where the other party appears.

Fourth. The appellant's next position is that it was error to exclude the book of the trial justice. Practically this was not done. The case was being heard by the judge, and inasmuch as, upon inspection of this book, it was found that the book showed nothing more than the indorsements on the original summons, he rejected it as unnecessary, and in this there was no error.

Fifth. Finally, the appellant contends that there was error in excluding the parol evidence offered to show that the defendant appeared at the trial and defended the case. It is quite true that "a voluntary appearance of a defendant is equivalent to personal service of the summons upon him" (Code, Sec. 162). If, therefore, it had appeared that the pleadings in this case were in writing, and that the defendant had put in an answer, or if the pleadings were oral and the book required to be kept by the trial justice, "wherein he shall insert all his proceedings in each case by its title, showing the commencement, progress, and termination thereof" (Gen. Stat., Ch. XXV., Sec. 41), had shown that the defendant had appeared, that would have been sufficient to show that the trial justice had acquired jurisdiction, even in the absence of any evidence that the summons had been served on the defendant or that he had given a written admission of service.

*But where the proceedings before the trial justice, either as exhibited in the original papers, or in the book which the law requires him to keep, which, in the case of Cherry v. McCants, 7 S. C. 224, is declared to be the highest and best evidence of the proceedings before him, fail to show jurisdiction, we do not think it is competent to show by parol evidence the fundamental jurisdictional fact that the party had, by service of summons or by voluntary appearance, been brought within the jurisdiction of the trial justice. That fact must appear upon the proceedings, otherwise the whole is a nullity. This doctrine has long been established (Devall v. Taylor, Cheves, 5) and has been recently recognized and affirmed in the State, ex rel. McCall, v. Cohen, 13 S. C. 201.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

STATE, ex relatione RICHLAND COUNTY, v. COLUMBIA.

[1. Courts ⇨1.]

The right and duty of performing acts involving judgment and discretion do not constitute the officer or body so acting a court, which is a tribunal empowered to hear and determine issues between parties upon pleadings and evidence, according to settled principles of law. Hence a municipal corporation invested with power to grant licenses for the sale of liquors is not thereby made a court.

[This case is also cited in Blake v. Walker, 23 S. C. 525, and distinguished therefrom.]

This was a rehearing of the judgment rendered by this court in State, ex relatione Richland County, v. Columbia, reported in 16 S. C. 412. It was an application for a writ of prohibition to prohibit the city council of Columbia from issuing any licenses to liquor-dealers until after payment by them of $100 to the county treasurer, according to the terms of the act of December 24, 1880 (17 Stat. 460). The city of Columbia took the position that under the act of 1879 (17 Stat. 69) this act did not go into operation until January 13, 1881, and did not therefore affect licenses granted January 1, 1881.

Mr. J. R. Abney, for the relator.

Mr. F. W. McMaster, contra.

Mr. Justice McIVER. The counsel for the relator has been permitted to argue a motion for a rehearing in this case, not because the court entertained any doubt as to the correctness of its original decision, but because that decision turned upon a question of jurisdiction which was not raised and not argued at the former hearing.

The argument on behalf of the relator rests upon the ground that because the act which is sought to be restrained is an act of a judicial nature it must necessarily be regarded as the act of a court, and therefore this court would have original jurisdiction to issue the writ asked for. It does not follow, however, that a judicial act can only be performed by a court. There is no reason why the legislature may not entrust the performance of acts of a judicial nature to persons and bodies corporate who do not constitute one of the courts of the state; and it is the constant habit to do so.

The legislature has at various times conferred upon clerks, sheriffs, and many other officers the power to perform judicial acts, in the sense that they involve the exercise of judgment and discretion; and we do not understand that it was ever supposed that such officers were thereby constituted courts. Indeed, in one sense every ordinance passed by a municipal corporation and every act of the general assembly is a judicial act in that it involves the exercise of judgment and discretion, and it would lead to very extraordinary and anomalous results to hold that whenever a person or corporation is invested with power to perform a judicial act, in the sense above indicated, that such person or corporation is thereby constituted one of the courts of this state.

There is necessarily involved in the idea of a court that of a tribunal empowered to hear and determine issues between parties, upon pleadings, either oral or written, and upon evidence to be adduced under well-defined and established rules, according to settled principles of law. It does not seem to us that the granting of a license to sell spirituous liquors involves any such idea. That power might just as well have been conferred upon the mayor of the city, the clerk of the court, or any other officer; indeed, as matter of fact, the legislature has conferred a similar power—that of granting licenses to hawkers and peddlers—upon the clerk of the court.

Again, the city council of Columbia have, by the charter of the city, been constituted a court, but not a court of general jurisdiction. Their jurisdiction as a court is defined and limited to the trial of persons for violating any of the ordinances of the city, and we do not see that the charter constitutes them a court, in the sense of that term as used in the constitution, for any other purpose. Hence when the city council of Columbia grant a license for the sale of spirituous liquors, or do any other act permitted by the charter, they do not act as a court, even though such act may be of a judicial nature, in the sense that involves the exercise of judgment or discretion.

But even if we could hold that the city council act as a court in granting or refusing a license for the sale of spirituous liquors, we think there would be another insuperable objection to our granting the writ prayed for. Whether the Court of Common Pleas can issue a writ of prohibition to an inferior court for any other purpose than to keep it within its jurisdiction need not now be considered, and as there is some conflict of authority upon that question, we do not propose at this time to express any opinion, but we are satisfied that this court can only issue a writ of prohibition to an inferior court for the purpose of keeping it within the limits of its jurisdiction, and not for the purpose of correcting or preventing any error of law in the exercise of its admitted powers.

The powers of this court are defined in the constitution, Art. IV., § 4, and, as has been said in Ex parte Childs, 12 S. C. 117, its jurisdiction embraces four classes of powers: 1st, appellate jurisdiction in cases of chancery; 2d, the correction of errors at law under such regulations as the general assembly may prescribe; 3d, the power to issue certain specified writs; 4th, the power to issue "such other original and remedial writs as may be necessary to give it a general supervisory control over all other courts in this state."

It will be observed that the jurisdiction for the correction of errors at law is not given in general and absolute terms, like its appellate jurisdiction in cases of chancery, but it is "under such regulations as the general assembly may by law prescribe;" and as it is not pretended that the general assembly has prescribed any regulations by which this court can, through the medium of a writ of prohibition, correct errors of law committed by an inferior court, it would seem to be clear that this court has no jurisdiction to issue the writ for that purpose, but can only do so for the purpose of exercising some supervisory control over the court to which the writ is issued. Now the power to issue the writ for the purpose of exercising supervisory control cannot be construed to embrace the power to correct mere errors of law, for that would be a repetition of the power already conferred in the second class of powers. It must, therefore, be regarded as a power to do just what the word "control" implies—that is, to keep all other courts in the state within the limits assigned to them, so that no one of them may be allowed to overstep the jurisdiction committed to it.

prevent the exercise of a power not committed to the city council, but to correct an alleged error of law in the construction of a statute. The power to grant licenses is undoubtedly conferred upon the city council, and the only question raised by the relator is whether there has been an error of law in the exercise of this admitted power. The language of the act of 1880, (17 Stat. 460) is as follows: "No license for the sale of intoxicating liquors shall be granted by any municipal authorities in any city, town, or village in this state, except upon the payment, by the person applying for the same, to the treasurer of the county in which such city, town, or village is situated, [of] the sum of one hundred dollars;" and in the general law (15 Stat. 797) other conditions are prescribed.

The result is that municipal authorities being invested with power to grant licenses upon certain conditions, they must necessarily determine whether the required conditions have been complied with, and having this power they must necessarily have the jurisdiction to decide, first, what are the conditions prescribed, and, second, whether they have been complied with; and any error they may commit, either of law or fact, cannot be corrected or prevented by a writ of prohibition issuing out of this court, for they are simply undertaking to exercise a power conferred upon them, and cannot be said to have exceeded their jurisdiction, even though they may have erred in deciding upon a matter the decision of which was entrusted to them, as to which, however, we express no opinion.

The judgment of this court is that the motion for a rehearing be refused and that the petition be dismissed.

ARCHER v. MUNDAY.

[1. Partition ¶91.]

Testator directed his lands to be divided by commissioners equally between his daughter A and the children of his son B, to them and their heirs forever. The commissioners made the division and assessed a sum of money to be paid by A to equalize the partition. Held, that the payment of this assessment was not necessary to enable A to recover from a stranger in possession the part assigned to her.

[2. Limitation of Actions ¶70.]

*The action for recovery having been brought long after the assessment laid, and more than four years after the children attained their majority, the debt of A was barred by the statute of limitations.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Limitation of Actions, Cent. Dig. § 386; Dec. Dig. ¶70.]

The title of A to this land was clearly not equitable; if not a devisee, she was certainly an heir at law.

[4. Ejectment ¶15.]

The facts, circumstances, and pleadings of this case show that the testator of plaintiff was the common source of title of both parties to the action, beyond whom plaintiff need not go in proving her title.

[5. Wills ¶531.]

The devise in this case, taken together with a subsequent clause giving the residue of his property to trustees for his son B, to be fully possessed and enjoyed by B for life, and after his death such property "with the lands already specified to his children, to them and their heirs forever, discharged of the trust," shows testator's intention to have been that A should have a moiety, and that the division was not to be per capita.

[6. Estoppel ¶27.]

If A had received property under her husband's will (a fact not established by the evidence), it would not estop her from recovering her land of inheritance from a stranger who held under deed of the husband with general warranty.

Action by Frances E. Archer against William R. Munday, commenced August 11, 1879.

It appears from the brief that James M. Calvert had three small children in 1846, and therefore the youngest of them must have attained his majority not later than 1867. The fourth clause of testator's will is given in full in the opinion. The eighth clause was as follows:

"I give, devise, and bequeath to William Hill, my grandson, and Robert A. Archer, my executors, hereinafter named, under the trusts hereinafter set forth, the negroes Charles, Sarah, Anaca, and Edy, Jr., with their future increase. Also an equal share of the rest and residue of my estate which may remain for final distribution at the settlement of my estate upon my decease. To be held by them or the survivor of them and their heirs or successors, in trust for the use of my son, James M. Calvert, they permitting him to use, possess, and enjoy the same as fully and freely as if the same were given to him absolutely, but not to be at his disposal or liable to seizure for his debts or contracts; and after the death of my said son, James M. Calvert, I give, devise, and bequeath all the aforesaid property with the lands already specified to his children, to them and their heirs forever, discharged of the trust."

Other matters are fully stated in the opinion.

*Mr. T. P. Cothran, for appellant.

Messrs. M. P. De Bruhl and S. C. Cason, contra.

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. This was an action to recover a tract of land in Abbeville county. The plaintiff claimed by a will of her father, who died in 1846. The defendant held a deed from one Geo. Nickles, who was the grantee of Robert A. Archer, the husband of the plaintiff. This deed was executed in 1849, and upon it the plaintiff had renounced her dower. Archer, the husband, died in 1873.

The clauses of the will of plaintiff's father under which she claimed are as follows: "My will is that the remainder of my lands, supposed to be about three hundred and sixty acres, be equally divided between my daughter Frances E. Archer and the children of my son James M. Calvert, to them and their heirs forever. My will is further, as it respects my lands, that three disinterested persons be appointed by the Court of Ordinary for the district in which the premises lie, to go upon the lands and point out such lines of demarcation according to the quantity specified, taking into view situation and timbered lands, as may be best suited to the interests of all concerned."

Shortly after the death of the testator three commissioners, appointed as the will directed, went upon the lands and divided it into two parts, one of which, containing one hundred and eighty-three and one fourth acres, was allotted to the plaintiff, then the wife of Robert A. Archer.

In the assignment to the plaintiff the commissioners assessed the plaintiff $120.75, to be paid by her to the children of her brother, James M. Calvert. This is the land now in dispute. There was no direct evidence before the court that this assessment had been paid. The plaintiff herself was examined, but could not say positively whether it had or not. The court held that from the lapse of time, more than thirty years, it might be presumed paid.

There was evidence that the plaintiff was in possession of a house and lot in Abbeville, worth some $2,000 or $2,500, under the will of her husband, over which, however, there was a judgment in favor of Robert Archer's brother for some $3,000. This judgment had not been enforced, from leniency to the widow. It further appeared that she has been assigned a homestead in personalty to the amount of $262.

At the close of plaintiff's testimony defendant moved for a nonsuit, on the grounds, 1st, that the payment of the $120.75 assessed on the plaintiff at the division of the land by the commissioners was a precedent condition to the vesting of title to the land in her; and, 2d, that the division of the land should have been per capita between the plaintiff and the children of James M. Calvert, and not in equal parts between the two. This motion was overruled.

When the testimony was all in the defendant moved to dismiss the complaint on the further ground that plaintiff, being in possession of property as devisee of her husband, she was estopped from disturbing the defendant, who was in possession by warranty deed from her said husband. This motion was also overruled, the judge holding that under the will of John Calvert the plaintiff took one half of the land devised to her and the children of John M. Calvert.

The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff for the land.

The appeal brings up the following questions: 1. Should the presiding judge have required further evidence as to the payment by the plaintiff of the $120.75 assessed upon her at the division of the land?

2. Was plaintiff's title merely an equitable title, and insufficient to defeat the defendant?

3. Did the presiding judge err in holding that the defendant could not dispute the plaintiff's title, as he held the deed of plaintiff's husband, who derived his title from plaintiff?

4. Did the judge err in sustaining the division of the land by the commissioners into two equal parts, instead of per capita between the plaintiff and the three children of James M. Calvert?

5. Did the warranty deed of plaintiff's husband estop plaintiff, she having been vouched and holding property real and personal through her said husband?

*1. We do not concur in the position taken by the defendant that the payment of the $120.75 assessed by the commissioners was a precedent condition to the vesting of title in the land. There is nothing in the will, either directly expressed or impliedly suggested, to sustain this view. The title to the land was not in abeyance upon the death of the testator until the division. It either passed by inheritance to his heirs at law, the plaintiff being one, or it passed by the will to the devisees. The will is not set out in full, but in either case the plaintiff was invested with title subject to the division which was directed. The payment of the $120.75 was assessed, not by the testator, but by the commissioners after his death. The commissioners had no power delegated to them to attach conditions either precedent or subsequent.

But if this was otherwise, we think the presiding judge was justified in holding that this assessment was not in the way. Even if this amount had been evidenced by a sealed obligation, the lapse of thirty years would have been sufficient to regard it paid upon the facts here. It is not necessary to express an opinion generally as to the effect of such great lapse of time on sealed obligations. The tendency has been to regard even twenty years as something more than a mere presumption of payment. The recent act, however, placing such obligations on the same footing with unsealed contracts as to the statute of limitations, will soon remove this question from judicial inquiry, and as it is not necessarily involved here we reserve opinion.

The assessment in this case was not evidenced by bond or other sealed paper. It was no doubt accepted by the plaintiff as a debt due by her to the children of James M. Calvert to equalize the division in the land; but at most it was an open contract implied by the circumstances, and we can see no reason why it was not subject to the statute of limitations, and barred by that statute, after four years, from the majority of the children. In any event we sustain the result of the judge's ruling.

2. There is nothing in the case upon which to base the proposition that plaintiff's title was merely an equitable title. As has been said above, she was either an heir at law of the testator or a devisee, in either of which cases she had legal title. There was no trust or any species of equitable interest created in her favor. The language of the will is "between my daughter Frances E. Archer and the children of my son James M. Calvert, to them and their heirs forever." This is the language of the largest legal estates, not equities.

3. Error to the judge is assigned because he held that defendant could not dispute plaintiff's title. We concur in this holding. Ordinarily the plaintiff in an action to recover land must make out a perfect title; until this is done the defendant, though he be a bold trespasser, as to title in himself may hold his arms and rest in safety. But there are exceptions to this general rule, one of which is where both parties claim through a common source. In such case neither party need go further back than this common origin. In this case both parties claimed virtually through the will of old man Calvert—the plaintiff directly and the defendant through plaintiff's husband, whose title depended upon his marital rights. If such be the fact, the defendant could not dispute plaintiff's title, as will no doubt be admitted.

The point, however, which defendant makes is that the judge was not warranted in concluding that Robert A. Archer had no other title than through his wife. The facts are that James Calvert died in possession of this land. At that time the plaintiff was the wife of Robert A. Archer. Mr. Calvert undertook to dispose of this land by his will.

In accordance with directions in the will commissioners went upon it and allotted this portion to the plaintiff, and it is fair to presume that her husband then took possession by virtue of this allotment. Under these circumstances he could not dispute the title of his wife, nor could any grantee of his.

It may be said, however, that there was no evidence that defendants claimed through Robert Archer. This cannot be denied in face of the statement in the brief "that the defendant, by way of defence, set forth the conveyance by Robert A. Archer to George Nickles and the renunciation of dower by the plaintiff." We think these facts precluded defendant from disputing plaintiff's title.

*4. Did the judge err in holding that the land was properly divided into two equal parts? It seems that the testator had but two children, the plaintiff and a son, James M. Calvert, the son having three children. It was natural that the testator should desire to make an equal division of his property between these two. The language which he used in his will requires no distinction to accomplish this end. In fact it requires some straining to reach any other conclusion.

An equal division between his two children, Frances being one, and this son and his children representing the other, seems to have been the scheme of the will. This will be seen by a subsequent clause (the eighth), in which he disposes of the rest and residue of his estate. As before stated, the will in full is not given. But enough is furnished for us to conclude that such was the general scheme, and we have no doubt that the testator intended the land to be divided into two parts. The commissioners so understood it, and for thirty years the parties immediately interested have submitted. We do not see by what right the defendant can now dispute it. The cases of Conner v. Johnson, 2 Hill Eq. 43, and Cole v. Creyon, 1 Hill Eq. 319 [26 Am. Dec. 192], when applied to the facts of this case, with the light thrown upon the intention by the eighth clause of the will, we think sustain this view.

5. Did the deed of plaintiff's husband with warranty estop plaintiff from asserting her rights under her father's will? An ancestor may bind heirs or devisees to the extent of real estate descended or devised. This is familiar doctrine. But a binding contract of the ancestor does not pass the title of his heirs nor prevent them as devisees from asserting it. One may be estopped by his own acts, but not by the acts of another to which he is no party. This action was for the recovery of plaintiff's land. It was no defence to such claim for the defendant to demand that the plaintiff should make good the warranty of her husband's deed. This she might be compelled to do if she had lands descended or devised from her husband of sufficient value, and still she would be entitled to recover the land if it belonged to her.

In this case, however, the defence, even if a good one, was *not made out. The only property it seems the plaintiff received unencumbered was personally as an exemption under the homestead laws, amounting to $262. The house and lot she seems to be holding at the sufferance of indulgent creditors.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

Before Wallace, J., Marion, October, 1881.

This case is fully stated in the opinion of this court.

Mr. C. A. Woods, for appellant.

Mr. Justice McIVER. John C. McClenaghan, by his will, after directing his executrix to pay all his debts and funeral expenses, devised and bequeathed his whole estate both real and personal to his wife, Mary S., and appointed her executrix. She subsequently intermarried with Duncan McIntyre, and on May 6, 1871, they filed a complaint to marshal the assets of the testator's estate, for injunction and general relief. Under this action an order, without date, was granted enjoining all creditors of the testator, as well as those of McClenaghan & Fairlee, a legal firm of which the testator was the surviving member, "from proceeding either at law or equity to sue or collect any claims against the estate of John C. McClenaghan, deceased;" requiring such creditors to prove their claims before a referee; directing that the executors of McClenaghan, as well as the executor of Fairlee, account before said referee, and that the real estate of the testator be sold by the referee. On February 24, 1872, the referee reported that he had sold a part of the real estate, but that the remainder was not sold for the reason that it was represented by counsel that the executrix, Mrs. McIntyre, was sole devisee, and that she desired to avoid a sale of the balance if possible, and that it was probable enough had been sold to discharge the debts of the testator; consequently, the referee had indefinitely postponed any further sale. This report was confirmed by an order dated February 23, 1872, which must be a clerical error, as the report bears date the 24th.

This report seems to have been made before any proof of claims had been taken, for we find that on September 18, 1872, the referee made another report of the sale, in which he says: "That from the amount of claims proven, after consultation with plaintiffs' counsel, it was thought that a sufficiency had been sold to meet the liabilities of the testator. If, however, in auditing the claims against the firm of McClenaghan & Fairlee, it should become necessary to sell the remainder of the testator's lands, the referee can yet do so; a necessity, however, which the referee hopes will not occur." In this report the referee embraces a schedule of the claims proved, in reference to which he says: "To many of the simple contract claims plaintiffs' counsel interpose the plea of the statute of limitations, which, if insisted on, will bar many of that class of claims." In the schedule such of the claims as appear on their face to be subject to that plea are marked "barred by statute." There is also appended to the report a list of claims, signed by plaintiffs' counsel, to which the plea of the statute was interposed; and while the claim presented by E. T. Stackhouse against McClenaghan & Fairlee is marked "barred" on the schedule, it is not embraced in the list of claims to which the statute was pleaded. This report was likewise confirmed, and the referee ordered to pay the costs and fees in the case, the taxes, judgments, and specialty claims, by an order dated February 23, 1872, which no doubt is a clerical error and should be 1873; but no order was made in reference to the simple contract claims, for the reason, doubtless, that the report of the referee left it doubtful which of the simple contract claims were established.

By an order dated March 28, 1873, the referee was required to turn over to the clerk of the court all the funds and assets in his hands belonging to the estate of the testator, with a statement of money received and paid out by him; and the clerk was directed to pay out all funds coming into his hands, "as heretofore ordered by this court." This order was complied with by the referee, and the clerk, by a subsequent order dated December 5, 1874, was directed "to pay over to the creditors of J. C. McClenaghan, deceased, who have proven their claims before him, any funds in his hands or that may come into his hands, pro rata, according to their respective demands."

On July 16, 1875, H. McClenaghan, one of the simple contract creditors, who had presented a claim before the referee, took out a rule on the clerk to show cause why he had failed to pay his claim. To this rule the clerk made return that the counsel for the plaintiffs had been changed since the order to pay out the funds was passed, and that he had received notice from the counsel substituted for those originally representing the plaintiffs that they interposed the plea of the statute "to *claims allowed, and objected to the payment out of the fund." Under these circumstances he did not feel at liberty to proceed in paying out the fund, although before receiving notice of the change of counsel he had made a payment on the claim of H. McClenaghan, inasmuch as that claim was not on the list of those to which the plea of the statute had been interposed by the original counsel appended to the report of the referee; but that it then appeared from an affidavit of the referee, dated July 22, 1875, accompanying the return of the clerk to the rule that the plea of the statute was interposed "to every claim," and that he had overruled the plea as to the claim of H. McClenaghan.

This affidavit is not embraced in the "Case" as submitted here, but by consent of counsel has been introduced; and it is difficult to reconcile its statements with the previous report of the referee, made nearly three years before, except by supposing that the referee after that lapse of time had forgotten the facts; for it is manifest from his report, as well as from the list of claims appended thereto, that the statute was not pleaded to all of the simple contract claims, while in the affidavit it is stated that the plea of the statute was interposed "to every claim." This, however, is not a matter of any consequence to our present inquiry, for this affidavit was not made until long after the sale by the sheriff, under which the defendant claims, and therefore could have had no influence in inducing her to purchase. By an order dated July 23, 1875, the rule on the clerk was discharged, and it was ordered "that unless proper legal steps be taken to test the bona-fide and legal status of the claims proven, or any of them, by the first day of September next, the clerk of the court do proceed without further delay to pay out the funds in his hands upon claims proved according to their priorities and legal rights."

On August 24, 1875, another order was granted, which, after reciting that the referee's report on claims "is too indefinite, and that the clerk was at a loss to know how to pay out the funds in his hands under the various preceding orders, directed the clerk to pay the specialty claims and hold the balance of the funds subject to the further order of the court, *and that he "make a full report on the condition of all claims, including simple contract claims, to the next term of this court, with a succinct statement of the questions he may wish to refer to said court for its decision." Under this order the clerk made a report on November 30, 1875, in which, after setting out what the referee had done together with the schedule of claims substantially as stated by the referee, except that none of the claims on the schedule was marked "barred by the statute," as well as the list of claims to which the plaintiff's original counsel had interposed the plea of the statute, he says: "As the report of the special referee is very indefinite in distinguishing the claims to which the statute of limitations is pleaded, the clerk feels embarrassed, and desires the judgment of the court whether the former order confirming the report shall be his guide, with the after explanations of the special referee contained in an affidavit sustaining the return under the rule against the clerk, and herewith referred to as part of this report."

Upon this report two orders were taken, both dated December 3, 1875, one adjudging that the claim of H. McClenaghan was a valid claim, and the other directing the original referee to "report upon the claims against the estate upon calling upon the creditors to appear before him after due notice;" and this is conclusive evidence that the court did not consider that the amount of the claims had ever been ascertained. Subsequently another referee was substituted to take proof of the claims of J. W. Dillon and Dillon & Russ. Under this last-mentioned order a claim was presented by E. T. Stackhouse as assignee against John C. McClenaghan as agent of the creditors of J. W. Dillon and Dillon & Russ. After protracted litigation, this claim, which is understood to be the same as that originally presented by Stackhouse against McClenaghan & Fairlee, was established (12 S. C. 185), and the remainder of the real estate of John C. McClenaghan, consisting of a house and lot in the town of Marion, which is the subject-matter of the present suit, was ordered to be sold by the master, and the same was sold in November, 1880, pursuant to said order, and bid off by the plaintiff E. T. Stackhouse, to whom titles were *made and the sale confirmed by an order of the court made November 20, 1880.

While the foregoing proceedings were pending, to wit, on the first Monday in August, 1874, the sheriff, under an execution in his office against Mrs. Mary S. McIntyre, issued on a judgment recovered against her for a debt due by her individually, "levied upon and after due and legal notice sold the interest of Mary S. McIntyre in the house and lot above mentioned." At this sale the defendant, Susan W. Wheeler, became the purchaser, paid the purchase-money, and took titles from the sheriff. On January 7, 1881, this action was commenced to recover possession of said house and lot. It appeared in evidence that the defendant paid full value for the property and had improved it very much since her purchase. There was also evidence from one of the original attorneys for Mrs. McIntyre, that up to April 6, 1870, the rents of the house and lot were collected for her as executrix, as well as evidence from C. Graham "that he rented the house and lot from Mrs. McIntyre and accounted to her for the rents," but when this was, did not appear. It was conceded that the defendant not only had such constructive notice as might be implied from the pendency of the proceedings in the case to marshal assets, but that, through her husband and agent, who had examined these proceedings prior to the sheriff's sale, she had at the time of that sale actual notice of all the facts disclosed by those proceedings. It was also in evidence that the sale to plaintiff was forbidden by the defendant and notice given of her claim. This with the record of the proceedings to marshal the assets of the estate of John C. McClenaghan, of which an abstract has been given, constitutes the substance of the evidence offered at the trial.

The Circuit judge charged the jury that the complaint to marshal the assets of the estate of McClenaghan enabled his creditors to establish their demands under that action, and prevented them from bringing separate actions against the executors; that while the land was in possession of the devisee, who was a party to that action, it was certainly competent for the court to order a sale to pay debts of the testator, but if *there was a bona-fide alienation by the devisee it was not invalid by reason of the pendency of the action to marshal assets, because that action was not a proceeding to subject lands in the possession of the devisee to the payment of the debts of the testator. He also instructed the jury that the sale by the sheriff was a sale by the devisee, and left it to them to say whether the alienation was bona-fide, and what was the nature of the possession by Mrs. McIntyre of the lot in question; telling them that if she held possession as executrix the sale by the sheriff was invalid, but if she held as devisee and executrix the sale if bona-fide would be valid.

To this charge plaintiff excepted, and requested the judge to charge as follows: "That the court having taken charge of the land devised, upon the application of the devisee and executrix, for the purpose of sale and the payment of debts of the testator, there could be no valid alienation except by the order of the court; that under the circumstances of this case the alienee of the devisee and executrix could stand in no better position than the devisee and executrix before such alienation; that the jury should find for the plaintiff the land in dispute;" all of which was refused.

The jury found a verdict for the defendant and judgment being entered thereon the plaintiff appeals. 1st. Because of error in charging that the sale by the sheriff and purchase by the defendant was an alienation by the devisee before suit brought by the creditors against the devisee to subject the lands devised to payment of testator's debts. 2d. Because the jury were instructed that the action to marshal assets was not an action to subject the lands devised to payment of the debts of the testator. 3d. Because the judge charged that the alienation by the devisee would be valid notwithstanding the pendency of the action to marshal assets. The 4th, 5th, and 6th exceptions allege error in refusing to charge as requested by plaintiff. 7th. Because the judge erred in refusing to charge that Mrs. McIntyre held the property in question as executrix until the debts of the testator were paid, and until then could make no valid alienation as devisee.

as to the effect of *the proceeding to marshal assets. In the case of Thomson v. Palmer, 2 Rich. Eq. 36, which is regarded as a leading case upon this subject, it is said: "When an executor or administrator comes for the aid of the court in administering the estate in his hands, the court should be placed in possession of the fund to be administered, and when the court is called upon to order a sale of land in aid of assets, it should have the command of the proceeds of sale to be administered. We should not be required to enjoin creditors from proceeding elsewhere unless we are placed in possession of the funds to which the creditors are entitled so as to enable us to satisfy all the just rights with which we have interfered." When, therefore, the action to marshal assets was commenced, the court must be regarded as having taken possession and assumed the control of all the assets of the testator for the purpose of providing for the payment of his debts, and as long as that proceeding was pending any person who purchased any of the property constituting a part of such assets, with notice of that proceeding, must be regarded as having bought subject to the right of the court to dispose of such property for the purpose of effecting the objects of that action, and, if necessary, make a sale of the property. Certainly no party to the action could, by a sale or otherwise, withdraw any of the assets from under the control of the court and thereby defeat the purpose for which the court had assumed the control of such assets. It would be a reproach to the administration of justice if a court, after prohibiting creditors from pursuing their rights in the ordinary form, and assuming the control of the assets of a debtor for the purpose of providing for the payment of debts, should not be able to protect such assets, and prevent them from being withdrawn and diverted to other purposes.

In Wiswall v. Sampson, 14 How. (U. S.) 52 [14 L. Ed. 322], it was held that one having a judgment lien on land of his debtor, which is in the possession of a receiver appointed by the court of chancery under a bill by a creditor against the debtor and a third person to set aside a conveyance to the latter upon the ground of fraud, cannot proceed to levy his execution, if he have notice of the fact that the property is in the custody of the law; he must apply to the court of chancery, which will take care to protect his interest in making a sale or in distributing the proceeds. In that case Wiswall, having obtained a judgment against Ticknor, issued his execution, which was returned nulla bona. Thereupon he filed a bill to set aside a deed for a lot of land made by Ticknor to one Day, on the ground of fraud. Under this bill the deed was set aside and a receiver was appointed and placed in possession of the land, who remained in possession until the lot of land was sold by the master and bought by Wiswall. Pending this proceeding and after the appointment of the receiver the lot of land in question was sold by the U. S. marshal under two judgments against Ticknor, prior in date to that of Wiswall, and bought by one Dargan, the lessor of Sampson, prior to the sale by the master, and it was held that Wiswall's title was superior to that of Sampson, lessee of Dargan.

In that case Nelson, J., delivering the opinion of the court, uses this language: "The settled rule, also, appears to be that where the subject-matter of the suit in equity is real estate, and which is taken into the possession of the court, pending the litigation, by the appointment of a receiver or by sequestration, the title is bound from the filing of the bill, and any purchaser pendente lite, even if for a valuable consideration, comes in at his peril." Again he says: "It is sufficient to say that the sale under the judgment, pending the equity suit, and while the court was in possession of the estate, without leave of the court, was illegal and void." And again: "While the estate is in the custody of the court, as a fund to abide the result of a suit pending, no sale of the property can take place, either on execution or otherwise, without leave of the court for that purpose. And upon this ground we hold that the sale by the marshal on the two judgments was illegal and void, and passed no title to the purchaser."

That case, the authority of which has been recognized in Clinkscales v. Pendleton Manufacturing Co., 9 S. C. 323, would seem to be decisive of the question under consideration. For while it is true that in this case no receiver had been appointed, yet it is well settled that the possession of a receiver *is nothing more nor less than the possession of the court, he being, as it is said, merely the hand of the court; and as we have seen, where under a proceeding to marshal assets the court is asked to sell land for the payment of debts, the court must be regarded as having the possession and the control of the property which it is asked to sell, for the purpose of applying it to the payment of debts, which it has prohibited creditors from collecting elsewhere or otherwise. In this case the court had assumed the control and directed its officer to sell the real estate, and although the sale had been postponed under the belief that enough had been sold to pay the debts then established, yet the order for sale had never been rescinded, and the very terms of the referee's report showed that a further sale might be necessary. And when it was subsequently ascertained that it was necessary to sell the whole of the real estate, the land now in controversy was actually sold by the proper officer of the court for the purpose of paying debts established against the estate of the testator.

It is contended, however, that when the defendant bought the lot in question at the sale by the sheriff the proceedings in the action to marshal assets showed that enough property had been sold to pay all the debts then established against the estate of the testator. It is clear, however, that at that time there had not been enough sold to pay all the debts then due, even if it be conceded that enough had been sold to pay the debts then established, because another claim was afterwards established which rendered it necessary to sell the land now in controversy; and it is equally clear, from the terms of the referee's report, that at the time of the sheriff's sale other claims were then outstanding which might be established, and if so would render a further sale necessary, though the referee hoped that such a contingency would not occur. At the time of the sale by the sheriff the court had not released its grasp upon the property of the testator of which it had assumed the control, and had prohibited creditors from pursuing it except under the proceeding to marshal assets; and it is well settled that as long as any of the funds or assets are under the control of the court, any creditor may come in, establish his demand, and claim payment out of the assets remaining under the control of the court.

But it may well be questioned whether, at the time of the sheriff's sale, enough property had been sold to pay the debts then established against the estate of the testator, for the simple reason that it is quite obvious from the proceedings in the action to marshal assets, of which an abstract has been given in the commencement of this opinion, that it was a matter of great uncertainty what amount of claims had been then established: so great, that as late as August 24, 1875, long after the sale by the sheriff, the court passed an order which, after reciting that the referee's report was too indefinite to enable the clerk to ascertain what claims had been established, directed the clerk to make a full report of the condition of all the claims, with a succinct statement of the questions which it may be necessary for the court to determine. And even after the clerk made his report under this order, this uncertainty does not seem to have been removed, for on December 3, 1875, the court made another order directing a referee to call in creditors and make a report of claims, and that under his report a claim was established which rendered it necessary to sell the land now in controversy.

This uncertainty as to the amount of claims then established obviously arose from the indefinite character of the original report on claims, from which it appeared that the statute of limitations was not pleaded to some of the simple contract claims which appeared on their face to be barred; and from the fact that the referee, though required to call in the creditors as well of McClenaghan & Fairlee as of McClenaghan individually (one of whom did come in and present his claim), for some unexplained reason, in making his estimate that a sufficient amount of property had been sold, disregarded the claim presented against McClenaghan & Fairlee, which turns out to be the same claim which, in a different form, was afterwards established, and which rendered a sale of the whole of the land necessary. This claim, manifestly, was not rejected by the referee, for although it was marked in the schedule "barred by the statute," yet it was not on the list of those to which the *statute was pleaded; and furthermore the referee says in his report, "If, however, in auditing the claims against the firm of McClenaghan & Fairlee, it should become necessary to sell the remainder of testator's lands, the referee can yet do so:" showing that the purpose of the referee was simply to show what claims had been established against McClenaghan individually, and not to pass upon those which were presented against him as the surviving member of the firm of McClenaghan & Fairlee, but to leave them for further consideration.

It being conceded that the defendant, through her husband and agent, had, before the sheriff's sale, examined the proceedings under the action to marshal assets, she must be regarded as having had actual notice, at the time of her purchase, of every fact disclosed by those proceedings. She knew, therefore, that the land in question belonged to the unsettled estate of McClenaghan; that there was a proceeding then pending for the settlement of that estate, in which the court had been asked to marshal the assets of that estate and to sell the lands of the testator for the payment of his debts; that an order for the sale of all the lands, including the lot in controversy, had been made; that after this order had been partially executed by a sale of a portion of the land any further sale was postponed, but the order for sale was not rescinded, because it was supposed (not ascertained) that enough had been sold to provide for the payment of the debts then established; that the amount of the claims was not certainly ascertained by reason of the indefinite character of the report on claims and the unascertained claims against McClenaghan & Fairlee, which might render a further sale necessary—a contingency distinctly mentioned in the referee's report; that accordingly the court, while directing the referee who had made the sale to pay the costs and fees, taxes, judgments, and specialty claims, had made no order for the payment of the simple contract claims, a class to which the unascertained claims belonged, amongst which was the very claim which was afterwards established under a different form, and which was not then adjudicated, for the defendant did not then have notice of the fact stated in the affidavit of the referee, made long after the sheriff's sale, that *the statute had been pleaded to every claim, but on the contrary she did have notice that this claim was not on the list of those to which the statute was pleaded; and she also had notice that the lot now in controversy was the only land remaining which was liable to be sold, on the contingency mentioned, which contingency did subsequently occur.

If, therefore, the purchase by the defendant at sheriff's sale be regarded the same as if she had purchased directly from Mrs. McIntyre, the defendant in the execution, she occupies the position of one who has purchased pendente lite from a party to an action, some of the property which was the subject-matter of the action and under the authority above cited, her purchase must be regarded as illegal, null, and void, at least as against the title of one who claims under a sale made by the order of the court in that action. If, on the other hand, the purchase by the defendant at sheriff's sale be not regarded as a purchase from the defendant in execution, Mrs. McIntyre, then she cannot claim as the alienee of the devisee under the statute of William and Mary.

The case of Smith v. Grant, 15 S. C. 136, relied on by the respondent, does not apply. The authority of that case is fully recognized, but it differs essentially from the case now under consideration. In that case there was no action pending to marshal the assets of the testator, and the court had not been applied to for a sale of the land for the payment of the debts of the testator, and had not taken the possession and assumed the control of it for that purpose. Then, too, the alienation by the devisee was voluntary, while here it was involuntary; and one of the purposes of the alienation in that case was for the payment of the debts of the testator, and the proceeds of the sale made by the assignee in bankruptcy were actually applied to the payment of a debt of the testator, while here the sale was made to pay an individual debt of the devisee, and the money applied.

When, however, the court is called upon to say that a purchase from a party to an action, of the property which is the subject-matter of the action, by a person who has notice of the pendency of that action and of the purposes for which it was *instituted, and that such purposes had not been accomplished, gives a valid title against one who claims under a sale made by the order of the court in that action, for the purpose of effecting the object for which such action was instituted, a very different question is presented from that which was determined in the case of Smith v. Grant, supra. In this case the creditors of the testator had been enjoined from suing, and the court had undertaken to provide for the payment of their debts, which they had been prohibited from enforcing in the usual way; and before this was done, and while the proceedings were pending for that purpose, certainly no court would allow a purchase, with notice, from a party to the action of a portion of the property which by its order had been withdrawn from the reach of the creditors, to prevail against a purchase at a sale under the order of the court for the purpose of effecting the object for which it had withdrawn the property from the reach of the creditors, and had assumed the duty of applying it to the payment of their debts.

Indeed, the terms of the order enjoining creditors in this case are broad enough to restrain creditors, not only from bringing suit against the executors, but against the devisee also. For its language is, "That all creditors of John C. McClenaghan and of McClenaghan & Fairlee be, and they are hereby, restrained and enjoined from proceeding, either at law or equity, to sue or collect any claims against the estate of John C. McClenaghan deceased." If, therefore, after this order was passed, any creditor had undertaken "to sue or collect" his claim by an action against Mrs. McIntyre as devisee, who was a party to the action in which the injunction had been granted, he would have been violating the order of injunction by undertaking to sue and collect a claim against the estate of McClenaghan by an action against Mrs. McIntyre to subject to the payment of his debt some of the very land which she had asked the court to sell for the purpose of paying the debts of her testator. She might have had such action dismissed, and the creditor required to come in and enforce his claim, under the action which she had instituted for the express purpose of enabling the creditors to reach the very same land.

If so, then, *clearly, any person purchasing from her, either directly or through the sheriff, with notice, could not claim as a bona-fide alienee of the devisee before action brought against her as such.

Again, the rule at all sales by the sheriff under execution is caveat emptor. The sheriff only sells, and the purchaser buys only the interest of the defendant in the execution. Here the only thing sold was the interest of Mrs. McIntyre, and that was only what remained after the debts of her testator had been provided for under the proceedings which she had instituted for that purpose, whereby she had brought all of the property of her testator, including the land in controversy, into court and asked for the sale of it for the purpose of paying the debts of her testator; and while her action for that purpose was pending, she certainly could not, either directly or through the sheriff, make any bona-fide alienation except of such interest as might remain to her after the debts of her testator were satisfied.

From these views it follows that the Circuit judge erred in refusing to charge as requested, and in instructing the jury that the alienation by the devisee, through the sheriff, was not rendered invalid by the pendency of the proceedings to marshal the assets of the estate of McClenaghan.

It does not appear from the "Case" as submitted here that there was any request to charge the proposition of law, the omission of which is claimed to be error in the seventh exception, and hence that matter is not properly before us.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed, and that the case be remanded to that court for a new trial.

Before Pressley, J., Darlington, April, 1881.

Action by Wiesenfeld, Stern & Co. against James E. Byrd and R. Sydney Smith, as executors of Jesse Keith, and Kate Keith as administratrix of Jesse E. Keith.

The Circuit decree thus states the case:

Jesse Keith and his son Jesse E. Keith were partners in trade until the death of Jesse, on 29th April, 1873. The son qualified as executor of his father, and obtained leave from the Probate judge to continue the partnership for that year. It had already made advances to many customers which required further advances by them until the crop could be gathered. To enable the partnership to comply with those contracts, plaintiffs furnished the money before and after the death of Jesse Keith. They also furnished money during the panic in the fall of that year, wherewith Jesse E. Keith paid off several pressing creditors of the partnership.

From time to time, before and after the death of Jesse Keith, produce for sale was sent to plaintiffs in the name of *the partnership, and they, without any instructions as to the application of the proceeds, credited the same on a general partnership account, making no distinction between the part due before the death of Jesse Keith and that contracted thereafter. There is no proof as to how Jesse E. Keith obtained the produce sent by him to plaintiffs after April 29th, 1873. The presumption is that he got it from customers to whom advances had been made before and after that time. Plaintiffs charge twelve per cent interest on their advances, and seek in their suit to secure the unpaid balance, with that rate of interest. Jesse E.

Keith died before the suit. During his lifetime he frequently admitted, by letter and by entries in his books, the plaintiffs' claim, but there is no proof that Jesse Keith ever admitted their rate of interest.

The jury having been instructed to find specially on several questions of fact, rendered their verdict thus: "We find for the plaintiffs the amount sued for, except a deduction of interest from twelve to seven per cent after the death of Jesse E. Keith." "We further find that the estate of Jesse E. Keith is insolvent." As they failed to find the rate of interest chargeable to Jesse Keith, that being one of the matters submitted to them, that matter, by consent, is left with me, and I find that he is chargeable only with seven per cent interest.

Now plaintiffs' attorneys move for judgment in their favor on the said findings, and the attorneys of Jesse Keith oppose the motion as to him, on grounds urged by them before the verdict, to wit: 1st. Because the action cannot be maintained against his executors, there being no allegation or sufficient proof of the insolvency of the surviving partner; 2d. Because the credits admitted by plaintiffs overpay the balance due them at the death of Jesse Keith, and his estate is not responsible for the subsequent business carried on in the name of the partnership. They further oppose judgment at this time against his executors, claiming that the partnership assets and the estate of the surviving partner must be exhausted before resort to the estate of Jesse Keith.

As there was some proof without objection of the insolvency of Jesse E. Keith, the code required me to permit amendment *of plaintiffs' allegations, so as to make them agree with the testimony. That being considered as allowed, the verdict of the jury settles the question of Jesse E. Keith's insolvency.

As to their second ground, I assume that the estate of Jesse Keith is not liable for the debt incurred to plaintiffs after his death, though it is probable. Equity, under the facts proved herein, would, in a proper case, validate the act of the executors, who continued the partnership business, as best for the estate. Waiving that consideration, and regarding the partnership as ended at Jesse Keith's death, it does not follow that it is entitled to be credited with the payments made by Jesse E. Keith after that time. There were no instructions by him as to the application of these payments, and the credits by plaintiffs are on a general account, which includes all their charges to the end of all their advances to him. I cannot hold that credits in that form constitute a special application by plaintiffs of said payments to that portion of their account which accrued before the death of Jesse Keith.

If they had kept two accounts, one with Jesse Keith & Son, and another with Jesse

E. Keith, and had credited payments made by him to the account of Jesse Keith & Son, that would have been a special application, which I could not permit them to change. But in this case they have placed their credits on an account in which the debits of Jesse Keith & Son and of Jesse E. Keith are blended. There is, therefore, no special application of the payments to either account, and I allow plaintiffs now to apply them according to their right. Receiving said payments from Jesse E. Keith, without directions by him as to their application, they had the right to apply them, even if they were partnership assets, in payment of their advances to him to pay partnership creditors as used by him for advances to customers with whom the partnership had so contracted, and I allow the said credits now to be so applied.

As to the delay of judgment against the executors of Jesse Keith until the other sources be exhausted, my judgment is that such power is not to be exercised unless the party seeking it points out assets from which the creditors may surely obtain payment.

*It is therefore ordered and adjudged, that all the credits on plaintiffs' account, after April 29th, 1873, be applied to their charges after that time, until the said advances, with 12 per cent interest, be wholly paid. It is further ordered and adjudged, that the remainder of said credits be applied to the partnership account as it would stand at the death of Jesse Keith, that account to carry interest at 7 per cent until the last credit be applied. From that date the balance is to bear interest against Jesse Keith at 7 per cent and against Jesse E. Keith at 12 per cent until his death and at 7 per cent thereafter. Let the clerk of the court make the calculation, and state the account in accordance with this order, and let the plaintiffs enter judgment against the executors of Jesse Keith and the administratrix of Jesse E. Keith, respectively, for the several amounts thus to be ascertained by the clerk.

The exceptions are substantially stated in the opinion.

Mr. B. W. Edwards, for appellants.

April 11, 1882. The opinion of the court was delivered by Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. Jesse Keith and his son Jesse E. Keith were copartners in trade. While in business they contracted a debt with the plaintiffs for goods furnished and money lent and advanced for their use, evidenced by a running account. Jesse Keith died in 1873, leaving a will in which he appointed Jesse E. Keith and the defendants Byrd and Smith his executors, all of whom qualified.

After his death the survivor continued in business until his death. During this time he sent considerable sums of money to the plaintiffs, and contracted with them other indebtedness. These new debts were charged upon the general account of Keith and son, although the plaintiffs had received notice of the death of Jesse Keith, and the money sent was credited on this general account. The defendant Kate Keith administered on the estate of Jesse E. Keith. This action has been brought against the representatives of both estates to recover the firm debt.

*The defendants Byrd and Smith, executors of Jesse Keith, moved to dismiss the complaint upon the ground that the action could not be maintained against the two estates; that the representatives of a deceased copartner could not be joined in an action at law with the survivor, or his representatives. This motion was refused.

It appeared in evidence that Jesse E. Keith, the survivor, had admitted that the firm debt as well as his own debt bore interest at 12 per cent, but there was no evidence that Jesse Keith ever acknowledged this.

The case went to the jury under instructions to find specially on several questions of fact. Their verdict was as follows: "We find for the plaintiff the amount sued for, except a deduction of interest from 12 per cent to 7 after the death of Jesse E. Keith. We find further that the estate of Jesse E. Keith is insolvent." No objection was taken to the form of this verdict. The jury failed to find as to the rate of interest chargeable against Jesse Keith, and this, by agreement, was left to the judge, who found as matter of fact that he was chargeable with 7 per cent.

In the original complaint there was no allegation of insolvency of Jesse E. Keith, the survivor, but evidence was introduced on this subject without objection, and the judge ordered the complaint amended in that respect.

Upon the rendition of the verdict, the judge ordered and adjudged that all credits upon plaintiffs' general account, after April, 1873 (the date of the death of Jesse Keith), be applied to their charges after that date until said advances with 12 per cent interest be wholly paid; that the remainder of said credits be applied to the partnership account as it would stand at the death of Jesse Keith, that account to carry interest at 7 per cent until the last credit be applied; from that date the balance is to bear interest against Jesse E. Keith at 12 per cent until his death, and at 7 per cent thereafter. And the clerk was directed to make the calculation in accordance with this order; which being done, judgment was rendered against the estate of Jesse E. Keith for $2390.26, and against the estate of Jesse Keith for $1586.93, with interest from May 26, 1881.

First. "Whether an action at law for the recovery of a firm debt can be sustained against the representatives of a deceased copartner and a survivor jointly;" and if so, must it appear that the survivor had been "exhausted by legal pursuit to insolvency, or properly shown to be insolvent"?

Second. Whether the payments by Jesse E. Keith, the survivor after the death of Jesse Keith, should not have been credited on the firm debt?

Third. Should there not have been an accounting between the two estates before any judgment against the estate of Jesse Keith?

Fourth. Whether the payment by Jesse E. Keith at 12 per cent on the firm debt should have been allowed to the prejudice of the estate of Jesse Keith?

This is a peculiar case, and it is difficult to understand from the pleadings whether it was regarded by the parties to be a case at law or a case in chancery. It partakes of both. In its form it is an ordinary action for the recovery of a debt, and in that respect a law case. In the manner in which it was conducted it has both law and chancery features. A jury was employed as to some of the facts, and the judge found the others; and finally, the clerk acted in the nature of a referee in ascertaining the amount due. We must, however, take it as we find it, and pass upon such questions as the parties have brought before us. The appellant seems to regard it as a case at law, as his first exception raises the question whether an action at law for a firm debt can be sustained against the survivor and the estate of a deceased partner jointly.

It will be conceded that this could not have been done under the former practice. Contracts, when entered into by two or more persons as makers, may be either joint, or joint and several, or several. Whether a contract was the one or the other determined the fact, under the common-law doctrine and modes of action, whether all of the parties should be joined in one action, or whether they should be sued separately. If joint, they could not be sued separately. If joint and *several, they could be joined or severed. If several, they could not be joined. The old forms were inflexible, and allowed no exceptions.

There was this difference as to joint contracts from the others: Upon the death of a joint obligor, such obligation ended as to him, and became concentrated on the survivor. This was absolutely so, until at length equity began to afford relief against the estate of the deceased; but at no time could the estate of the deceased be brought into the law courts. This principle, however, did not apply to contracts which were several, or joint and several. In such cases, upon the death of one of the debtors the right of action at law still existed against the deceased; but his estate could not be joined in an action against the survivors, not because all parties could not be sued at law, but because separate and distinct judgments were required, that against the deceased being de bonis testatoris, and that against the survivor de bonis propriis.

Thus it will be seen that whether a partnership debt be a joint, or joint and several, or several debt, under the former practice the survivor and the deceased could not be joined, for the reason that if the contract was joint the equity forms of procedure and the equity courts had to be resorted to as to the deceased, in which the survivor could not be embraced; and, if it was joint and several, or several, while the law courts and forms of action were available in such cases, yet a separate judgment was demanded, and the old forms did not allow a double judgment in a case.

Has the code made any change in this respect? The code has not altered the principles upon which a right of action accrues, nor has it diminished, enlarged, or in any manner changed the grounds of action. It has given no new course of action nor has it taken any away. Both legal and equitable rights remain as before, and the invasion of either is as actionable as ever. But it has consolidated the two courts, and, abolishing all previous forms of action in both, has substituted one form for all classes of injuries, whether legal or equitable, so that now all parties must apply to the same court and enter it by the same proceeding.

*Such being the case, there is no longer any objection to joining both legal and equitable causes in the same action; and it would seem that where a party has the same cause of action against two or more, which formerly on account of the different forms of proceeding he had to enforce in separate courts, now that the forms are the same and the courts the same, there should be no objection to joining them in the same action. The reason for the previous difference ceasing, the difference itself should cease also.

The states which have adopted the code are not all uniform in their decisions on this question. But in this state we have held that there is no difficulty in rendering separate judgments, and in the ordinary cases of joint obligations the representatives of a deceased obligor may be joined with the survivors. Trimmier v. Thomson, 10 S. C. 164; Susong v. Vaiden, 10 S. C. 247 [30 Am. Rep. 50]. If this can be done, as it was in these two cases, upon a joint bond or note, why should not the same principle and practice apply to a copartnership debt? There is no reason.

As to the question of alleging and proving insolvency of the survivor before holding the estate of the deceased responsible. In the case of Wardlaw v. Heirs of Gray, 2 Hill Eq. 644, it was incidentally said, "If the survivor is insolvent equity always affords relief." The case did not require the consideration of the question whether the deceased could be proceeded against before insolvency of the survivor; but it appearing in the case that the survivor was insolvent, it was held sufficient.

In Collyers on Partnerships, § 604, we find the following: "It is now established beyond controversy, that, in the consideration of courts of equity, a partnership debt is several as well as joint, and that upon the death of a partner the joint creditor has a right in equity to proceed immediately against the representatives of a deceased partner for payment out of his separate estate, without reference to the question whether the joint estate is solvent or insolvent, or to state the accounts amongst the partners."

said: "Thus, after some conflict and uncertainty, it seems now to be settled in England, that on the death of a partner a creditor of the firm may proceed at once in equity against the estate of the deceased, whether the firm or the surviving partners be insolvent or otherwise; the court requiring, however, that the surviving partners should be made parties, because they are interested in the account."

Reserving the question whether the doctrine as laid down by these two writers, in its broad extent, applies in this state, it is enough in this case that the jury found as matter of fact that the survivor was insolvent. We think the finding was sufficient. We think also that the complaint was properly amended. Code, § 196. Ahrens v. State Bank, 3 S. C. 410.

Next as to the application of the payments made by the survivor after the death of his copartner. The general rule as to payments is, that where the debtor directs no application at the time of payment the creditor may make the application at any time before judgment or verdict. Brice v. Hamilton, 12 S. C. 32. If neither apply the payments, the court will make such application as shall be reasonable and proper. Jones v. Kilgore, 2 Rich. Eq. 66.

This no doubt is the governing principle where the party making the payment is the principal debtor and the payments are made from his own funds, but should it apply where there is a joint debt as well as an individual one and the payments are made from joint funds? We think not. In such a case the payment should go to the credit of those to whom the money paid rightfully belongs. 'Tis true, upon the death of a copartner, the partnership property legally belongs to the survivor. The death of one dissolves the partnership, and the survivor holds the property. He does not hold it, however, for his own use, but rather in the nature of a trustee, for the settlement of partnership debts, and the winding up of the concern.

A surviving partner is entitled to take and hold as survivor for the purpose of administering the copartnership estate. Moffat v. Thomson, 5 Rich. Eq. 155 [57 Am. Dec. 737]. Dunkin, chancellor in this case, said further:

"The principle is as old at least as the time of Lord Coke, that copartners constitute an exception to the rule as to the jus accrescendi among joint tenants. Co. Litt. 182 a. Though they are joint tenants of all the partnership stock during their lives, there is no survivorship either at law or equity. It follows that upon the decease of one of several partners, his share of the stock and effects of the partnership subject to the partnership debts devolves to his personal representatives, who thereupon become, both at law and in equity, tenants in common with the surviving partner. Such is the doctrine of Kent and Story, and indeed of every elementary writer on the subject." One partner has no right to apply partnership funds to his own debt. This is also elementary.

Now in the case before the court, after the death of Jesse Keith, Jesse E. Keith continued in business with the partnership property on hand. The debts which he afterwards contracted were his individual debts, and the partnership property was not liable therefor. What proportion of his payments to plaintiff came from the partnership assets, did not appear in the case. In fact, no inquiry of that kind seems to have been made. But whatever sum, if any, did thus originate, the estate of the deceased should have the benefit of, equally with the survivor. The money applied was common property and should result in a common benefit.

As to the interest. The jury found that the survivor had agreed to pay 12 per cent. There has been no appeal on that subject, and this finding will not be disturbed. We do not think, however, that any portion of the partnership assets should be applied to the extinguishment of this rate of interest on the single agreement of the survivor. As it appears from the case, this was his independent contract, which did not bind the deceased, the judge finding that the deceased was only bound for 7 per cent. The judgment below must be modified in accordance with this opinion, and for that purpose the case is remanded so that it may be determined upon a second trial what proportion of the payments credited on the general account of the plaintiff was made out of the partnership assets, and to that extent the estate of the deceased partner must have credit on the firm debt as it stood at his death.

and that the case be remanded for further proceedings in accordance with the principles herein.

Before Aldrich, J., Richland, April, 1881.

These were motions made by Angus R. Blakey in the six cases stated and heard together, to dissolve attachments levied in those cases upon real estate in Aiken, Barnwell, and Edgefield counties. The attachments were levied between January 1 and 8, 1881. The deed of assignment from the defendant company, transferring this property to Blakey, was dated November 30, 1880, and was duly recorded in the proper office of the three counties named, on December 2, 4, and 11, 1880.

The exceptions to the order of the Circuit judge refusing the motions (omitting the 2d and 5th, which were not considered by this court) were as follows:

*117

*1. Because the said A. R. Blakey, assignee, was a proper party to make the motion to dissolve the attachment; and the holding of his Honor that he was not, is error.

3. Because it was error to hold that there was any question of title which could condict with the right of A. R. Blakey, assignee, to have the attachments dissolved.

4. Because the holding of his Honor, that no sufficient ground was alleged for dissolving the attachments, was error.

6. Because on the case as submitted his Honor should have granted the order to dissolve the attachments, and his refusal to do so was error.

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. In this case attachments were levied upon certain real property in this state, alleged by the attaching creditors to be the property of the defendant company. Angus R. Blakey claims this property to be his by virtue of a certain deed of assignment executed to him by this company, in the state of Virginia, before these proceedings in attachment were commenced. Upon affidavits showing this fact he sought to intervene in these cases and by motion to dissolve the attachments.

It appeared as one of the facts of the case, that before the attachments were issued proceedings had been instituted in the Circuit Court of the United States for the district of Virginia, to have the deed of assignment under which Blakey claims set aside as null and void, and for the appointment of a receiver. Upon this proceeding no final judgment has been pronounced and the case seems to be still pending, but a receiver was appointed by an order of Judge Hughes in the case, dated *December 23, 1880. It further appeared that an action was pending in the Court of Common Pleas for Aiken county, in behalf of certain creditors of the company therein named, to set aside this deed to Blakey as fraudulent and void.

Judge Aldrich, who heard the motion below, declined to dissolve the attachments, holding that Blakey was not such a party to the actions of the plaintiffs as to entitle him to make this motion; also, that he could not try titles to land on a motion; and lastly, that as the deed of assignment under which Blakey claimed was attacked as fraudulent, the attachments could do no harm to Blakey, because if the deed was valid the attachments could not defeat it, and if it was fraudulent the attaching creditors should not be deprived of the benefit of their diligence. Blakey has appealed upon several exceptions, most of which raise the question whether Blakey was such a party as authorized him to make this motion.

Under the former attachment acts, of force before the adoption of the code in March, 1870, it had been repeatedly decided that no one but the defendant in the attachment could question the regularity of the proceeding or move to dissolve it on that ground, not even the garnishee, although served with process. In Foster v. Jones, 1 McC. 116, it it said "a garnishee has no right to question the regularity of the proceeding against an absent debtor." In Kincaid v. Neall, 3 McC. 201, the court held "that a third person though a judgment creditor cannot set aside the lien of the attachment on account of irregularities." In Camberford v. Hall, 3 McC. 345, it was decided that no one but the debtor himself could take advantage of errors in the judgment rendered against him; that a garnishee could not object to errors or irregularities in the attachment proceedings. In McBride v. Floyd, 2 Bail. 214, Judge O'Neill said: "It has been often decided that neither a garnishee, a creditor of the debtor, nor any person other than the debtor himself can question the regularity of the proceedings in attachment." See also Chambers v. McKee, 1 Hill, 229; Harper v. Scuddy, 1 McM. 265.

changed under the new? Our *present attachment act is found in the code, Part II., Title VII., Chap. IV. In Section 265 there is a provision that defendants may move to discharge attachments, but this privilege does not extend beyond defendants. There is nothing said as to others. This section seems to be a legislative declaration of the law as it formerly stood. As Blakey is not a defendant he cannot come in under any provision of the act, and he is excluded under the decisions above referred to from questioning these attachments for irregularity.

It may be said, however, that he is not attempting to assail the attachments on the ground of irregularity, but because they have been levied upon his property instead of that of the Piedmont Company. Under the former act there was provision made for such cases. Where the property attached was claimed by a third party he had the right to intervene, and by proper pleading to raise the question of title, but he could not do so on simple motion. The act required an issue to be made and to be submitted to the jury. But there is no provision of this kind as to real estate in the present act.

The cases relied upon by appellant, as it appears to us, do not aid him. Some of them decided that the title of an assignee from the debtor vested before the lien of the attachment will be sustained as against the attachment.

There is no doubt as to the correctness of this principle, and if in this case it should subsequently appear that when these attachments were levied the lands attached had been conveyed by bona-fide deed to Blakey, or to any one else, these attachments will not stand in the way of such conveyance; on the contrary, they will be nugatory, and the attaching creditors will take nothing by their proceedings. In the other cases the judgments obtained on the attachment proceedings were assailed, and with it the attachments. But here Blakey comes in before judgment and attempts to intervene on motion, in the midst of the proceedings, raising the question of title to the property, which he submits to the judge. The judge, we think properly, held that he could not try title to real estate on a motion. Code, § 276.

As was said by the presiding judge, we cannot see how *Blakey can be injured by these attachments. If it is true that the property involved in fact belongs to him, the attachments cannot divest his title. He is no party to the proceeding, and cannot be bound by any judgment rendered therein. Only the interest of the defendant company is attached, and if no such interest exists the attachments of course will be fruitless. It will be time enough for Blakey to assert his title when it is attacked in such way, as upon failure to resist he may be concluded.

We think there was no error in the judge refusing the motion below. Inasmuch as Blakey had no legal status in the case below, and therefore not authorized to make this motion, it will not be necessary to discuss the other exceptions.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

Before Mackey, J., Charleston, April, 1881.

The attachments in these cases, Sarah C. Metts against the defendant corporation, and S. L. Patterson and E. L. Patterson against the same defendant, were levied in January, 1881. The deed of assignment to Angus R. Blakey was dated November 30, 1880, and recorded in the three counties named within fifteen days thereafter. Blakey's notice of motion was served *February 23, 1881. Other matters are stated in the opinion. The three motions were heard together by Judge Mackey, who "ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the attachments in the above causes be discharged and dissolved, and that the defendant, Blakey, have judgment for his costs in the above causes." The plaintiffs appealed upon five exceptions, none of which were considered by the court.

Messrs. Brawley & Barnwell, Simonton & Barker, for appellants.

July 11, 1882. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. The plaintiffs in the above causes levied attachments on certain real estate lying in this state in the counties of Aiken, Barnwell, and Edgefield, as the property of the Piedmont and Arlington Life Insurance Company, a corporation under the laws of Virginia.

Previous to the issue of these attachments, this corporation being insolvent had executed in Virginia a deed of assignment to Angus R. Blakey in trust for its creditors, in which were included these lands, which deed was duly recorded in the several counties where the lands were located. It appeared further, that subsequently to this assignment and previous to the attachments, to wit, December 24, 1880, in a proceeding in the Circuit Court of the United States for the eastern district of Virginia, instituted to set aside this deed as fraudulent, a receiver had been appointed, and the company and Blakey ordered to deliver all of its property of every kind to this receiver.

Under this state of facts Blakey after notice intervened in these actions, and moved to vacate the attachments on the ground that the property attached was his, and not that of the defendant corporation. No objection was interposed as to the manner of Blakey's appearance in the case, nor do the plaintiffs object now. On the contrary, it is expressly stated in the brief that all objection in that respect is waived, as the parties *desire the case to turn upon its merits. The motion of Blakey was resisted below upon the ground that the deed under which he claimed was fraudulent and void, and as evidence of this fact the plaintiffs relied, first, on the fact that certain creditors of the company in this state had instituted proceedings in the county of Aiken to vacate the deed for fraud, which proceeding was still pending; and secondly, upon the terms of the deed itself. The Circuit judge ordered the attachments dissolved, and that Blakey have judgment for his costs. The appeal presents the single question whether under the circumstances stated the attachments should have been dissolved. The decision of this question in our opinion does not involve the validity of the deed to Blakey, whether fraudulent or not, and we do not deem it proper, therefore, to pass upon that matter.

There are but two recognized modes of assailing an attachment. One is by motion on account of some irregularity appearing on the face of the proceedings, or because it has been improvidently issued, the allegations upon which it issued being false. The other is by giving bond to the sheriff to pay the debt, thereby releasing the property. These are the only modes of dissolving attachments known to the law, applicable to such proceedings. Blakey has not resorted to either of these, but relies solely upon the ground that the property in question is his. Mr. Drake, the highest authority on attachment proceedings, says that the defendant debtor cannot move to discharge an attachment on the ground that the property attached did not belong to him. Drake Attach., § 417; Langdon v. Conklin, 10 Ohio St. 439. There is no greater reason why a third party should have this privilege. Mr. Drake says further (Sec. 234): "Another established principle affects with peculiar fitness attachments of real estate—that the attachment can operate only upon the rights of the defendant existing when it is made. If prior to the attachment he had sold and conveyed the land in good faith, it cannot be held for the debt of the vendor. 23 Ill. 422. Nor, on the other hand, can any interest which the defendant subsequently acquires be reached by it."

*The attachment can operate only on the interest of the debtor. It cannot divest any lien, incumbrance, or title of a third party, or affect his interest in any way. If the debtor has no interest, the proceeding is futile and its results will be fruitless. The creditor levies on the property of persons other than the debtor, at his peril. But this fact affords no ground, as far as we have been able to find, for the dissolution of the attachment. The attachment is based upon facts disconnected with the property, and it must stand or fall upon these facts. If Blakey's rights have been interfered with, he has his remedy, and the courts will afford him full protection through some proceeding more appropriate than the one he has adopted. His motion involves the title to real property, which ordinarily should be determined by a jury. We have held in a recent case, Copeland v. Piedmont and Arlington Life Insurance Company (ante, p. 116), that a third party cannot intervene in an attachment proceeding and have title to land tried in this summary way.

It is true that the appellants have waived the point of Blakey's right to appear, but we do not understand that they consented that he shall invoke a remedy for which there is no precedent for the courts to afford. But even if the plaintiffs have consented to this, it is best that uniformity and system should be observed in the administration of the law, and to that end that well-established rules should not be departed from, even where the parties consent. Consent cannot give jurisdiction.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed.

17 S. C. 123

McCASLAN v. LATIMER.

[Pleading  $\S$  274.]

Allegations of facts occurring since the commencement of the action and of facts not then known to the plaintiff can be brought before the court by supplemental complaint only; and it is error of law to permit them to be incorporated as amendments into the original complaint.

This action was commenced and the complaint filed June 23, 1881, by James McCaslan and several others, residents and taxpayers of certain townships of Abbeville county, suing in behalf of themselves and of all others who have a common interest, against James M. Latimer and others, claiming to be president and directors of the Savannah Valley Railroad Company, and against J. Wardlaw Perrin as treasurer of Abbeville county.

The complaint alleged the incorporation of the company (16 Stat. 435), and the subscription of certain townships of Abbeville county, payable in three instalments, of which one had been paid and the second was about to be enforced by the said county treasurer; that some of the plaintiffs had voted for this subscription; that the company had not been properly organized and the subscribing townships not properly represented; that the annual meeting prescribed by the charter had not been called, and the defendants now exercising the functions of officers have continued themselves in office; that an amended charter (17 Stat. 418), changing the location of the road and otherwise affecting its interests, had been obtained from the legislature by defendants, but had never been assented to or adopted at any meeting of the stockholders, but defendants were now proceeding to act and expend money under the terms of this amendment. The complaint alleged other irregularities and illegalities. The judgment prayed was an injunction restraining the defendants from acting as officers, or expending the money received from the subscribing townships, and the county treasurer from collecting further instalments, and that the townships be discharged from their payment.

On June 24, 1881, the plaintiffs procured an order from Judge Hudson requiring the defendants to show cause at Greenville, on July 12, why an injunction should not be granted. Defendants on that day served their answer (which does not appear in the brief) and "the cause was heard by Judge Hudson on the rule." He filed his decree July 22, in which he fully discussed the merits of the case, and thought the plaintiffs had failed to make out any grounds for an injunction, and held the return sufficient, and denied the motion for preliminary injunction with costs.

In October plaintiffs gave notice that, at the next ensuing term of court in Abbeville, they would move for leave to amend the complaint in several particulars, which were substantially as follows:

1. That the subscription of the townships had not been made and certified as required by the charter.
2. That plaintiffs paid their first instalment under a mistake of fact, supposing that the subscription had been duly made.
3. That the amendment to the charter had been requested by a convention of so-called stockholders in November, 1879.
4. That at a convention of so-called stockholders held June 30, 1881, James M. Latimer had informed them that the amendment to the charter was not accomplished until the session of the general assembly in 1880.
5. That said convention adopted a resolution declaring it inexpedient to elect officers, and requesting those in office to hold over until the next annual meeting.
6. That no election was then held, nor since, and that no time has been appointed for such an election.

Judge Fraser heard the motion and granted it, on payment by the plaintiffs of $15 costs. Defendants appealed on the single ground stated in the opinion.

Mr. B. F. Whitner, for appellants.

Mr. A. Burt, contra, contended that the order was in the discretion of the judge and therefore not appealable, and cited Code, §§ 11, 196; 4 Wait Prac. 252, 256, 262; 12 Abb. 414; 21 How. Pr. 296; 16 N. Y. 242; 50 N. Y. 689; 52 N. Y. 248.

April 12, 1882. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. This action was brought to restrain the defendants appellants, president and directors of the Savannah Valley Railroad Company, from doing certain acts of official character, and also to restrain the treasurer of the county of Abbeville from collecting and paying over the uncollected portion of the tax subscribed to the company.

After filing the complaint and before answer, the plaintiffs respondents made application at chambers before Judge Hudson for a preliminary injunction. Upon this application Judge Hudson granted a rule to show cause before him at Greenville on July 12, 1881. On that day the defendants answered, and the case was heard upon the rule. Judge Hudson declined to grant the restraining order applied for pending the litigation, and leaving the matter to the court to be acted on at term time, dismissed the motion with costs.

At the next term of the Court of Common Pleas for Abbeville county, plaintiffs, upon notice, moved for leave to amend their complaint in various particulars. This motion was granted by Judge Fraser, the presiding judge. From this order the defendants have appealed, upon the single ground that the additional allegations thus incorporated by amendment were not the subject of amendment, but were the subject of supplemental pleading, and could be brought before the court by a supplemental complaint only.

The only question therefore before this court in the appeal is: Did the judge err in permitting the additional allegations to be incorporated by amendment? This question must be determined upon the provisions of the code and the construction applicable thereto. Both amendments and supplemental pleadings are provided for in the code, but there is a marked distinction between the two. They are allowed upon different conditions and are intended to meet different contingencies. They are not interchangeable remedies, to be employed indifferently at the choice of the pleader, but distinct and separate proceedings, each depending upon its own principles and governed by its own facts. Where the one is required, it is error to substitute the other.

The important sections of the code relating to amendments are 195 and 196. The first allows pleadings to be once amended by the parties of course, and without costs at certain stages of the cause. This section has no application here, and need not be considered further. The second authorizes the *court to amend "either before or after judgment in furtherance of justice, * * * or by inserting other allegations material to the case, or when the amendment does not change substantially the claim or defence by conforming the pleading or proceeding to the facts proved."

Section 200 is the important section in reference to supplemental pleading. This permits a supplemental complaint, answer, or reply where facts material to the case have occurred after the former complaint, answer, or reply, or where the party was ignorant of such facts when the former pleading was made, or where a judgment or decree of any competent court determining the matter in controversy has been rendered since the commencement of such action. This section, as it will be observed, specifies the character of facts or rather the condition of the facts which are the subject of supplemental pleadings. They must be such as have either occurred since the suit, or if in existence at the time of the suit, the party was ignorant thereof. Such being the conditions which must attach to allegations subject to supplemental pleadings, this, by strong implication at least, excludes such facts from the operation of amendment.

The mind would reach this conclusion simply upon reading these different sections and without the aid of commentators. But when we find that the best annotators of the code have placed this construction upon these sections, this view is not only strengthened and confirmed, but is left without doubt. Mr. Wait says: "Whenever a plaintiff or defendant in any action becomes informed of certain facts material to his case, which have occurred after service of his complaint, answer, or reply, or of which he was ignorant when his former pleading was made, he should apply to the court for leave to serve a supplemental pleading. Supplemental pleadings in such cases are not only allowable, but indispensable, as such newly discovered facts cannot be inserted in the pleadings by amendment. Amendments can only relate properly to the time when the original pleading was made, and can only state facts in existence at that time."

He refers to numerous cases, among them

Hornfager v. *Hornfager, 6 How. Pr. 13; Hendricks v. Decker, 35 Barb. 298; Hoyt v. Sheldon, 4 Abb. 59; S. C., 6 Duer., 661. "Supplemental complaints cannot be allowed to set up facts existing and known to the pleader when the original pleading was served." 2 Wait Prac. 467. Again, at page 504, he says: "Amendments to a pleading can only state facts in existence at the time when the original pleading was made. A plaintiff cannot, therefore, introduce, by an amendment of the complaint, facts occurring subsequent to the commencement of the action." See also Moon v. Johnson, 14 S. C. 436; 2 Abb. Forms, 201, note k. This is conclusive, and determines indisputably the meaning and intent of the code upon this subject.

It only remains to inquire whether the facts alleged in the amendment here were in existence at the institution of the action or were such as have occurred since, or if in existence before, that plaintiffs were ignorant thereof at that time. There seems to be no doubt but that the facts alleged in the fourth, fifth, and sixth proposed amendments occurred after the commencement of the action, and under the principles laid down above could only be incorporated by supplemental complaint. As to the first, second, and third proposed amendments, while the facts appearing in the brief afford strong presumption that the plaintiffs were ignorant of the matters therein proposed at the time of the filing of the complaint, yet the statements are not sufficiently full and definite to enable the court to determine this fact with certainty. We therefore decide nothing in reference thereto.

It is the judgment of this court that the order below be reversed, without prejudice to the plaintiffs as to any motion they may make to the Circuit Court upon proper showing, as they may be advised, to have the first, second, and third proposed amendments inserted and allowed as such.

Where, in action for damages caused by a mill-dam, plaintiff brings out testimony of an offer, made by him to defendants just before suit, to purchase the dam for the purpose of destroying it, there is no error of law on the part of the judge in charging the jury that this offer was strong as an acknowledgment of defendants' right to maintain their dam as it then stood; nor was it a charge upon facts in violation of the constitution. Before Thomson, J., Union, October, 1879.

for damages done to the plaintiff's *lands within the past twenty years by a dam which had existed for a century, and also for damages for injuries resulting from the raising of the dam. The answer denied the injury and the raising, and alleged that if these lands were at all injured they had been injured as much or more for more than twenty years. The action was commenced August 14, 1877.

The opinion sufficiently states the facts upon the four points first considered by this court. There was a conflict of testimony as to the condition of plaintiff's lands for the sixty years preceding action brought, whether in better or worse condition, and whether injuries now done were or were not done more than twenty years ago. Expert witnesses differed as to the causes of injury, of the filling up of the creek, etc. There was also conflict as to the height of the dam built in 1869 as compared with other dams which preceded it, and as bearing upon this point there was a conflict as to where the head of the pond was at the first trial.

His Honor charged the jury that a man cannot, by our law, commence an action for overflowing his land until he is injured. When was plaintiff injured here? When the water began to sob the land from the channel; plaintiff could have sued when the land began to be in a sobbed condition. Though this condition may not have been apparent at first, still the question is, When did this sobbing begin? Whenever that began which the plaintiff calls the injury the right of action accrued. That from such time it is adverse possession. That if Hope or Thomson or anybody else was in possession of the use of the dam in this case for twenty years, they thereby acquired a prescriptive right to use a dam at same place, at same height, and to same extent as the one so used for twenty years. That if water was backed by this dam as far back as the cane-brake for twenty years, the dam-owners had an indefeasible right to keep it there, no matter what results followed. That mill-owners had rights as well as land-owners. That dam might say to the stream: You are going to fill me up with sand. That owners of dam could say: We have a right that you shall not fill us up with sand. That the owners of the dam *had a prescriptive right that the dam should not be filled with sand brought down in the stream above. That if land-owners above cleared and cultivated their lands, whereby sand was washed down into the creek and accumulated at the head of the pond, and thereby injured plaintiff's lands, that defendants were not responsible for such injury, although such accumulation would not have occurred in the absence of the dam. That if the waters expanded and were extended by accumulation of sand and not by act of defendants, then the jury must find for the defendants. That there was proof that the head of the dam had been at the same place for some forty years before the last trial. That prescriptive rights began to run in favor of dam-owners from time the land above was sobbed by water, so that injury accrued therefrom as against such land-owner. That the offer made by plaintiff and others to defendants, just before this action, to buy out the dam and mills and ten acres of land on each side of the creek, accompanied with the statement that if their offer was accepted it was their purpose to tear out the dam, was strong as an acknowledgment by parties making it of right of defendants to keep the dam as it then stood. He said to the jury, "Would you, gentlemen, raise your dam higher when persons were watching you? Would you do so and risk a lawsuit?"

The requests to charge made by plaintiff and refused by the judge were as follows:

4. That until appreciable injury to plaintiff's lands results, and thus a right of action arises, there can be no prescription in favor of the dam or its effects upon the water above. This he qualified by saying that it would be so in a new case, but that where a prescriptive right is acquired, to that extent it may be kept.

7. That twenty years of user affords a presumption of a grant of license or easement only to the extent and in the state to which there was enjoyment for the whole twenty years; and if any lands of plaintiff have been injured by back water, caused by the dam for the first time within twenty years before action brought for the damage to such lands, plaintiff is entitled to a judgment, although other lands of the plaintiff were *injured more than twenty years before action brought. This request in its first sentence was granted but the remainder as asked was refused, and the jury were instructed that if the lands were contiguous and all belonged to one individual, that injury to one part was injury to all; but if in separate tracts, injury to one tract was not injury to the other tracts.

8. That prescription is only coextensive with the injury done—tantum prescriptum, quantum possessum. This request was granted, with the remark that a prescriptive right was gained to the extent of the possession, when the possession was of that character for which an action could be brought as before stated in this charge.

9. That if plaintiff's lands were injured by defendants' dam for a greater period of time than twenty years, and such injury ceased to exist for more than a subsequent period of twenty years, and the same or other injury again commenced within twenty years before action brought, that the prescription gained after the first twenty years was lost by non-user during the subsequent period of twenty years, and there is no prescription now. This request was granted, but qualified by the additional remark that there would be no non-user if the dam was used.

10. That the plaintiff had a right at any time to dig a ditch in his bottom lands to drain them; that if such ditch was dug and has been rendered useless by back water caused by defendants' dam within twenty years since, that plaintiff is entitled to his damages, if any, from such back-water, although the water may have been for more than twenty years thrown back by said dam as far and as high as when the ditch was rendered useless. This request was refused.

The following requests of defendant were granted:

1. If the jury find that the land now owned by plaintiff has been injured to some extent, however little, if appreciable, for the entire period of twenty years next preceding the bringing of this action, then the fact that the land is now injured to a greater extent than before does not give the plaintiff the right to recover damages unless the greater extent of injury is caused by defendants' raising their dam, or the water *in the dam, by means other than ordinary repairs. This request was granted.

2. If the foregoing stated increased injury does exist, but defendants have not raised their dam, then this increase of injury does not entitle plaintiff to recover damages. This was granted.

6. In no event has the jury a right to give damages upon a finding that the removal of the whole of the dam would benefit plaintiff's land. This was granted.

13. If the jury are satisfied as last above, and that the owners of the dam, now owned by defendants, have, for twenty consecutive years, kept up a dam of the same height and kind as the present one, and that such a dam has been kept up to the present time, then the jury should find for the defendants. This was granted.

14. If the prior owners of defendants' dam did at any time acquire a prescriptive right to keep up a dam of the same height and kind as the present one, and such a dam has been kept up since then to the present time, the fact that plaintiff's land may at any time have been better fitted for cultivation than it was at the time his action was brought does not entitle him to a verdict. This was granted.

15. The prescriptive rights claimed by defendants when once acquired, cannot be lost by their dam having ceased to produce injurious effects for any interval of time after the right was acquired, the dam having remained of the same height in this interval. This was granted.

The exceptions suggest error in these charges made on defendant's request, and in his refusals to charge those above stated requested by the plaintiff. Exceptions to the charge itself, and to the rulings on points of evidence, are sufficiently stated in the opinion.

Mr. R. W. Shand, for appellant.

*Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. This action was brought to recover damages alleged to have been done plaintiff's land by backwater from defendants' mill-dam. The jury found for the defendants on the last trial, from which this appeal comes. On the former trial they failed to agree. The plaintiff grounds his appeal upon numerous exceptions, nineteen in number, assigning errors of omission and commission, refusals to charge on request and in charges made. The appellant in the argument reduces these nineteen exceptions to nine points, one of which (the 7th) was abandoned at the hearing, as we understood. The respondent discusses the case under two heads:

1. The first of the nine heads of the appellant raises the question of the competency of an interrogatory propounded to a witness on the stand for plaintiff, and which was excluded by the judge. The premises involved in the case were situate in Union county, on Thickety and Gilky creeks. The witness on the stand was a resident of an adjoining county, Laurens. "He was asked by plaintiff what effect he had observed upon streams of water in Laurens county following the removal of dams?" The defendants objected, and the question was ruled by the judge incompetent. We think a general question of that kind was irrelevant. The matter under investigation was whether damage had been done to plaintiff's land, located on Thickety and Gilky creeks, miles away from the residence of the witness. Whether the lands on the streams in Laurens were similarly located with reference to those streams, as the plaintiff's land was in reference to Thickety and Gilky creeks, had not appeared; and, even if such had been the case, the question seems to us to be irrelevant. It is difficult to say distinctly what constitutes relevancy, so that a definite rule may be established by which the matter in every case may be at once determined. It must therefore be left in a great measure to the discretion of the presiding judge, subject to the right and privilege of the party to show the relevancy of the question when objected to. We have failed to be satisfied by appellant's argument, or by any authorities referred to, that the presiding judge was in error here.

*2. David Smith, a witness for plaintiff, testified that Alex. Goforth was the builder of a new dam, erected in 1869, in place of an old one, and that Goforth was now dead. He was asked by plaintiff's counsel if Goforth, at or about the time this dam was completed, made any statement to the witness about the height of his dam. The question was objected to, and ruled incompetent. This was an attempt to bring into the case the declarations of one who was not before the court, either as a party or in any other way—declarations made without the sanction of an oath, and without an opportunity to defendant to cross-examine. If this had been admitted, its truth would not have rested on the credibility and character of the witness on the stand, but upon one who could not be put to the usual tests required. Unless it can be made an exception, to have admitted such declarations would have been in direct conflict with the general rule of evidence in reference to hearsay.

In questions of boundary hearsay is competent testimony, and the declarations not only of surveyors and chain carriers, but of other persons, will be admitted, under one of the exceptions to the general rule, excluding hearsay. The declarations of surveyors in the cases of Coate v. Spear, 3 McC. 229 [15 Am. Dec. 627], and Blythe v. Sutherland, Ib. 259, relied on by the appellant, were admitted and properly admitted under this exception. But it would be straining the exception as to boundary lateral very far indeed to admit hearsay testimony as to the height of a mill-dam at a particular time on the ground of boundary vertical. Hearsay testimony has none of the safeguards of truth. We think the door for its admission has been opened wide enough by the exceptions already established, and we have no warrant to extend the doctrine further.

3. Davidson, a witness for the plaintiff, owning lands opposite on Gilky and Thickety creeks, below the plaintiff's, testified that when the Massey dam was built in 1852 he complained to Waddy Thomson, the then owner, now deceased (and through whom defendants derived title), that this dam was higher than the previous one, and that Waddy Thomson said, "Let it stand, and that he would bring it down to its former height when he built again." The next dam was the *Goforth dam, built in 1869. Plaintiff requested his Honor to charge, that if they believed Davidson's testimony, and that the Massey dam was raised, that a prescriptive right for the increased height did not begin to run until the Goforth dam was built. The judge refused.

It is true that an easement cannot be acquired by permissive use. On the contrary, it is founded upon adverse use. It is an enjoyment claimed and exercised as a right; and if, in this case, the witness Davidson had been the plaintiff for an injury to his land, upon such testimony, if believed by the jury, he might have urged with force the proposition contended for by appellant. The prescription as to his land could not have commenced so long as Thomson was exercising the privilege to overflow it by permission. But we do not see how this fact, if true, could protect the present plaintiff. He does not claim through Davidson, and there is no evidence that he gave Thomson permission to raise the dam either directly or indirectly.

4. A short time before action brought the plaintiff proposed to buy the dam, mills, and twenty acres of land of defendants, at $5,000, saying the object in buying was to pull the dam down. His Honor charged that this offer "was strong as an acknowledgment of the right of defendants to keep the dam as it then stood." We do not see such error at law in this as to require redress from this court. This was not a charge upon the facts, and therefore an invasion of the province of the jury. The fact that the proposition to buy had been made was a fact proved by the plaintiff. It was admitted to be a fact in the case, and the judge in commenting on this fact stated to the jury his interpretation of its force and effect. The case of Chandler v. Geraty, 10 S. C. 308, referred to by appellant's counsel, was a case where it was held that a proposition of compromise made by a party to an action was properly excluded as testimony against him, it being the policy of the law to encourage compromises. But here this testimony was brought out by the plaintiff himself. He was responsible for its being before the jury. He made no motion, as we can see, to strike it out. And we cannot say that the construction *put upon it by the judge was so far wrong, as upon that ground, to require of us to prolong this litigation by ordering a new trial.

5. The appellant excepts to certain expressions used by the judge in his charge, to wit, to the following: "Would you, gentlemen, raise your dam higher when persons were watching you? Would you do so and risk a lawsuit?" These are objected to on the ground of conflict with the constitution, Art. IV., § 26, which forbids judges from charging on the facts. It is difficult to lay down an infallible and inflexible rule by the application of which it can be determined, in every case, whether this section of the constitution has been violated. A clear violation is where the judge decides a question of fact about which there is dispute, and so instructs the jury; but where there is no dispute as to the immediate fact testified to, and the question is as to the effect of such fact, it being susceptible of one or more inferences, we do not see that it would be an invasion of the province of the jury for the judge to point out to them the different conclusions which may be drawn, and the circumstances which might incline them to believe the one or the other, reserving his own opinion. We do not know, nor can we say, that the presiding judge in this case intended to do more than this by the questions which he propounded to the jury.

What the judge said as to there being proof that the head of the dam had been for twenty years at the same place, we do not think was in violation of his duty. He did not intend to take that fact from the jury and decide it himself, but we think he used the word proof in the sense of evidence.

6. It is objected that the judge instructed the jury that the use of a dam for twenty years gave a prescriptive right. This charge, without explanation, separated from its connection, and applied whether the use was adverse, permissive, or upon the party's own land, without doing injury to another until very recently before action, would be error; but, if adverse from the beginning, and giving a cause of action to another during all this time, it would be strictly in accordance with the settled law upon that subject. The judge, we think, intended this, because he used the following language: "Though this condition may not have been apparent at first, still the question *is, When did this sobbing commence? Whenever that began which the plaintiff calls injury, the right of action accrued. That from such time it is adverse possession." And then follow: "That if Hope or Thomson, or anybody else, was in possession of the use of the dam in this case for twenty years, they thereby acquired a prescriptive right to use a dam at same place, at same height, and to same extent, as the one so used for twenty years." So it is apparent, when the charge is taken as a whole, as it should be, and not in detached portions, that it is not subject to the exceptions presented.

7. We understand the seventh ground to be abandoned.

8 and 9. These appear to raise substantially the same question, to wit, that his Honor erred in holding that where an easement has once been gained by prescription, that new and different injuries to the servient property, or the rights of the servient party resulting from the use of the easement, cannot affect its enjoyment; that the easement will stand, notwithstanding the new and recent injurious consequences. We think this principle is a correct deduction from the character of easements, and the theory upon which they are maintained. An easement is founded upon a grant which is supposed to have been lost. The grant is understood to have been executed by the party over whose property and rights the easement has been acquired. The twenty years' adverse use is the evidence of the previous execution of the grant. The right to enjoy the easement is therefore conveyed to the grantee, and the grantor is ever afterwards estopped from denying its use by such grantee. The grantor is supposed to have parted with the right for a sufficient consideration, and must take the consequences, present or prospective. There was no error, therefore, in the ruling of the judge as to this point.

In fact, when the charge of the judge is read as a whole, with the direct propositions charged, and the qualifications to the various and numerous requests made of him, compared together, we think, standing as a whole, it was free from any such legal error as would warrant the interposition of this court.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

*RENNEKER v. WARREN.

[1. Adverse Possession ⚡100; Ejectment ⚡20.]

In case of a disputed claim to land not in the actual possession of either party, but held by both under color of title, the well-established principle in this state is, that the older title must prevail.

[2. Evidence ⚡230.]

An admission against interest, as to whose title is the older, made, after a comparison of papers, by an owner of land at the time of a survey of lines between his own and adjoining lands, would be competent evidence against himself and his privies and successors.

[3. Evidence ⚡230.]

But such admission made by a subsequent owner two years before his purchase is the admission of a stranger, and is not competent evidence against his alienees upon a question of disputed title afterwards at issue.

Before Kershaw, J., Orangeburg, May, 1881.

Action by Elizabeth C. Renneker and J. H. Renneker, Jr., her husband, against Auken Warren. Verdict was for defendant. The plaintiffs moved for a new trial on the minutes, and that being refused appealed to this court. Upon the points decided by this court the case is fully stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Walker & Bacot, Lord & Inglesby, and J. F. Izlar, for appellants.

April 17, 1882. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. This action was tried at the May Term of the court, 1881, for Orangeburg county, the venue having been changed to that county from Colleton. It is an action to recover a tract of land lying in Colleton county, containing three hundred and ten acres, some fifteen or twenty of which are enclosed and in cultivation, the remainder being uninclosed and adjoining. As we understand the facts, the trial below, from which this appeal comes, was the third trial, the verdict being for the defendant in each.

*The plaintiff connected herself with a grant from Governor William Moultrie to David Coalter for twenty-three thousand five hundred acres, dated in 1793. She was in the actual possession of a part of this grant and claimed to its full extent. The land in dispute is in the lines of this grant.

The defendant introduced a paper title executed to him in 1867 by Harriet and L. B. Stewart. This deed called for one hundred acres, more or less, bounded on the north by Jennings, east by the same, south by Campbell, and west by Jennings. These boundaries, it is stated, will be satisfied, whether the lines be run to include one hundred acres or three hundred and ten. The occupancy of the land in dispute, according to the testimony of the defence, commenced some forty-five years before the trial. The Robertsons cleared the field, now enclosed, about that time. Then one Robertson went into possession, and after being in the possession of two or three parties, in some way not clearly explained, it finally came into the hands of Duncan Stewart some two or three years before his death, which took place in 1850. The evidence does not show whether these successive parties claimed from each other, or how Stewart obtained possession. It was, at length sold, however, by the Stewarts to the defendant in 1867, and the defendant since then has been in the actual possession of the enclosed fifteen or twenty acres—during this time cutting wood, getting rails and clapboards beyond the enclosure, as it suited him.

It is admitted that the defendant has been in the actual possession of the enclosed portion long enough to protect him under the statute of limitations, and the real contest is over that portion outside of the enclosure, to wit, some two hundred and eighty-five acres. Both parties claim it by being in possession of a part and color of title over the remainder. In such case the well-established principle in this state is that the oldest and best title as to the portion of which each is seized will prevail, and will carry with it the part in dispute. It was said in Sims v. Meacham, 2 Bail. 101, "that where there are interfering claims to land, without any actual possession of the disputed parcel, the possession shall be adjudged to him who has the *right." In Alston v. Collins, 2 Speers, 459, it was held that where there are two possessions in the same body of land, one under a senior and another under a junior grant, the senior title will prevail.

Now, these parties claimed under grants: the plaintiff under the Coalter grant, dated in 1793; and the defendant under a grant, the existence of which was presumed from the long possession of himself and those under whom he claimed, but which had been lost or mislaid. The principle that successive possessions of parties claiming from one to the other for a period of twenty years and over will raise the presumption of a grant is not denied. And although it is denied that there is satisfactory evidence in the case of a continuous and successive possession by conveyances from the Robertsons forty-five years ago down to the defendant in 1867, yet there is no doubt that the possession of the Stewarts and of the defendant has been long enough, independent of the prior possession, to found the presumption of a grant. The defendant relied on this grant.

Under this status, the important question before the jury was, Which of the parties had the senior grant? This being a question of fact, the judge made no ruling upon the subject; but the plaintiffs' first exception assigns error to the judge in admitting certain testimony bearing upon that question.

Paul Warren, a witness for defendant, was permitted to testify that at some time when a survey was made by Mallard and Gavin, the adjoining landowners being present, to wit, Smiley, Robert Black, Stewart, Padget, and John T. Jennings as the representative of his father, John S. Jennings, "that they compared papers, and that Smiley's, Stewart's, and Black's outdated the others. Stewart claimed two tracts—the one he was living on and the tract in dispute.” The jury, no doubt, based their verdict to a great extent on this testimony. Mallard and Gavin were running the Coalter grant, and this testimony was introduced to show that the Jennings papers, under which plaintiff claimed, were junior to Stewart’s, under which the defendant claimed; that the Coalter grant produced by the plaintiff was junior to the one of which the long possession of those under whom defendant furnished the evidence of a prior *issue. This testimony was objected to by the plaintiff upon several grounds: First. Plaintiff objects that at the time of the Mallard and Gavin survey, when this comparison of papers was made, John S. Jennings was not the owner of any portion of the Coalter grant, and was not, therefore, in a position to make admissions as to title derived therefrom, even had he been present at that survey. Second. That John S. Jennings was not present at this survey, and that it was error in the Circuit judge to permit the witness, Paul Warren, to testify that John T. Jennings, the son of John S., was present claiming to be the representative of his father, and that he admitted that the Stewart papers were the oldest, there being no other evidence that John T. Jennings was agent, except his statement made at that time.

The purpose of this survey, as we understand it, was to run the lines of the Coalter grant, and to determine these lines with reference to adjoining owners. Any admission made by an adjoining owner under such circumstances, with papers present and compared, would not only be competent as to the dates of such papers between the parties, but would be binding upon all privies and successors. And if it had appeared in this case that John S. Jennings was at the time of this survey one of the adjoining owners claiming under the Coalter grant, and that he was present either in person or by an authorized agent and made the admission testified to by Paul Warren, then the ruling of his Honor on the subject could not be questioned.

But these important facts seem to be wanting in the evidence. John S. Jennings had not become the purchaser of any portion of this land at that survey. The conveyance to him is dated in 1852, whereas the survey was made in 1850. Under these circumstances, had John S. Jennings himself been present at this survey, we do not see that he could have occupied any other position than a mere stranger, having no power to make admissions or declarations which would be competent testimony in any future proceeding between the parties then present and really interested.

We think, too, that the admission of this testimony was obnoxious to the second objection. The declarations or acts of *an agent within the scope of his agency are the declarations and acts of the principal. This is familiar law. But before it can have application in a special case the agency must be established, and we do not think that this can be done by the declarations of the agent himself. He would be a competent witness if produced, but his declarations made out of court cannot be substituted in his stead.

On both the grounds, then, we think that the testimony of Paul Warren on this subject should have been excluded. This holding will necessitate a new trial, and it will not be necessary therefore to consider the other questions raised on the appeal.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reserved.

Where a defendant gives notice of exceptions, for the purpose of appeal, to an intermediate decree, but not within the ten days prescribed by law, and takes no further steps to perfect an appeal, and the plaintiff brings up his appeal from this same decree, and it is heard and a final judgment afterwards rendered on Circuit, the defendant may then appeal from the final judgment and on such appeal ask a review of the intermediate decree so far as it affects the final judgment.

This is a motion to dismiss an appeal from a final judgment upon the ground that this appellant had given notice of appeal from an intermediate decree in the cause, but had failed to perfect his appeal, thereby waiving it. The notice which was claimed to be the notice of appeal from the intermediate decree was as follows:

"The defendant, Caroline Carson, excepts for the purpose of an appeal to the Supreme Court to so much of the decree of his Honor Judge Pressley as decides that the plaintiff has a valid mortgage on the property mentioned in the pleadings, or any lien thereon superior to the mortgage of Ball to the executors of Carson, which, in the case in the Supreme Court of the United States to which McBurney, the mortgagor, was a party, was adjudged a subsisting mortgage, when McBurney became a purchaser of the property, and prior to the date of the mortgage to the plaintiff's testator.

James Lowndes,

Attorneys for Caroline Carson."

"We acknowledge service of a copy of the within paper, but do not waive our objection to the fact that the time for an appeal has passed.

McCrady & Son.

"September 20, 1880."

Other facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. McCrady & Son. for the motion.

April 17, 1882. The opinion of the court was delivered by Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. In this case the plaintiff respondent instituted an action to foreclose a mortgage covering a tract of land in Charleston county claimed by the defendant Mrs. Caroline Carson by virtue of an alleged older mortgage and a sale thereunder through proceedings in the United States Court. The case was heard first by Judge Pressley in April, 1880. The main question at that hearing was whether the mortgage under which Mrs. Carson claimed had been satisfied.

This question had previously been made in the United States Court as between some of the parties, and had been there decided in favor of Mrs. Carson. But this plaintiff was not a *party to that proceeding. This fact was recognized by the United States Court, and in the judgment which was there pronounced it was expressly declared that the rights of the plaintiff were not concluded thereby. This question then being an open question before Judge Pressley, on the hearing of the case he decided that Mrs. Carson's mortgage had been satisfied and that plaintiff's mortgage was the only lien upon the land. Judge Pressley, however, in deference to the judgment of the Supreme Court of the United States, declined at that stage of the case to order the foreclosure sought by the plaintiff, and instead thereof remanded the case to the master to inquire and report whether or not the plaintiff could, without much expense and delay, make her claim out of other property of her debtor, McBurney & Co. holding in abeyance the order of foreclosure in the mean time.

From this decree the plaintiff appealed, and Mrs. Carson gave notice of exceptions for the purpose of appeal; but this notice was not given within the ten days required, and Mrs. Carson afterwards concluded not to perfect her appeal, being satisfied with the general result of Judge Pressley's decree, or at least preferring to await the report of the master as to the matter referred to him, hoping that this report would release the land from the encumbrance of plaintiff's mortgage by throwing plaintiff on other property of McBurney & Co., and consequently leave the land in her possession. The plaintiff's appeal, however, was perfected and was heard at the last term of this court, upon which hearing this court, assuming the facts found by Judge Pressley to be true, to wit, that the mortgage of Mrs. Carson had been satisfied, and that there was no other lien upon the land than that of the plaintiff, adjudged upon these facts, that plaintiff was entitled to a judgment of foreclosure, and sent the case back to the Circuit Court for such judgment. 15 S. C. 393.

Under this state of facts, the case came up before Judge Kershaw at the last term of the Circuit Court for Charleston county, who, in accordance with the opinion of this court, gave the plaintiff a judgment of foreclosure and ordered the land to be sold in satisfaction of plaintiff's mortgage. From this *judgment Mrs. Carson now appeals, and seeks to contest the questions of fact as to the satisfaction of the mortgage under which she claims found against her in the decree of Judge Pressley, and to which she was then willing to submit because the decree, notwithstanding the findings adverse to her therein, was in its general result satisfactory.

Mrs. Hyatt moves to dismiss this appeal upon two grounds:

First. Mrs. Carson having given notice of exceptions on September 20, 1880, for the purpose of appeal from the intermediate decree of Judge Pressley filed a short time before, and having failed to perfect her appeal by preparing a case, * * * the plaintiff contends that her appeal has been waived as to that decree, and that she cannot now renew it in such way as to contest the facts found against her in said decree.

Second. That the act of 1878 on the subject of appeals, which requires the appellant to give notice of his intent to appeal within ten days. * * * has repealed Section 11 of the code, under which an intermediate order or decree might be reviewed upon an appeal from a final decree; and consequently Mrs. Carson, having failed to perfect her former appeal under the notice which she then gave, has no right now to review the intermediate order of Judge Pressley by an appeal from the final decree of Judge Kershaw.

It appears from the statements in the brief that the notice of exceptions given by Mrs. Carson to the decree of Judge Pressley was not given within ten days after the filing of the decree. The decree seems to have been filed on September 3, 1880, and the notice was not given until September 20. There is nothing said as to whether Mrs. Carson had received written notice of the filing of the decree, but the attorneys of the plaintiff, on accepting service of her notice, incorporated into the acceptance a statement that they did not waive objection to the fact that the time of appeal had passed. We suppose then that Mrs. Carson had received notice of the filing of the decree, and that she failed to initiate her appeal within the ten days required, and consequently she had lost the right to appeal from the decree, as an intermediate order, at that time.

sary to consider the *question as to what would have been the effect had her notice been in time, and no subsequent steps taken. Upon the facts as they exist in the case, the question of abandonment and waiver cannot arise. That question could become involved only where in a case some step had been taken which gave the party the right to proceed further, and without which further action the right gained by the first step would be forfeited or waived. But where the first step is without effect, the failure to follow it up is needless and harmless, as there can be no abandonment until a right attaches.

Here, assuming that Section 11 of the code is still of force, Mrs. Carson had the right to appeal from the decree of Judge Pressley as an intermediate order by giving notice within ten days after written notice of the filing of said decree, and had she given that notice within the required time her appeal would have been initiated; and then a failure on her part to take the next step necessary to perfect it would have amounted to a waiver as to the rights attached. But having failed to initiate the right to appeal from this decree as an intermediate order by notice within the time, her notice beyond the time was nugatory, and her failure to proceed further on that notice amounted to nothing.

We must look at the case, therefore, as an appeal from a final decree, and as if no appeal had been attempted by her from the intermediate decree. Considering the case in that aspect, the important question is, Can she appeal from the judgment of Judge Kershaw as a final judgment, and on that appeal have the intermediate decree of Judge Pressley reviewed? The right to review intermediate decrees on appeal from final judgments is expressly provided for by Section 11 of the code, and unless the act of 1878 has repealed this section, there would seem to be no doubt as to this question, if Judge Kershaw's decree can be regarded as a final Circuit decree.

The decree of Judge Pressley was not a final determination of the rights of the parties. Certain facts were found by him, but there was no final judgment on the merits pronounced. On the contrary, the case was remanded by Judge Pressley to the master, and the future and final judgment was to depend *upon the report subsequently to be made by that officer. At that stage of the case the plaintiff appealed. Upon that appeal the court in effect determined that upon the facts found by Judge Pressley a final judgment of foreclosure should have been then granted by him, and ordered the case back for that purpose. So that the judgment subsequently granted by Judge Kershaw is the only final judgment which has been pronounced in the case, and although this has been pronounced in accordance with the opinion of this court on the former appeal, yet it is not the judgment of this court in the sense that it has finally determined the rights of the parties, as the judgment of a court of last resort from which there could be no appeal.

The former appeal was from an intermediate order referring the case to the master for further report as to certain facts. The then appellant denied the necessity of this reference, and claimed that the decree at that time and upon the facts then found should have been a final decree of foreclosure. This court sustained this view of the appellant, and sent the case back for such a decree, which now having been pronounced by the Circuit Court, must be regarded as a final decree of that court, from which Mrs. Carson has the right to appeal under the general law authorizing appeals from final judgments, and unless Section 11 of the code has been repealed by the act of 1878, upon this appeal to have reviewed the findings of the Circuit judge in any intermediate decree affecting this judgment.

Now, has the act of 1878 repealed Section 11 of the code? We find in the act the usual repealing clause only, to wit, "That all acts and parts of acts inconsistent herewith are hereby repealed." There is no express repeal in terms of section 11, and if this section has been repealed, then it has been done by implication. Repeals by implication are not favored. Scurry v. Coleman, 14 S. C. 166. Construed under the light of this principle, is there such inconsistency between the two as that they cannot stand together? Section 11 provides that appeals may be taken from any intermediate judgment, order, or decree involving the merits, and from final judgments, provided, if no appeal be taken until final judgment, the court *may upon appeal from such final judgment review any intermediate order or decree necessarily affecting the judgment not before appealed from. The act of 1878 provides that in every appeal from matters contained in judgments or decrees at chambers * * * the appellant must give notice of his intention to appeal within ten days after written notice of the filing of said decree, * * * otherwise the right to appeal is lost.

The respondent contends that where a party desires to appeal from an intermediate order or decree he cannot await the final decree, but must appeal at once from the intermediate, because of the provision in the above act as to the ten days' notice of intent to appeal required to initiate the appeal. To illustrate by the facts of this case. The intermediate decree of Judge Pressley, which the appellant desires to have now reviewed, was filed in February, 1880; the final decree of Judge Kershaw September 9, 1881. The respondent claims that the act of 1878, having provided that in every appeal * * * the appellant must, within ten days after written notice of the filing of the decree appealed from, give notice of his intent to appeal, and the appellant not having given this notice as to the intermediate decree of Judge Pressley has lost her right to have this decree reviewed by the court, by appeal from the final decree of Judge Kershaw.

We do not concur in this view for several reasons. The act of 1878 was not intended to limit or curtail the right of appeal existing before the passage of the act, but its purpose was to prescribe the mode and manner of inaugurating and perfecting appeals; and although it does use the language "that in every appeal * * * the appellant must give notice of his intent to appeal within ten days after he receives written notice of the filing of the decree which he desires to appeal from," yet this was not intended to deprive parties of any rights as to appeals which they previously had, but simply to prescribe what was necessary to be done as a first act where a party intended to appeal.

For instance, before the act of 1878, parties under Section 11 of the code could appeal from an intermediate decree when pronounced, or they could let that rest, and, awaiting the final *decree, appeal from that. Now, the true meaning of the act of 1878 is that when an appeal is intended from either the one or the other of such decrees, the appellant must give his notice within ten days after the written notice to him of the filing of the decree, either intermediate or final, from which he desires to appeal. He loses his right to appeal in either case by failing to give this notice, and the right is secured in either case by giving it; and when thus secured in either, it is secured with all of its incidents.

Now, one of the incidents which belongs to an appeal from a final judgment is the power which is conferred on this court by the proviso to Section 11 of the code to review on such appeal any intermediate decree or matter which may have led to or affected such judgment. This review, as it will be observed from reading the proviso, is not a right conferred upon the parties so much as it is a power given to this court, and it is a very important and necessary power. Without it, appeals would be multiplied, causes delayed, and this court, being unable to look into the very matters which may have caused errors in the final judgment, rendered powerless to correct them. The legislature scarcely intended to limit this court in this respect, and cut off this important power of review in such indirect and obscure manner.

The decree of Judge Kershaw is a final decree of the Circuit Court. Mrs. Carson has complied with the act of 1878, by giving notice, within the ten days, of her intent to appeal, and by the preparation of the other papers required by that act. This brings the appeal properly before this court. When here, though she did not appeal from the intermediate decree of Judge Pressley, yet if it has affected the final judgment of Judge Kershaw, under the proviso of Section 11, we have the power to review it. The case of Pringle v. Sizer, 7 S. C. 131, does not, in our judgment, conflict with this conclusion. That case decided that where a party appeals from a later order, leaving the first unaffected, he is concluded as to the first. There are no such facts in this case; Mrs. Carson's attempt to appeal was from a former order, not a later one, and the principle of Pringle v. Sizer does not apply.

*The act of 1878, as decided in Scurry v. Coleman, 14 S. C. 168, and Rogers v. Nash, 12 Ib. 560, relied on by respondent, as we have already stated, has reference only to the mode and manner of appeal, initiating and perfecting it, and not as to the matter from which an appeal may be taken, or as to the powers of this court, when the appeal reaches it. Nor does it in any way conflict with Section 11 of the code, or the important proviso thereto attached.

It is the judgment of this court that the motion to dismiss the appeal be refused, and it is so ordered.

Plaintiffs presented a petition for rehearing, alleging that the decree of Judge Pressley was filed September 3, 1880, in vacation, but that notice of the filing of the decree was not served upon Mrs. Carson's attorneys until September 11, and that therefore her notice of appeal served September 20 was within the ten days required by law. Mrs. Carson answered this petition denying that she or her counsel had ever received from the executors of Hyatt, or their counsel, notice of the filing of Judge Pressley's decree, but that she had received such notice from the clerk of court on September 3, 1880.

May 12, 1882. The following order was passed:

PER CURIAM. It is ordered that this petition be dismissed. It is true that this court, in refusing the motion made at the last term to dismiss the appeal, understood, as stated in the petition, that Mrs. Carson failed to give her notice of intent to appeal from the intermediate decree of Judge Pressley within the ten days required by the act of 1878, and upon a re-examination of the brief we do not see how the court could have reached any other conclusion. Whether this was the fact or not, the parties do not seem now to agree. But be that as it may, we do not see that the result should be changed. Because, while it may be admitted that a failure by Mrs. Carson to take the next step after her notice of appeal given in time would have waived her appeal from the decree of Judge Pressley as an intermediate decree, yet she was not bound to appeal from that decree as an intermediate decree. And we do not think that a failure to do so, or a waiver of her privilege in this respect, would have forfeited her right to appeal from the judgment of Judge Kershaw as a final judgment in the case, subject to the power on the part of this court to review upon such appeal any intermediate decree affecting said judgment.

[NOTE.—Under a strict construction, the notice given by Mrs. Carson on September 20, 1880, might be treated as a notice of exceptions taken to that decree, and not a notice of intention to appeal therefrom in advance of the final judgment. It is not designated as a notice of appeal, nor does it use the language of Section 2 of the act of 1878, but is in the very words of the first section, "Excepts for the purpose of appeal to the Supreme Court." Every exception to an interlocutory order or intermediate decree of a Circuit judge is taken for the purpose of appeal, inasmuch as only the Supreme Court can consider such an exception. It would seem to be proper practice and prevails generally, it is believed, to take exceptions to intermediate decrees and put them upon the record, although there is no intention of then appealing. When the final judgment is rendered and appeal is then taken, the "case" will show that errors in the judgment resulting from errors in interlocutory orders and decrees in the cause were duly excepted to at the proper stages, and again excepted to as embodied in the final judgment. That exceptions to such an order should be taken at the time seems to be contemplated by Section 290 [292] of the code of procedure. It is somewhat analogous to exceptions taken to the rulings of the presiding judge upon questions of evidence, where witnesses are examined before him in a case in chancery. His decree may not be filed for two months afterwards; it would then be too late to note exceptions to such rulings at the hearing, but if taken within proper time they would come up to this court in the appeal taken from the decree.

It should be observed that in this case the respondents did not make the point that the appellants could not now except to the final judgment because that the alleged errors in such judgment were matters already passed upon in the intermediate decree, to which no exceptions were taken; but the motion is based solely upon the failure to perfect at the time an appeal from the intermediate decree, notice of appeal having been given and then abandoned. To this point the opinion of the court must be considered as responsive, for it was the only point made by the motion. Respondents and appellant both treated the notice of September 20 as a notice of appeal, and as such the court considered it in connection with the act of 1878 and Section 11 of the code. Section 11 of the code relates to appeals, not to exceptions.—REPORTER.]

Before Aldrich, J., Lexington, February, 1881.

This was a petition for homestead presented by Mrs. Carrie S. Lewie, widow of Dr. F. S. Lewie. Dr. Lewie died in June, 1873, considerably in debt, but it does not appear that there were any judgments against him. The most valuable part of testator's lands were sold in 1874 by the executors under a power in the will. In March, 1875, an action in the nature of a creditor's bill was instituted by H. H. Geiger against S. P. Drafts and D. J. Griffith, as executors of the will of Dr. Lewie. It does not appear that there were any other parties to this action except those named, but creditors were called in. It was in this action that Mrs. Lewie presented her demand for dower in 1876, and received its equivalent out of the proceeds of sale. Nothing seems to have been done in the cause after 1876 until this proceeding, although still open on the dockets. The petition for homestead was entitled in the same cause. The summons is dated January 15, 1880; the petition is without date. Both summons and petition were served May 13, 1880.

The Circuit decree granted the prayer of the petition, and the executors of Dr. Lewie appealed.

Messrs. H. A. Meetze, H. W. Rice, for appellants.

Messrs. T. S. Arthur, G. T. Graham, contra.

Lewie, late of Lexington county, died in June, 1873, possessed of considerable property, real and personal. At the time of his death he owned a homestead at Summit in said county. This homestead was occupied by one of the appellants, and Lewie boarded with this party. He left a will in which, after providing for the payment of his debts and one or two special legacies and devises, he gave one half of the rest and residue of his estate of every kind to his wife, the respondent, to whom he had been married about a month before his death. The appellants and the respondent were nominated as executors of this will; the respondent renounced and the appellants qualified.

Shortly after his death the respondent left the county and found employment in Washington city, in the Treasury Department of the United States Government. She was under the impression that the estate was solvent, and that she would ultimately realize something from the will. Creditors, however, commenced proceedings and the estate turned out not only heavily indebted, but insolvent, and under a proceeding which had been originated in 1875 to marshal assets, etc., she came in by petition and obtained the sum of $1,437.50 in lieu of dower in the real estate of her husband. In the mean time the creditors had sold the whole estate, except a tract of land in the county containing some 200 acres, known as the Hall or Black Allmon tract, worth, it is said, about $300; a lot in Summit, of little value, given in the will to one W. F. Oswalt; and one third interest in a small lot of five acres in or near Columbia. At the sale made by the executors in 1874 the homestead at Summit was bought by the appellant Drafts for $1050. Drafts has since sold this property to J. H. Lewie for $500. Subsequent references have developed the fact that the appellants as executors have paid for the estate something over $6000 more than they have received.

This was because they were sureties on many of the debts due by the estate.

Under these circumstances the respondent filed her petition in the Circuit Court in May, 1880, for homestead. The matter was referred by Judge Hudson to a referee for a full report of all the facts connected with the estate, reserving the question of the jurisdiction of this court over the matter of assignment of homestead. Under this reference a report was made with a mass of testimony, which at the next term came up before Judge Fraser, who recommitted the report for further testimony, with instructions "to report any facts bearing on the right of homestead and the value thereof."

The referee made a second report in January, 1881, in which with other facts, not material here, he stated that the respondent left Summit very soon after the death of her husband in 1873, and since that time has resided elsewhere, with no intention to return; that she had claimed and received dower; that the executors had been in constant communication with her and had never received intimation of her purpose to claim homestead until this proceeding.

This report, with certain exceptions by respondent, came to a hearing before Judge Aldrich, who, finding as matter of fact that the respondent had not left the county permanently and had not abandoned her home, adjudged and decreed that she was entitled thereto, and ordered the executors, appellants, to set her off a homestead both real and personal. The precise property out of which this was to be done was not specified. The defendants executors have appealed, assigning error in the decree of Judge Aldrich on several grounds; but from the view which we take of this case it will be unnecessary to state or consider these grounds.

In our opinion the Circuit Court was without jurisdiction of respondent's petition in its inception. This question does not seem to have been distinctly made below or in the argument here, but in our examination we have reached the conclusion that the Circuit Court had no jurisdiction, and therefore no appeal upon the merits could properly come before this court. It is therefore useless for us to pronounce any judgment upon the legal questions involved. The Court of Common Pleas is the general fountain of justice, and where the rights of a citizen, either derived from the common law or the statutes, are invaded and the power to protect is conferred upon no special jurisdiction, he may seek redress in that court. But where rights are created by statute, to be obtained and protected in a special manner specified in the act by a *special tribunal, no other court can assume jurisdiction. On the contrary, parties interested must pursue the course prescribed, and must seek the aid of the tribunal upon which the power to grant or protect has been conferred. Howze v. Howze, 2 S. C. 232.

Now under the homestead acts all power in cases involving the rights to widows and children as to homesteads is conferred upon the Probate Courts in the first instance. The petition to obtain it must be made to that court, and the act prescribes the machinery to be adopted by which that court may have the homestead marked out, defined, and set off, and the mode by which the judgment may be made binding on the parties interested. On the other hand, none of these powers are conferred upon the Common Pleas Court. Parties are not authorized to petition that court, nor is it invested with the power to appoint appraisers and put in motion the other machinery necessary to mark out and define the homestead required by the acts made and provided in such cases.

Our conclusion, therefore, is that the petition of respondent, whatever may be the merit involved or the rights of the parties, had no foundation in the Circuit Court because of the want of jurisdiction on the part of that court, and the case should have been dismissed.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed, and the case be remanded with instructions to dismiss the petition for the want of jurisdiction, without prejudice to the rights of the petitioner in such proceedings as she may hereafter institute, as she may be advised.

[NOTE.—The doctrine of this case is in accord with the decision of the court in Kennedy v. Reames, 15 S. C. 552. In Howze v. Howze, 2 S. C. 232, there was no special tribunal designated, and therefore the Court of Common Pleas had jurisdiction under the principles here declared by the chief-justice. See, too, Adger v. Bostick, 12 S. C. 64. In decisions upon the homestead laws, however, care must be taken to note which one of the many statutes on this subject the court is considering. In this case, for instance, the court construes the act of 1873 (15 Stat. 372), which is not now of force. By Section 8 of that act the head of any family, widow, or children, entitled to an estate or right of homestead, and where no process had been lodged with any officer against such homestead, might make application to the judge of the Probate Court, and all subsequent proceedings in the matter were to be had in that court. In the subsequent act of 1880 (17 Stat. 516), however (now of force as Section 2002 of the General Statutes), the application is to be made to the master or clerk of court, and all proceedings after the filing of the return by the appraisers are to be had in the Circuit Court. In the act of 1873, and also in the statute now of force, this right of application to the master or clerk (formerly probate judge) can be made only where no process has been lodged with any officer against such homestead. In the principal case no such process had been lodged. What is the proper mode of procedure where such process has been lodged in the sheriff's office but no action is being taken to enforce it by reason of the creditor's indulgence,—or because, the debtor being dead, his estate is being administered in the Court of Equity, and the claim of homestead is there asserted in the answer of the widow, or children,—must be settled by some future case.—REPORTER.]

Plaintiff brought action for damages and recovered a verdict. Held, that the judge committed no error in this case in charging the jury that defendant must show a grant from the State, or a chain of titles for twenty consecutive years.

Before Hudson, J., Laurens, February, 1881.

Hon. THOMAS B. FRASER of the Third Circuit sat in the place of the chief justice, who had been of counsel in the cause.

This was an action by James W. Watts against L. W. C. Blalock for five hundred dollars damages. The opinion states the pleadings and some of the facts of the case.

*The testimony shows that this guano house was built by plaintiff in 1875 by permission of the Laurens Railroad Company. The house was eight feet from the track and its rear not over forty feet from the road-bed; it was enclosed by a fence, except on the side towards the railroad track. Plaintiff testified that he built the house to be exclusively used for guano which he ordered and owned; that when given up by him it was to be the property of the railroad company; that he was agent of the railroad company at Martin's Depot, and also an agent for the sale of guano. "The guano came upon my own order, it came on railroad as freight and was paid for as freight. The railroad had no title to nor interest in it. No reservation was made in the sale of the Martin place. * * * Guano was not then stored in the depot; all that came was stored in this house of mine. The house was then used by and was a benefit to the road."

The judge thus reports his charge:

At the conclusion of the argument the court was asked by the plaintiff's counsel to charge as follows:

"That it is necessary for defendants to connect themselves with grant from state or twenty years' possession to prove title." I charged as follows: That he who defends a trespass to realty on the ground that he is the owner in fee, must show a perfect title, and that can be done only by tracing his title back to a grant from the state, or by showing such possession by citizens of the state as will presume a grant, and from such must derive his title.

The counsel for defendant made the following request to charge:

1. That railways take only an easement, or right of way, in lands through which they pass.

2. That railways take only such interest in the soil through which they pass as may be required for the purposes of construction, for meeting the wants of the public in connection with the railway, and that the interest so taken cannot be diverted to any other purpose.

3. That the guano house, not being used for the purposes and not being under the control of the Laurens Railroad, and the *plaintiff having admitted that he is not the owner of the land lying on either side of said railroad and around said guano house, the plaintiff cannot recover.

The first and second were charged as correct; the third was refused.

In my charge to the jury I instructed them, among other things, that the defendant, Blacklock, having justified the ousting of the plaintiff from the guano house, and his forcible possession and occupation thereof, by alleging in himself title to the Martin place, it devolved upon him to make good his plea of liberum tenementum. To do this he must either trace his title back to a grant from the state, or failing in that, he should show a presumptive grant, i. e., he should show that for twenty years or more some one or more of the citizens of this state have occupied and used this land adversely to the state and the world. That this twenty years' adverse possession against her by her citizens in any order of continuous occupation, created the presumption of a grant; and that from some one of these successive occupants the defendant must derive title. The fact is, however, that I did not regard the question of defendant's title as the serious issue in the case, nor do I think it gave much concern to the jury. Admitting him to be owner of the fee, the real question was as to his right to seize the house.

The jury were also instructed that the company's right of way was an easement, the proper use of which the owner of the fee could not disturb. That the erection of the guano house on the right of way so near the company's depot and so near the track, under license from the company, to be used in relief of the depot, for storing guano, and to be turned over to the company so soon as the plaintiff ceased to use it as such, was not such a violation of the proper use of the right of way by the company and by the plaintiff as authorized and justified the seizure and occupation of the house by the defendant to the exclusion of the plaintiff. In doing this the defendant became a trespasser, and liable in damages. The question of the amount of damages, as all other questions in fact, were left to the jury.

*Mr. J. W. Ferguson, for appellant.

Mr. Justice FRASER. This is an action of trespass alleging that the plaintiff was in possession of a certain "guano house" on the line of the Laurens Railroad, in the town of Martin's Depot, in Laurens county, claiming $500 damages for a trespass by defendant, and costs. The defendant after putting in issue all the allegations of the complaint alleges that he "on the first Monday in October, 1877, bought a tract of land commonly known as the Martin place, at Martin's Depot, in said county and state; that on said tract of land and on and near the line of the Laurens Railroad is a "guano house," and it is to this house this defendant supposes the plaintiff to make reference in his complaint. This defendant alleges that the said Martin place was sold by C. L. Fike, as sheriff of Laurens county, at Laurens Court House, on the day aforesaid, without any reservation of any kind, and was purchased by the said defendant as aforesaid * * * "that the said guano house at the time he made the purchase of the said Martin place was enclosed by the fencing on said place, and is so surrounded by the lands of said place as to render it impossible for any one to use the said guano house without the consent of this defendant."

It appears from the "case" before this court that A. P. Martin died in 1862 and that in November following this tract of land containing about 900 acres was sold as his property under proceedings in partition, and was purchased by Kitty G., his widow, who gave her bond with sureties for the purchase money. She afterwards intermarried with plaintiff, J. W. Watts. This bond was given to the commissioner in equity, and when that office was abolished was transferred to the custody of the clerk of the Court of Common Pleas. Ira W. Rice, the clerk, commenced proceedings to foreclose the statutory lien, to which action the said Kitty G. and her husband, the plaintiff, were parties defendant. Under the decretal order in this case the Martin tract was sold in October, 1877, *and purchased by the defendant, L. W. C. Blalock. The "guano house" had been built on the right of way of the Laurens Railroad by the plaintiff, with the permission of the authorities of the railroad, and was in the possession of the plaintiff, who was using it for storing guano for which he was agent at the time defendant entered and took possession. The jury found a verdict for plaintiff for $500, and defendant appeals from certain rulings of the presiding judge.

The first exception is as follows: 1. "Because, it is respectfully submitted, in view of the nature of the cause and the testimony adduced, that his Honor erred in ruling that it was necessary for the defendant to show a grant from the state or a chain of title extending through twenty years to the Martin place." As a general statement of a principle of law we think that there was no error in the ruling of the presiding judge on this point. Add, Torts, § 446. There is, however, a qualification of this proposition which defendant claims to have existed in this case, and the second exception is as follows: 2. "Because the Martin place having been sold, and bought by the defendant at a prior civil sale under proceedings to foreclose a statutory lien, it is respectfully submitted that his Honor erred in ruling that the defendant must show a better title to said Martin place than the deed of the sheriff who executed the order of the court." There are some cases where the party to an action upon whom is the burden of proving title to real estate can rely upon the doctrine of estoppel instead of going into the proof of his title by showing a grant or a presumption of a grant and thence by regular chain of conveyances. Such are the cases where it appears that both parties claim title from a common source, or where one claims under some judicial proceeding to which the other has been a party or a privy. In the latter cases the matter in issue in the cause before the court must have been at issue in the former proceeding, the benefit of which is sought. Now in the case at bar, it appears that the Laurens Railroad had been built many years before the sale for partition of the Martin estate, and had acquired the right of way over the land on which this guano house stands.

The Laurens *Railroad Company has never been made a party to any of the proceedings in reference to this Martin place, and cannot be in any way concluded by it; and even if J. W. Watts, the plaintiff, has been concluded as to any other interest in the Martin place in consequence of his having been a party to the proceeding to foreclose the statutory lien, it is difficult to see how he can be in any way concluded in reference to the right of way in regard to which he has never been impleaded. The claim of the Laurens Railroad Company is paramount to that of the heirs of A. P. Martin and those who have their title. In this case plaintiff claims title under the Laurens Railroad Company which was entitled to possession of the locus in quo.

But the defendant in this case claims that if plaintiff is not concluded by the sale under the case of Ira W. Rice, Clerk, v. J. W. Watts and wife, that under the circumstances of this case he had a right to enter and take possession of the "guano house," as appears by the third exception, which is as follows: 3. "Because, it is respectfully submitted, his Honor erred in refusing to charge the jury as follows: 'that the guano house not being used for the purposes and not being under the control of the Laurens Railroad, and the plaintiff having admitted that he is not the owner of the land lying on either side of the railroad, the plaintiff cannot recover.'"

It was entirely proper that the presiding judge should refuse to charge "that the guano house not being used for the purposes and not being under the control of the Laurens Railroad." This was a question of fact for the jury. Again, it does not follow, that because the plaintiff admitted that he was not the owner of the land on either side of the railroad, that the defendant was the owner, and had the right to dispossess him. It does not follow, if all these facts be assumed in favor of defendant, and it be admitted that he is the owner of the fee, and that this guano house was used by the plaintiff for storing guano for sale which had been shipped to him as an individual that plaintiff could not recover in this action.

The defendant is here under the same allegation as to title as was the plaintiff. In Evans v. McLucas, 15 S. C. 67. In that case, instead of defending plaintiff brought the action to *recover a house built on the right of way of the W. C. and A. Railroad by permission of the company as a warehouse for the purpose of receiving guano, etc., from the cars. Plaintiff held the fee, and this court held that she could not recover the house either as a fixture or as personality. The charters of the two companies as to this point are substantially the same. If the defendant in this case had brought his action against the plaintiff, he could not have recovered on such a title as he has shown in this case, and he cannot be allowed to put himself in a better position by committing a trespass on the plaintiff. The right of possession is a very sacred one, and the court will not allow the repose which it gives to be endangered by giving improper advantages to a trespasser. If defendant had a good title he should have resorted to the courts, where he could have obtained any redress to which by law he was entitled.

It is therefore ordered and adjudged that the exceptions be overruled, the judgment of the Circuit Court affirmed, and the appeal dismissed.

A judgment obtained against an executor de son tort in a misconceived action against him to have the lands of the intestate applied to the satisfaction of an unenrolled decree rendered during the intestate's lifetime, did not so merge the intestate's debt as to destroy the bond upon which the whole proceeding was founded.

The force of a decision of the Supreme Court upon a point fully argued with all the testimony before it is not affected by the statement of the justice who wrote the opinion that "no exception had been taken to this finding of fact," when in truth an exception had been taken by one of many parties to the cause.

Before Thomson, J., Charleston, June, 1880.

This is the second appeal in this case; the first will be found reported in 12 S. C. 9, and should be read in connection with the opinion here.

The report of the referee, G. D. Bryan, Esq., the Circuit decree, and the opinion of this court fully state the case. The referee's report was as follows:

This case having been remanded to the Circuit Court by the Supreme Court, has been again referred to me by an order of date, June 26th, 1879, as follows:

"Ordered that the decree of the Supreme Court herein be filed with the clerk of this court, as the decree and judgment of this court; and that the decree heretofore rendered herein be set aside where inconsistent therewith and opened in other respects to the extent necessary to modify it in accordance therewith. Ordered further, that George D. Bryan, the referee heretofore appointed in this action, do inquire into such matters of fact or law as are opened by the said decree, and that he do report thereon, with the testimony taken before him, with leave to report any special matter to this court. It does not appear to the court that the alienation of a part of the real estate necessarily operates to bar the equity of redemption under the *circumstances in this case, and that the creditors of Mary Raymond have a possible interest therein. The motions to dismiss the complaint as to A. G. Rice, and the estate of Poincignon for this and other reasons are refused without prejudice."

I beg leave respectfully to report that I have held a number of references under this order, at which all the parties to the cause were before me, and have taken testimony which is filed herewith.

Upon a motion made to restrict the new evidence as to whether, prior to the commencement of this action, the mortgages set up by way of defence to sustain the plea of bona-fide alienation as against the rights of the creditors of the ancestor, commenced to operate by way of transferring the legal title from the mortgagors to the mortgagees by reason of the mortgagors being out of possession at any time prior to such suit, I ruled that under the decision of the Supreme Court, the testimony should not be restricted to this point alone, but that evidence would be admitted upon any point made in the case. To this the plaintiff excepted.

I. The complaint in this case was filed on January 17th, 1876, by John D. Warren, on behalf of himself and all other creditors of Mary Raymond, deceased, who should come in and contribute to the expense of this action. The object of the bill was to subject the real estate in the hands of H. H. Raymond, the heir of Mary Raymond, deceased, to the bond debts of Mary Raymond. The prayer was for judgment for the amount of the debt due to the plaintiff, for an injunction against numerous parties holding mortgages of the heir and judgments against him, for the marshaling of the assets of the estate of Mary Raymond, and the calling in of her creditors to prove their claims in this cause, for the appointment of a receiver of her estate, for the distribution of her estate according to law, and for such other relief as might be proper. The parties defendant in this action are H. H. Raymond, the heir-at-law, and after his death his heir-at-law and his executor, and S. Lord, Jr., administrator of Mary Raymond, deceased, and the creditors holding the mortgages of H. H. Raymond, the heir-at-law, on the property of the ancestor, *and those holding judgments against him the said H. H. Raymond.

On May 8th, 1876, a motion for preliminary injunction and receiver was made, but was refused, and notice of appeal was given by the plaintiff, but the appeal was not prosecuted, as an order of injunction was subsequently granted as hereinafter stated.

On May 8th, 1876, the court granted leave to the plaintiff to amend his bill by inserting allegations as to the insolvency of H. H. Raymond, and ordered a reference of the case to the undersigned to take an account of the debt due to the plaintiff on the bonds set forth in the complaint, with instructions to call in by advertisement all the creditors of Mary Raymond, to prove their claims against her estate, on or before June 10th, 1876, and to report a correct statement of such debts with their relative priorities, and also to inquire into all the issues of law and fact raised in the pleadings, and especially of the estate, real and personal, of the said Mary Raymond. No exception was taken to this order. The creditors of Mary Raymond were called in by notice as directed and inquiries as required by the order duly made. It was admitted that Mary Raymond left little or no personal property. The real estate set forth in the bill comprised practically her sole estate.

Henry H. Raymond, the heir of Mary Raymond, died May 31st, 1876. Rosalie Raymond, his heir, was duly made a party to the cause, and by S. Lord, Jr., her guardian ad litem, answered the complaint. On February 3d, 1877, the defendant Wm. M. Thomas was by order in this case enjoined from proceeding with the sale of the Waverly House, then advertised for sale under a levy under his execution. On February 20th, 1877, Samuel Lord, Jr., executor of Henry H. Raymond, and administrator of Mary Raymond, was made a party defendant, and answered that he had received no assets of his or her estate to be administered. On February 21st, 1877, a decretal order was made in this cause, enjoining the defendants and all others, the creditors of Mary Raymond, and Henry H. Raymond, from proceeding further in any action then commenced, or from instituting any proceeding other than in this action, to

The creditors of Henry H. Raymond were called in to prove their claims on or before April 5th, 1877. The real estate was ordered to be sold; the referee was directed to inquire into the liens claimed on said property in connection with the other matters and issues referred to him; the equity of redemption of all parties was barred, and all questions both as to the validity of plaintiff's claim, or otherwise, were transferred from the property to the fund. This order was moved by the plaintiff and consented to by Messrs. Simonton & Barker, Buist & Buist, A. G. Magrath, J. Barrett Cohen, H. L. P. Bolger, Asher D. Cohen, Pressley, Lord & Inglesby, and DeSaussure & Son, representing certain of defendants herein. On April 12th, 1877, the property was offered for sale, and with one exception, to wit, the property at the corner of Pitt and Wentworth streets, was bid in by the parties holding mortgages thereon. On December 7th, 1877, the first report of the undersigned, as referee, was filed, and on December 11th, 1877, plaintiff, by A. T. Smythe, his attorney, filed exceptions to his said report, that the referee had erred both in his conclusions of law and fact as therein reported.

Since the remanding of this case to me, to wit, on the — day of July, 1879, Messrs. Simonton & Barker called attention to the fact, that Peter Thomas, Stephen Thomas, Mary L. Thomas, and William Henry Thomas, were necessary parties to the proceedings, and asked that such proceedings be amended, and that they be joined as defendants. I so ruled, and the parties have duly filed their answers herein. To this ruling of the referee, the defendant, William M. Thomas, excepted.

II. The following claims against the estate of Mary Raymond have been proved before me:

First. The three bonds of the plaintiff, John D. Warren, set up in the complaint, amounting with interest, on January 1st, 1877, to six thousand four hundred and fifty-one 46-100 dollars. These were the joint and several bonds of Mary Raymond, with Henry H. Raymond as security. They were past due at the death of Mary Raymond, but interest had been paid on them up to that time. Warren testified that when he loaned her the money, it was understood that as long as the interest was paid he would not ask for the principal. After her death the interest was paid by H. H. Raymond, and a payment was made as late as November 20th, 1874, on account of the interest on these bonds. On November 10th, 1875, Mr. Raymond accepted Mr. Warren's draft for six hundred and ten dollars, giving receipt, when paid, to be in full of interest on his bonds to January 1st, 1875. This draft matured on January 5th, 1876, and was not paid. This action was commenced on January 17th, 1876. Mr. Warren, the plaintiff, does not live in Charleston, but in Colleton county, and testifies that he had no actual knowledge of the mortgages by Henry H. Raymond. He states that he regarded Mr. Raymond as a man of large means, but that he always looked to the estate of Mrs. Mary Raymond for the payment of his debts.

Second. The bond held by B. J. Whaley, trustee, for forty-two hundred and forty-one dollars, which is also the joint and several bond of Mary Raymond and Henry H. Raymond of date June 1st, 1859, payable on June 1st, 1864, with interest from May 31st, 1876, the date of H. H. Raymond's death. Henry H. Raymond was entitled to the interest of this bond during his lifetime, and the trustee claims interest only from the day of his death. Some question has been made as to the time when this bond was proved before the referee. I do not see that it is material. Mr. Whaley was examined on May 4th, 1877, as a witness, but not to prove the bonds. No exception has, up to this time, been taken as to the time when the bond was proved in the case, and I report as finding of fact that it was properly and duly proven in the cause before me.

Third. The judgments of William M. Thomas which are fully set out in my former report herein. I am requested to find the fact that on November 29th, 1873, the execution of William M. Thomas was levied on the Waverly House; and I so find.

*These are the only claims against Mary Raymond proved before me. The mortgage to Charles Astor Bristed, mentioned in a former report, has been foreclosed, and the property sold separately, and there is no proof before me of any deficiency. The several mortgages and judgments against Henry H. Raymond have been fully stated in my former report.

The bonds held by the plaintiff were past due many years before the death of Mary Raymond. The last receipt on the bond, for twenty-five hundred dollars from Mrs. Raymond, was on November 27th, 1861. All the receipts from this time until December, 1869, were to M. and H. H. Raymond, and all receipts from December, 1869, were to H. H. Raymond. On the one for sixteen hundred dollars there appears in May, 1866, a receipt to Mrs. Raymond for three hundred dollars, on account, and receipts from M. and H. H. Raymond of dates January 31st, April 1st, and December 4th, 1867, and January 14th, 1869. Subsequent receipts are found to H. H. Raymond for payments on account of said bond. And on the bond for fifteen hundred dollars there appears a receipt to Mr. H. H. Raymond of one hundred dollars on account of interest, and five hundred dollars on account of principal of said bond. I am requested to report, as matter of fact, that in a certain cause in bankruptcy, In re William McLean, bankrupt, there appears the name of William L. King, agent, as one of his creditors for rent. William L. King, agent, accepted the composition in that case, and gave his receipt for the amount offered in compromise. The order calling the meeting to submit the proposition to the creditors in this case was of date February 10th, 1877. The resolution accepting the composition was on February 23d, 1877, and was signed, amongst others, by W. L. King, agent, representing one hundred and seventy-five dollars. The order to show cause why the composition should not be confirmed was dated March 23d, 1877, and the order confirming the same was dated March 29th, 1877.

21st, 1863, in the clerk's office of *Greenville county. William M. Thomas testified that the only proceedings in the United States Court to subject the judgment of Thomas proved in this case, to the bankrupt estate of William M. Thomas, is the proceeding entitled Joseph Glover against William M. Thomas and A. Blythe, assignee, which proceeding has been dismissed by the District Court, and there has been no appeal from the order dismissing the same.

III. In construing the opinion of the Supreme Court and the order of reference under which I am acting, it seems to me that the only question upon which a new inquiry is desired, is whether, as to any of the mortgages in question, the mortgagor was out of possession. The decree herein, confirming Simons v. Bryce, has decided that a mortgage is not an alienation under the statute, so as to defeat the claim of the bond creditors of the ancestors, and that to amount to an alienation the mortgagor must be out of possession, so that the Act of 1791 does not apply. This was not the view of the referee and the court below, but the Supreme Court says: [Here follows an extract from the former opinion as found on page 25 of 12 S. C. Reports.]

It has been urged in argument, however, that while the Supreme Court has decided that a mortgage is not an alienation, and, therefore, the defendants, mortgagees, cannot claim as alienees the benefit of the exemption under the statute, that they are entitled to be protected as bona-fide purchasers for valuable consideration without notice, and that one object of the Supreme Court in remanding the case as it has done, is to enable them, the defendants, mortgagees, to make such claim before the Circuit Court, and there derive the benefit thereof.

I cannot agree with this view. In the first place, had the Supreme Court desired to give to the mortgagees the benefit of any such claim, there was no necessity of remanding the case to the Circuit Court for that purpose, as the facts on that point were all before it. But in the next place it seems to me that the Supreme Court has definitely passed on the position contended for, and has decided the question adversely to the defendants, mortgagees. In my former report, in considering the point whether the bond of the ancestor took precedence of the mortgages of the heir, I found as follows: "This question is settled by the recent decisions of the Supreme Court of this state, in one of which, Richardson v. Chappell, it is held that under the statute 3 and 4, W. and M., and 5 George II., Chap. VII., lands purchased from a devisee are not liable for the debt of the devisor, when the purchase was bona fide, for valuable consideration and without notice; and in the other, Haynesworth v. Bischoff, it is held that a mortgagee of lands is a purchaser within the meaning of the rule which protects a purchaser for valuable consideration without notice." This finding was affirmed by the Circuit Court, but the Supreme Court held otherwise, saying: "The fundamental proposition upon which the Circuit decree rests is at variance with the recent decision of this court in Simons v. Bryce." The Court then proceeds to reconcile the decision in case of Simons v. Bryce, with the decisions in the cases of Chappell v. Richardson, and Haynesworth v. Bischoff, and after commenting on the doctrine of purchaser without notice for valuable consideration, as laid down in the last-mentioned case, says: "This was far from involving the question of the legal defence of alienation under the statute of 3 and 4, W. and M., nor does it preclude the Court of Equity from giving the same construction to that defence as a court of law would give when arising before it from the provisions of the statute. The Circuit decree is erroneous to the extent that it rests upon the proposition just considered."

*172

Besides this, in the case of Simons v. Bryce, after quoting from Haynesworth v. Bischoff, the Supreme Court says: "But in this case the mortgagees do not, and could not, invoke any such equitable doctrine, but rely upon the express provisions of a special statute, and by that statute they must stand or fall. The claim which they resist does not rest upon a mere equity, as in Haynesworth v. Bischoff, but it is a plain legal right; lands in the possession of an heir or devisee being liable at law for the debts of the testator or ancestor."

IV. The main question then remaining is whether the mortgage, H. H. Raymond, was as to any of these mortgages out of possession at any time prior to the commencement of this action. I shall consider these mortgages seriatim.

First. The mortgage to Mrs. Anna Dora Fleming, so far as it covers 280 King street, and the mortgage to William J. Gayer, so far as it covers the house and lot in Wentworth street. There is no evidence before me that the mortgagor was out of possession in either of these cases, and no claim to that effect is made. Mrs. Fleming claims, however, that inasmuch as the money loaned by her went to pay up a prior mortgage to Hannah Butterfield, dated October 21st, 1869, she is entitled to the benefit of that date and to the amount of that mortgage in the event that the mortgages contribute in inverse order to the payment of debts of Mary Raymond. I find that she is not so entitled.

Second. The mortgage held by Mrs. Eliza S. Hopkins, Mr. Brawley, solicitor of Mrs. Hopkins, after testifying as to his intercourse with H. H. Raymond with reference to this property, states that there was no change of possession, and I so find as matter of fact.

Third. The mortgage held by Douglas Nisbit, guardian. In this matter the decree for foreclosure had been signed on January 6th, 1876, eleven days prior to the commencement of this action. No sale was made, however, under such decree until June 6th, 1876, with full notice of this action then pending, and to which Nisbit was in fact a party. The property was bid in at the sale by Nisbit, the mortgagee. I find that as to this mortgage the mortgagor was not out of possession prior to the commencement of this action.

Fourth. The mortgage held by Mrs. Ellen Barker, trustee, on 262 King street. There is no evidence that the mortgagor was out of possession of the mortgaged premises, and I so find. It is contended, however, that the premises were mortgaged a second time to Mrs. Anna Dora Fleming, and, therefore, the equity of redemption of the mortgagor was gone, and the mortgagor was out of possession. Without entering into a discussion of this point, the statutes, when construed together, do not warrant any such interpretation, and the law has long since been repealed as obsolete.

*174

*Fifth. The mortgage held by John C. Ojeman and Albert Bischoff, executors of Otjen. The same claim as to the legal effect of a second mortgage, made in this instance to W. J. Gayer, is pressed here; but, as I have already stated, the position is, in my opinion, untenable.

Evidence has, however, been introduced by these defendants, mortgagees, which, they claim, proves that so far as W. J. Gayer, mortgagee, was concerned, H. H. Raymond was out of possession. The assignments of the rents of these premises, by Raymond to Gayer, has been discussed by the Supreme Court in its opinion as follows: [Here follows extract from former opinion, 12 S. C., 25.]

Under this opinion I am to find "the act and intent of the parties," and whether "the mortgagor surrendered possession." Mr. Gayer's testimony was objected to under Section 415 of the code. He is a party to the action, and, in my opinion, comes within the terms of that section. His testimony, however, is only concerning his acts and intents. There is nothing to show that Mr. Raymond ever knew or consented to or understood this alleged possession. From all the testimony it appears that Mr. Raymond, Mr. Gayer, and Mr. W. L. King were close and intimate friends. Mr. King collected rents for Mr. Raymond for other property. When the mortgage was given, Mr. Gayer testifies that Raymond "gave him the paper referred to" to fully secure him, and for the tenants in his houses to pay over the rents to him. The assignment itself, the only evidence now of what was the intent of Mr. Raymond, recites that it is given "in order to the further security of his bond." Mr. Gayer continued the collection of the rents, through Mr. King, who collected rents for other of Raymond's property, as agent. He never mentioned to Mr. Raymond that he was doing that which might cause him to think he exceeded what was expressed in the paper assigning the rents, and endeavoring to take possession of the property. He never returned the property for taxation, which he says he would have done had he considered it his own, but did pay part of the insurance on it. Mr. King's testimony is very vague as to Mr. Raymond's knowledge of what was being done, and goes only *to the effect that he collected the rents for Mr. Gayer, turning it over to him, and is under the impression that Mr. Raymond knew that the rents for 342 and 344 King street were being paid over by him to Mr. Gayer. He made one lease, as agent for Mr. Gayer, and as agent made a composition in bankruptcy with one of the tenants on account of rent due, and paid the money to Mr. Gayer. This composition, however, was not made until February, 1877, after this action was commenced.

The whole testimony shows that Mr. Gayer did just what, under the assignment, he had a right to do, and that is to collect and secure the rents from the King street property, and shows nothing more. He employed an agent, and the payment of the rent to him, if known by Raymond, was only what was contemplated by the assignment. There is no allegation or proof that either Gayer or King, his agent, was acting adversely to Raymond, or that Raymond ever contemplated or agreed to anything more than the collection of the rents and the retaining of the same by Gayer. In my opinion there is no testimony, even admitting that of Mr. Gayer, to prove that the mortgagor, Raymond, surrendered possession of the mortgaged premises to the mortgagee, Gayer, or that it was the act and intent of Raymond, as one of the parties, so to do, and I so find and report.

Sixth. The mortgages held by the executors of Poincignon and by A. G. Rice. It is insisted that, under the opinion of the Supreme Court, all questions as to the mortgage of Rice are decided, and that the mortgaged premises are free, and discharged from all claim. A motion was made before the Circuit Court to dismiss the complaint as to the defendant, Rice, but was refused, as set out in the order referring the case back to me. In my opinion, the matter is before me for examination and report. The Supreme Court bases its decision in this matter upon the findings of fact in my former report, and say: "These findings do not appear to have been excepted to, and must stand as final." As heretofore reported, the plaintiffs excepted both to the findings of fact and law in my former report herein, and duly filed such exceptions.

have been passed *upon, it remains to be decided whether it was such an alienation under the statute as to defeat the creditors of the ancestor. The taking possession by Mr. Rice consisted in his attorneys notifying the tenants of the Waverly House and stores not to pay rent to any one but themselves, giving to them as the reason the power to enter contained in the mortgage. It is admitted that at the time this notice was given, the attorneys of Mr. Rice knew of the Warren debt, and that suit was to be brought thereon, and that they were hastened by such knowledge in giving such notice and in attempting to take possession. When the mortgage was taken by Mr. Rice, his attention was called to the judgment of W. M. Thomas, and under the advice of counsel he declined to lend as much as he otherwise would have done, had not the Thomas's judgment been a cloud upon the title. The purpose of taking possession was to defeat the Warren debt, of which the attorneys for Rice had notice, and even an absolute conveyance made under such circumstances would be void. Lowry v. Pinson, 2 Bail. 324 [23 Am. Dec. 140]; Ashmead v. Hean, 13 Penn. St., 584.

After a careful consideration of the questions connected with the property mortgaged to Col. Rice, and the executors of Poincignon, I find that they were not bona fide aliened before action brought, and that the mortgagor was not out of possession so as to defeat the claims of the creditor of the ancestor.

V. It is claimed that the plaintiff should not recover in a Court of Equity, because he has been guilty of laches in not sooner bringing his action; that if he had, these mortgages would not have been given and the mortgagees would not have been misled by his silence. The claim of the plaintiff is a legal demand, such as Courts of Equity always enforce and recognize. There is no presumption of payment. The interest was paid up to the date of Mrs. Raymond's death, and afterwards until a short time before action brought. These mortgagees knew that they were dealing with an heir as to the lands descended, with property of an estate which had not been settled up, and that there were bond debts of the ancestor outstanding, held by Thomas and Bristed. No devastavit has occurred by reason of the plaintiff's not bringing suit heretofore, as there was no personal estate from which the debt of plaintiff might have been paid. This point has been decided, however, in the case of Simons v. Bryce, above referred to. In my opinion, therefore, the objection is not well taken. The claim of the plaintiff and other bond creditors is a plain, legal right. He was not bound to sue sooner than he did, and his debt being valid and of force, cannot be set aside on the ground of laches, and I so find.

VI. It is admitted that in contributing to the payment of the debts of the ancestor, the lands last mortgaged shall be first liable for such debts, and I so find.

I therefore respectfully report from the above findings of fact and of law, that the plaintiff, John D. Warren, and B. J. Whaley, trustee, and the defendant, W. M. Thomas, having established bond debts of the ancestor, Mary Raymond, are entitled to be paid out of the proceeds of the property set forth in the pleadings herein, and mortgaged by Henry H. Raymond, her heir, and that in the application of such proceeds the property last mortgaged be first exhausted, and so in inverse order until the said bond debts be fully paid.

The case came up before Judge Thomson, in June, 1880, on exceptions to the referee's report, and in March, 1881, his Honor filed the following decree:

The referee, in his second report states: "These are the only claims against the estate of Mary Raymond, proved before me." These are the three bonds of the plaintiff, Warren, the bond held by B. J. Whaley, trustee, and the judgment of William M. Thomas. The presumption is, that these are the only debts against her estate, and that the various bonds of H. H. Raymond, secured by mortgages, are his individual debts. That, in fact, the contracting of the debts of H. H. Raymond, was contemporaneous with the dates of the mortgages, which were all given after the death of Mary Raymond. And so of the judgments recovered against him.

A glance at this condition of the case discloses the vantage ground held by the creditors of Mary Raymond. Generosity must yield to right, and the creditors of Mary Raymond are entitled to payment from her estate before the creditors of H. *H. Raymond, who takes by descent, can claim any part of her property. This view must prevail, unless the creditors of Mary Raymond have, by some act of theirs, lost their rights, or the creditors of H. H. Raymond have acquired by his or their act some right which enables them to hold as valid the liens they have obtained. This they allege they have done, and claim that the mortgages to them are alienations under the Statute of William and Mary, and that they are entitled to hold the property by virtue of this law.

There is a decision of the Supreme Court in this case, which, in great part, is directory. It becomes, therefore, the duty of the Circuit Court to be guided by that decision, and ascertain what has been determined. The first, and, certainly, by far the most important point, is the question, whether a mortgage is an alienation under the Statute of William and Mary. In speaking of the mortgage to Gayer, the court says: "If, on the other hand, the mortgagor surrendered possession of the mortgaged premises to the mortgagee, then the mortgage must be regarded as an alienation. As the true issues were not presented under the view taken by the referee and the Circuit Court, it appears advisable that this question of fact should be passed upon by the Circuit Court under the view presented herein. The same question is raised as to other defendants, and is subject to the same observations, and should be disposed of in like manner."

It is obvious, then, that as to all the defendants, who are mortgagees (one excepted), a question of fact must be decided by the Circuit Court, that is, Was the mortgagor out of possession of the mortgaged premises at the time of the commencement of plaintiff's suit? to wit: Was the alienation complete, so that the mortgage deed had finished its office as a security, and had become by its tenor and the act of the parties, a simple conveyance? In other words, the condition of the mortgage deed must, by the acts or agreement of the parties, become satisfied or extinguished, and leave the conveyance to have its full effect, according to its terms. A surrender of possession to complete an alienation can only be by act of the mortgagor, who declares thereby that the condition of the mortgage shall *be regarded extinct, and the conveyance absolute. The referee in his report enumerates the several mortgages given by H. H. Raymond, and finds as a fact that the mortgagor was in possession of all the realty included in them.

Two of these mortgages, however, are affected by facts which are not found in connection with the others. In the case of the mortgage to W. J. Gayer, it is said that the mortgagor "in order to secure the mortgage given by H. H. Raymond to W. J. Gayer, required the tenants of the property covered by the said mortgage to pay over the rents thereof to the said W. J. Gayer." So far from there being a surrender of possession with a view to terminate the mortgage, the intent of the parties was by paying the profits of the property to the mortgagee to make the security more ample. This surely was no surrender of the possession.

As to all these mortgages, including that to executors of Poincignon and excepting that of A. G. Rice, the court concurs in the findings of the Referee, that the mortgagor was in possession of the property mortgaged.

The mortgage to A. G. Rice stands upon a different ground from that of the others. The question of possession by the mortgagor in relation to the other mortgages, was sent back to the Circuit Court, that certain issues of fact might be considered by the court. As to this mortgage, the Supreme Court declares that "the findings of fact of the referee are sufficiently full to present the question." The court says, it is clear "that the mortgagor was out of possession * * * at the time of the commencement of the present suit." The court then proceeds to state that where a power of entry is given upon condition broken, to take and hold possession with the rents and profits, the mortgagor, this power being exercised, is "clearly out of possession by his own act," and in such case the mortgage has the effect of one at common law, and constitutes an alienation under the Statute of 3d and 4th William and Mary. "As to such alienated premises, the plaintiff cannot follow the land." This language is plain enough to show that the Supreme Court decided the case as to the mortgage of A. G. Rice. And their explicit language that the findings of fact by the referee—not *excepted to—must stand as final, with their conclusions of law, must be obligatory upon the Circuit Court.

The claim of W. M. Thomas originated in a note under seal given by Mary Raymond for $7000, dated August 26th, 1863, and to secure it she gave a mortgage of same date. Much dispute had arisen touching this debt as to its character—whether a judgment with a lien or without, and how it should rank with other debts. The Supreme Court, after discussing the character of the claim, says: "That at all events the decree of Chancellor Carroll must be regarded as liquidating the debt in favor of W. M. Thomas against Mary Raymond during her lifetime." So that if the debt by specialty is not merged in a judgment, the sum is ascertained upon the basis of the original contract. This places the debt in the same rank as the debts of the plaintiff and Whaley.

But it is claimed that the debt is due in judgment, and should rank as such with the rights of a judgment. Is it a debt by judgment, and was there a judgment in the lifetime of Mary Raymond? The Supreme Court declines to give it the rank of a judgment, and whilst refraining to pronounce it no judgment, as a subject not properly to be considered by the court, by its reasoning manifestly leads to such conclusion. As between creditors in a creditors' suit, questions as to the rank of the several debts presented may be made. Manifestly, whilst abstaining from an opinion that the debt of W. M. Thomas is not in judgment, the court refuses to assign it this rank, but places it as a liquidated debt by specialty. The dissenting opinion or note of Mr. Justice Haskell is full of meaning, evidently implying that the matter had been considered by the court, and that he was of opinion the debt should rank as a judgment. It is enough that the opinion of the Supreme Court has been expressed with sufficient clearness for the referee and Circuit Court to conform to such view.

The main question in this case is, Shall the debts of Mary Raymond, as proved before the referee, be paid in full before the creditors of H. H. Raymond receive any part of theirs from the estate which passed to him by descent? This is the view of the referee, and, with the exception of the property *mortgaged to A. G. Rice, the Circuit Court concurs in that result. As to the judgments against H. H. Raymond, all obtained, as appears, after his mother's death, they never could be more than a lien upon his interest in the property formerly his mother's. The reality whilst in his possession was held in trust for her creditors, if needed for payment of debts. The questions made in favor of the mortgagees as alienees could not be made for them.

In the present condition of this case, the court has no information which would enable it to order a sale or disposition of the property for the payment of the debts of plaintiff, of B. J. Whaley, and of W. M. Thomas. This much, however, may be declared, that these debts stand in the same rank and are to be paid in full from the property of Mary Raymond, of which she was the owner at her death—or pro rata, if there be not property enough to pay them in full.

An attempt to declare the rights of the creditors of H. H. Raymond by mortgages and judgments would certainly be premature. The conduct of the case in these and other particulars must be governed by orders hereafter obtained.

It is ordered, adjudged, and decreed, that the exceptions of the several parties to the second report of the referee be overruled, and the said report be made the judgment of the court in all particulars, except that part relating to the debt or mortgage of A. G. Rice. The objection that this question has been decided by the Supreme Court is sustained, and the report of the referee upon this point overruled.

The exceptions to this decree are too voluminous (sixteen pages) for insertion, and the points raised by them are clearly stated in the opinion.

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. Mrs. Mary Raymond died intestate in February, 1869, possessed of a considerable estate, consisting for the most part of valuable improved lots in the city of Charleston. She had little personal property, and at first there was no administration on her estate. She left one son, her only child and heir, Henry H. Raymond, who, upon the death of his mother, took possession of all her estate, without paying her debts. He was himself largely indebted, and to secure his creditors, from June, 1870, to July, 1875, he executed sundry mortgages upon the real estate of which his mother died seized; and the numerous complications of the case have arisen in different ways out of the struggle whether the real estate which belonged to Mary Raymond at her death, and went into the possession of H. H. Raymond as her heir, shall go to the payment of the debts proper of the mother or the son, of the ancestor or the heir.

On January 17, 1876, John D. Warren, as owner of certain joint and several bonds of Mary Raymond, and H. H. Raymond, commenced this action against H. H. Raymond, there being at that time no administration upon the estate of Mary Raymond, alleging that Mary Raymond died seized of considerable real estate, which went into the possession of H. H. Raymond, who executed sundry mortgages of the said real estate, to secure his creditors, leaving his mother's debts unpaid; that a number of these mortgages had instituted foreclosure suits, and that separate sales of the mortgaged property would result in its sacrifice; that there were also a number of judgment creditors of H. H. Raymond, some of whom were seeking by separate proceedings to sell the property above described; that debts due the plaintiff, and other creditors of Mary Raymond should be paid from her estate, in preference to any due by H. H. Raymond by judgment, mortgage, or otherwise. Plaintiff prayed judgment for the debt due him, that the creditors of Mary Raymond should be called in; that the property should be sold, receiver appointed, etc.

William M. Thomas, among others, was made a defendant and answered, claiming that he had recovered judgment against Mary Raymond in her lifetime for $3265.62, which was duly enrolled January 30, 1868; that execution thereon was lodged in the sheriff's office of Charleston, December 16, 1868, and that after a credit, the balance of said judgment was still due. The other defendants holding mortgages of H. H. Raymond, with more or less of difference in their respective claims, insisted that the debts of Mary Raymond should not be paid in preference to those of H. H. Raymond, out of the real estate of which she died seized, which, by operation of law, descended at her death to H. H. Raymond, her heir; that he bona fide aliened the same by way of mortgage to them respectively before action brought against him for the debts of his mother Mary, and that they were purchasers for valuable consideration without notice. They denied the validity of the judgment of William M. Thomas, and alleged that it belonged to A. Blythe, as assignee in bankruptcy.

On May 8, 1876, a motion for preliminary injunction was made and failed, but the court granted to the plaintiff leave to amend his complaint charging the insolvency of H. H. Raymond, and appointed George D. Bryan, Esq., special referee, with instructions to call in by advertisement the creditors of Mary Raymond.

Henry H. Raymond died testate May 31, 1876, and on February 20, 1877, Samuel Lord, Jr., qualified as his executor, and answered for his only child and infant heir, Rosalie C. White, nee Raymond, and administered on the estate of Mary Raymond. These new parties having been made, the proceedings assumed substantially the double aspect of an action in the nature of a bill to marshal the assets of Mary Raymond, and to make land in the possession of the heir liable for the debts of the ancestor.

*On February 3, 1877, the defendant, Thomas, was enjoined from proceeding with the sale of the Waverly House, then advertised for sale under levy of his execution, and on February 21, 1877, a decretal order was passed by consent enjoining all creditors of H. H. Raymond, ordering them to be called in, directing all the mortgaged property not already in the court for foreclosure to be sold, and the proceeds of sale instead of the lands to await the event of the litigation.

The referee then called in by publication the creditors of both Mary Raymond and H. H. Raymond to present and prove their demands. The following were presented against the estate of Mary Raymond:

First. John D. Warren, the plaintiff, being the claim on joint and several bonds of Mary Raymond and H. H. Raymond, on which the action was founded.

Second, W. M. Thomas, claim of judgment before referred to, as to which, being made a defendant he had answered asking affirmative relief. It seems that this alleged judgment against Mary Raymond was rendered at Greenville by Chancellor Carroll, in a suit to foreclose a mortgage January 22, 1868. The decree ordered that if the amount found due by the commissioner in equity was not paid before salesday in March, 1868, that the lands should be then sold, the purchase money credited, and the decree enrolled for the balance. The decree purports to have been enrolled January 30, 1868, before the day of sale, and the land having been sold in December, 1868, execution thereon was issued subject to the credit for the purchase money of the land, and lodged with the sheriff of Charleston, December 14, 1868.

This case went to the old Appeal Court, 15 Rich. 86. It appeared from the record in the case that the decree was upon a sealed note or bond of Mary Raymond, secured by the mortgage aforesaid upon a house and lot in Greenville, and that after the death of Mary Raymond, H. H. Raymond was made a party defendant, under the supposition that he was the executor of his mother, and various proceedings were had against him, and finally, September 20, 1872, Judge Orr rendered judgment against him as executor de son tort of Mary Ray*mond, from which there was an appeal to the State Supreme Court, which was dismissed. 4 S. C. 352. From this decision an appeal was taken to the Supreme Court of the United States, and the case is reported in 91 U. S. 712 [23 L. Ed. 434]. Judgment against H. H. Raymond was entered at Greenville November 17, 1873, pending the appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, and a transcript lodged in Charleston November 29, 1873, and execution issued and levied on the Waverly House as the property of H. H. Raymond.

Third. B. J. Whaley's claim as substituted trustee under marriage settlement of H. H. Raymond and his wife, on joint and several bond of Mary Raymond and H. H. Raymond, June 1, 1859, payable in July, 1864. This bond was in the possession of H. H. Raymond from 1864 to 1875, placed there by the trustee for safe keeping. The trustee was not a party to the proceedings, and had made no effort to collect the same, and the claim did not appear until it was presented under the call by advertisement in the case. No payments were credited, but the interest is only claimed since the death of H. H. Raymond. The precise day on which it was presented and proved did not appear, but the referee reported the claim as proved in his report of December 7, 1877.

It seems that the claim of the executors of Charles Astor Bristed against Mary Raymond had been paid by foreclosure of mortgage given by Mary Raymond, and there was no claim for any deficiency.

The following claims were presented against the estate of H. H. Raymond:

1. Ellen Barker, trustee, debt secured by mortgage bearing date June 28, 1870; 2. Maria S. Hopkins, debt secured by mortgage bearing date Nov. 25, 1870; 3. Albert Bischoff, as surviving executor of John C. Otjen, debt secured by mortgage bearing date Jan. 15, 1872; 4. Douglas Nisbit, guardian, debt secured by mortgage bearing date July 15, 1872; 5. Anna Dora Fleming, debt secured by mortgage bearing date July 1, 1873; 6. Executors of E. Poincignon, debt secured by mortgage bearing date August 14, 1873; 7. Wm. M. Thomas, judgment before referred to as recovered at Greenville against *H. H. Raymond as executor de son tort of Mary Raymond. This judgment, as stated, was entered at Greenville, Nov. 17, 1873, pending appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, and what purported to be a transcript of the judgment was lodged in Charleston county Nov. 29, 1873, and levied on the Waverly House. 8. A. G. Rice, debt secured by mortgage bearing date June 1, 1875; 9. W. J. Gayer, debt secured by mortgage bearing date July 21, 1875; 10. John Fisher, trustee, two judgments on demands against H. H. Raymond alone and not secured by mortgage June 8, 1874; these judgments were assigned to Samuel Lord, Jr.; 11. People's Bank of South Carolina, judgment April 6, 1875. These three last judgments were released by Mr. Lord, and the bank respectively in favor of A. G. Rice at the time of the execution of the mortgage to him by H. H. Raymond. There were other claims which need not be specially referred to.

The referee, December 7, 1877, made a report stating the facts very fully, and deciding that the Thomas judgment was a lien on all the property of Mary Raymond in Charleston and had priority over all the claims now before the court, and that the different mortgages, at their respective dates and in regard to the lands covered by them, were bona-fide alienations of H. H. Raymond before action brought against him. Exceptions were filed and the case was heard by Judge Wallace, who confirmed substantially the referee's report. From this decree there was an appeal to this court, which on the main point reversed the decree below holding that a mortgage of the heir-at-law of land inherited is not such an alienation within the meaning of 3 & 4 W. & M., 2 Stat., 533, as will defeat the claims of decedent's creditors so long as the mortgagor retains possession; but when upon condition broken, the mortgagee takes possession of the land under a power given in the mortgage, or the mortgagor is otherwise out of possession, the mortgage thereupon operates as an alienation. 12 S. C. 9. The court then remanded the case for further proof saying: "In consequence of the conclusion of the referee and the circuit judge just referred to, it became unnecessary for them to decide whether the mortgages set up by way of defence to *sustain the plea of bona-fide alienation as against the rights of the creditors of the ancestor commenced to operate by way of transferring the legal title of the mortgagor to the mortgagees, by reason of the mortgagor being out of possession, at any time prior to the commencement of this action. There are, therefore, no such findings of fact and conclusions of law on that point as to bring the case before us for a final decree. * * * We can, therefore, do no more than to lay down the principles that should govern such findings, so far as we are enabled to state them from the facts before us."

Accordingly, the case went back to the Circuit Court, and by order was referred again to the same referee, who, under the direction of the judgment of the Supreme Court, took testimony upon the question of fact referred back and made a second very full report February 12, 1880, giving all the testimony and holding that as matter of fact the mortgagor, H. H. Raymond, was not out of possession of the premises mortgaged as to any of the mortgages, including that of A. G. Rice, and that Warren, Whaley, and Thomas were bond creditors of Mary Raymond, and as such entitled to the proceeds of all the lands of which Mary Raymond died seized and which were mortgaged by H. H. Raymond; the proceeds of the lands to be appropriated in the inverse order of the dates of the mortgages covering the same, and applied equally to the said claims until paid, and if not enough to pay them in full, then to be applied pro rata as in due course of administration.

Exceptions were filed to the report and the case came on to be heard by Judge Thomson, who overruled all the exceptions to the report, except that which assigned error in opening the judgment of the Supreme Court in regard to the mortgage of A. G. Rice, as to which he held that it was finally adjudicated by the Supreme Court. From this decree all parties appealed to this court. The exceptions are numerous and voluminous, and in some instances the same points are made by different parties, so that we will not attempt to follow them seriatim, but endeavor to consider them all in connection with the different claims.

versy belonged to *Mary Raymond and at her death descended to her heir, H. H. Raymond, who mortgaged it in different parcels to secure his own creditors; and now the question is whether it is liable for his or her debts. It is certainly the law that the property of a debtor shall go to the payment of his own debts in preference to those of any other, and the case of ancestor and heir is no exception. The creditor of the ancestor without judgment or mortgage has no lien upon the property either before or after the descent cast; but the heir is bound as of his own obligation for the debts of his ancestor. While the heir is not a technical trustee for the creditors of the ancestor as to the property cast upon him by descent, that property itself is liable for the ancestor's debts while it remains in his possession, and at least until it loses by partition or otherwise the character of assets to be administered, may be actually levied and sold under executions against the personal representative of the ancestor. If however, the heir, before action brought against him for the debt of the ancestor bona-fide aliene the land, his own personal liability to the extent of assets descended still remains; but the land itself cannot be followed by the creditor of the ancestor into the hands of the innocent alienee. It thus appears that the important point is whether there has been bona-fide alienation by the heir before action brought. The former judgment in this case, following decisions previously made, decided that a mortgage alone, which under our law is generally a mere security for a debt, is not such alienation as is contemplated by the Statute of 3 & 4 W. & M., 2 Stat. 533.

To constitute such an alienation it is necessary that the mortgagor should be out of possession, and as the Circuit Court had not considered most of the mortgages in that aspect, the case was remanded that testimony might be taken and the judgment of the Circuit Court rendered upon that subject. "As the true issue was not presented under the view taken by the referee and Circuit judge, it seems advisable that the question of fact should be passed upon by the Circuit Court under the views presented herein. * * There should be an inquiry as to the various matters of fact opened hereby and *the decree modified to conform to the principles already laid down. The decree of the Circuit Court should be set aside where inconsistent herewith, and opened in other respects, or to the extent necessary to modify it in accordance with the foregoing."

The first general question is as to what was decided by the former judgment, for we cannot reconsider what was there decided. The principle of res adjudicata is one of the most important in the administration of justice; for the peace and order of society require that there should be an end of litigation. As was said by a distinguished English judge: "Human life is not long enough to allow matters once disposed of being brought under discussion again; and for this reason it has always been considered a fundamental rule that when a matter has once become res adjudicata, there shall be an end of all question about it." The principle is that the decision of a court of competent jurisdiction upon a point which was considered or should have been considered as necessarily involved, is final and conclusive. All the questions made were decided by the former judgment, except only those which are expressly left open, and such as necessarily arise out of them.

It must be considered as decided by the former judgment that the plaintiff John D. Warren, and B. J. Whaley, trustee, are bond creditors of Mrs. Mary Raymond, not barred by laches, lapse of time, or the statute of limitations, and that action was brought by Warren and Thomas against the heir, H. H. Raymond, on January 17, 1876, and that their claims being legal demands both against Mary Raymond, the debtor, and H. H. Raymond, the heir, to the extent of assets descended, are not affected by the equitable defence of purchaser for valuable consideration without notice. Although the judgment does not so declare in express terms, we think that what it did expressly decide necessarily included also the question reargued at the bar with so much zeal and learning, namely, that inasmuch as a mortgage was an alienation in 1712, when the statute of W. and M. was made of force here, it necessarily retained, so far as the construction of that statute is concerned, the same character as an alienation down to the formal repeal *and re-enactment of that statute by the general statutes in 1872. The statute of W. and M. made no reference to a mortgage as being or not being an alienation. The words used were "sell, alien, or make over," and a mortgage was at that time an alienation, for the reason that it was in effect a conveyance, and the title after condition broken was in the mortgagee. Because it happened that at that time the nature of a mortgage was such as to fall within the terms of the statute and work an alienation, it does not follow that the character of a mortgage must remain the same and that the legislature could not change it. As soon as the lawmakers saw fit to change the nature of a mortgage, as our legislature did in 1791, the question whether in its new form it fulfilled the requirements of the statute was a new question, to be decided not by what a mortgage was in 1712, but by its character as then existing.

We do not understand that Judge McIver announced a contrary doctrine in Simons v. Bryce, 10 S. C. 354. In answering this very argument he said: "It is argued that as a mortgage was undoubtedly an alienation at the time of the adoption of the statute of W. and M. (1712), that statute ought now, notwithstanding the subsequent changes in the nature of a mortgage, still to be construed as embracing a mortgage. There might be some force in this argument but for the fact that this statute has been re-enacted in the General Statutes, and the same terms, so far as the question under consideration is concerned, are retained, although the phraseology in other respects is changed." Judge McIver meant no more than to say that the argument could have no application to that case.

It must also be considered that the former judgment decided, Judge Haskell dissenting, that the decree of William M. Thomas against Mary Raymond, at Greenville, never was enrolled as a final judgment, so as to give a lien upon her property in Charleston. One of the elements of confusion in the case has been the anomaly of two judgments claimed to exist against different persons originating in the same demand. When Wm. M. Thomas obtained his decree against Mary Raymond in Greenville, in 1868, if it had been legally enrolled as a final judgment, notwithstanding the military orders, and execution *lodged in Charleston, any of the property of Mary Raymond might have been sold under it, whether before or after her death, in the possession of H. H. Raymond or any one else. It is not perceived why it was thought necessary to amend the proceedings after decree, by making H. H. Raymond a party, under the mistake that he was the executor of his mother. Such proceedings were, however, instituted, and after much litigation and several military orders and injunctions, judgment was finally recovered before Judge Orr, September 20, 1872, against H. H. Raymond as executor de son tort of Mary Raymond, and after appeal to the Supreme Court of the state, entered November 17, 1873, pending appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States. It happens that H. H. Raymond was the heir of Mary Raymond, but it does not seem to us that such an unusual proceeding against him as executor de son tort can be regarded as the formal action against the heir for the debt of the ancestor, contemplated by the statute of W. and M.

This judgment also failed to acquire a lien upon the property in Charleston. It was finally entered in Greenville November 17, 1873, when, by law, a judgment did not of itself constitute a lien upon real estate. Such lien could only have been acquired at that time under the code of procedure by a levy under an execution issued to enforce the judgment, and by filing a certified copy of the execution with proper certificate thereon in the office of the Register of Mesne Conveyance of the county. That was not done in Greenville. Without stopping now to consider several alleged irregularities therein, a transcript of the judgment was filed in Charleston on November 29, 1873, and execution issued and levied on the Waverly House. But still the requirements of the code necessary to give a lien were not then complied with.

It is said that the code was amended so as to make a judgment a lien November 25, 1873, and a transcript being lodged after that date, viz., November 29, 1873, became a lien without the formalities as to recording levy required by the code. The words of the amendment are, "Final judgments hereafter entered," etc.; that is to say, not the transcript of the judgment but the judgment itself, which in this case was entered at Greenville before the ratification of the amendment, and therefore was not covered by it. Since that amendment, the only way in which a lien can be acquired upon a judgment rendered after March 1, 1870, and before November 25, 1873, is in the manner pointed out by that amendment, viz., by requiring the defendant to show cause "why the judgment should not be, and have a lien in accordance with its provisions." Lynch's Code, 120, Adickes v. Lowry, 12 S. C. 106, and Carroll v. Tompkins, 14 S. C. 223. Besides this judgment was against H. H. Raymond as executor de son tort, and could not be levied on lands of the intestate. As was said in Mitchell v. Lunt, 4 Mass. 657, "Such an executor having no character by which he can obtain license to sell lands for the payment of debts, the lands cannot in legal construction be the estate of the deceased in his hands, and that to admit the lands to be taken to satisfy a judgment recovered against him would be extremely mischievous, as no action for waste for not collecting the personal estate and paying the debts will lie against him for a devisee or heir, etc." It follows that the judgment never acquired a lien upon the property of H. H. Raymond in his lifetime, and that the Waverly House could not be legally sold under the levy made thereon.

The judgments against H. H. Raymond, including that of Thomas, were not alienations by him, and must yield priority first to the claims against Mary Raymond and then to the mortgages executed by H. H. Raymond, and as all the lands were mortgaged by H. H. Raymond, leaving no interest in him which would be liable to judgments, they practically go out of the case. It is contended that the original sealed note which was secured by mortgage of Mary Raymond to Thomas, was merged and extinguished in the decree of foreclosure rendered at Greenville against Mary Raymond by Chancellor Carroll; and that said decree being the basis of the supplemental proceedings against H. H. Raymond as executor, became in turn merged in the judgment against him as executor de son tort, and as Thomas has no lien upon the property he has no claim at all. We cannot accept this view, which would make the *long judicial proceedings ineffectual for all purposes, except the destruction of the cause of action they were instituted to enforce. The decree of foreclosure against Mary Raymond failed as a final judgment only for the reason that it was not legally enrolled. The subsequent irregular proceedings against H. H. Raymond as executor did not extinguish it.

"Those proceedings," as stated by Judge Willard, "cannot be regarded as affecting the decree of Chancellor Carroll. They grew out of an attempt to destroy the force and effect of the decree itself, and must be regarded as extensive to it." The proceedings against H. H. Raymond as executor, so far as to make the lands of Mary Raymond liable, were misconceived, and for that reason could not merge in them the decree of foreclosure against Mary Raymond. The latter judgment against H. H. Raymond as executor de son tort might possibly be conclusive as to all personal property with which he had intermeddled, but not so as to the real estate of Mary Raymond. Mitchell v. Lunt, 4 Mass. 654; Freem. Judg. § 265. The claim of Wm. M. Thomas, as liquidated by the decree of foreclosure at Greenville, is entitled to stand with those of Warren and Whaley, trustee as a bond debt of Mary Raymond.

A. G. Rice was one of the mortgagees of H. H. Raymond, and claimed that before action brought against Raymond as heir he was out of possession as mortgagor, and therefore the mortgage to Rice operated as an alienation. It was claimed on the second reference that when the case was remanded by this court this claim was excepted from the provisions of that order and was not again before the referee, for the reason that it had been finally adjudicated here. The referee did not take that view, but being of opinion that although the question of alienation had been passed upon, "it remained to be decided whether it was such an alienation under the statute as to defeat the creditors of the ancestor." He reconsidered the case of Rice along with those of the other mortgagees, and held that the alienation to Rice was not bona fide, because he knew of the Thomas debt when the mortgage was taken (June, 1875), and the purpose with which he took possession in January, 1876, was to defeat the Warren debt which was then about to be *sued. Rice excepted, on the ground that the Supreme Court had decided "that the plaintiff could not follow the lands covered by his mortgage, which, with the proceedings had under it, alienated the lands before action brought." The Circuit judge sustained this exception, and the matter is before this court upon exceptions to his judgment.

Did the former judgment finally decide Rice's claim? In order to have a clear view of what was decided it is necessary to know what was before the court. The referee and Circuit judge had decided that all mortgages per se were alienations, and therefore in most of the cases the evidence had not been taken as to whether the mortgagor was or was not out of possession. The Supreme Court held that a mortgage was an alienation only when the mortgagor was out of possession, and under this view it was necessary to remand all the claims on the part of mortgagees in which such evidence had not been taken. It happened, however, that in the case of Rice such evidence had been taken and was then before the court.

The referee's report stated as follows: "On June 1st, 1875, the said Raymond made to A. G. Rice his bond conditioned for the payment of $9337 on June 1st, 1876, and to secure the same executed and delivered to the said A. G. Rice his mortgage of the premises known as Nos. 252, 254, 256, and 258 King street, this mortgage being a third one on the stores Nos. 252 and 254, the first and second having been executed to the executors of Poincignon. In addition to the usual covenants this mortgage contained the following, viz.: 'And it is agreed by and between the said parties that in case default shall be made in the payment of the principal or interest of the bond hereby secured, or in the payment of the principal and interest of the bonds or either of them, executed by the said H. H. Raymond to W. G. DeSaussure, Julius Trouche, Florence T. Downey, and Lawrence A. Duval, executors of Poincignon, on August 14th, 1873, and secured by a prior mortgage of a part of the premises hereinbefore described, etc., * * or in case default shall happen to be made in the performance of any of the covenants or condition herein contained, etc., etc., that the said A. G. Rice, his heirs, executors, administrators, or assigns, shall and may peaceably enter into, have, hold and occupy, possess and enjoy the premises above mentioned, and collect all rents, issues, and profits of the same, and every part thereof, etc. etc.' There was due on this bond March 20th, 1877, the sum of $11,022.76. Under the power contained in the said mortgage the said A. G. Rice entered and took possession of the said premises on January 14, 1876, the said H. H. Raymond having failed to perform the covenants contained in the said mortgage, etc."

With these facts before it the court decided as follows: "There are therefore no such findings of fact and conclusions of law on that point as to bring the case before us for a final decree. * * We can therefore do no more than lay down the principles which should govern such findings, so far as we are enabled to state them from the facts before us.

"As it regards the claim under the mortgage of H. H. Raymond to A. G. Rice, the finding of fact of the referee appears sufficiently full to present the question, whether such mortgage, in virtue of the proceedings had under it, operated as an alienation of the land descended under the statute of 3 and 4 W. and M. These findings do not appear to have been excepted to, and must stand as final. It appears that the mortgage contained a clause that in certain contingencies, among others that of default of payment of principal or interest on the bond which such mortgage was given to secure, the mortgagee, Rice, shall and may peaceably enter into, have, hold, use, occupy, possess, and enjoy the said premises above mentioned, and collect all rents, issues, and profits of the same, and every part thereof. Directions were then given as to the application of the money arising therefrom, among other purposes to that of the payment of principal and interest due on the said bond and mortgage. It appears by the findings of the referee, that under this power the mortgagee, A. G. Rice, entered and took possession of the mortgaged premises on January 14, 1876, prior to the commencement of this suit, as upon condition broken. It is clear that the mortgagor was out of possession as it regarded such mortgaged premises at the time of the commencement of the present suit. Under such circumstances *the decision in the case of Simons v. Bryce is inapplicable, as it regards the lands so mortgaged and out of the possession of the mortgagor. The statute of 1791 only operates to prevent the mortgage from having its due effect at common law while the mortgagor is in possession. The moment that possession passes out of him, in the sense of the statute, title passes through the mortgage under the operation of the statute, and the mortgagor occupies the same position he would have occupied had the statute never been passed. Under such circumstances this mortgage would be competent to work an alienation under the statute of 3 and 4 W. and M. It is claimed here that in order to establish possession out of the mortgagor, it is necessary to show that he has conveyed the mortgaged premises by an absolute deed to a third person, who is in possession under such deed. We have been referred to several cases in this state as supporting such proposition. None of the cases cited either directly or indirectly sanction such a conclusion. In Laffan v. Kennedy, 15 Rich. 246, it was held that the mortgagor was not to be considered out of possession so long as the premises were in the possession of a tenant holding under him. This case rests on the familiar principle that the possession of the tenant is the possession of the landlord. Where the mortgage contains authority for the mortgagee to enter upon condition broken, and take and hold possession with the rents and profits, and after condition broken is let into such possession by the mortgagor, the latter is clearly out of possession through his own act and deed in the sense of the statute. As to such alienated premises the plaintiff cannot follow the land, etc."

It seems to us that it was the intention of the Supreme Court to make an exception of the case of Rice, and to decide it finally. It is stated that the findings of facts "are sufficiently full to present the question" which was considered and decided. It is true that Judge Willard was in error when, in delivering the judgment of the court, he stated "that the findings had not been excepted to;" but, after hearing the testimony upon which the report was based, and full argument thereon, the judgment of the court surely cannot be impaired *by the fact that the then chief justice who prepared the judgment had in such voluminous brief overlooked the fact that the findings had been excepted to by the plaintiff, but not by the co-defendants of Rice!

The facts considered by the Supreme Court have not been shown to be incorrect, but it is simply claimed that the alienation which was declared was "not a bona-fide alienation, and that the mortgagor was not out of possession so as to defeat the claims of creditors of the ancestor." As it seems to be admitted that the court passed upon the question of alienation, the circumstances of the case show, and the judgment expressly declares, that the alienation spoken of could be no other than that contemplated by the statute. The judgment that the mortgage, in connection with what was done under it, worked an alienation under the statute of 3 and 4 W. and M., was in effect a judgment, also, that such alienation was bona fide. There could be no alienation under the statute except a bona-fide alienation, which placed the land beyond the reach of the creditors of the ancestor.

It must be kept in mind that the mortgage of Rice contained an unusual covenant allowing the mortgagee, upon default, to take possession. It was very nearly an absolute conveyance at first. That covenant was made when the mortgage was executed in 1875, and not on January, 1876, when it was known that Warren was about to sue and he took possession. In 1875, when the mortgage was executed, Rice had the right to exact his own terms as the condition upon which he would loan his money. The covenant in the mortgage expressed these terms. If he had then taken an absolute conveyance, would it not have been a bona-fide alienation? The fact that at that time he had notice of the claim of Thomas was not enough to make the alienation mala fide.

The question as to the bona fides under the statute is not identical with that of the equitable plea of purchaser for value without notice.

This court, following the English cases, has held in Smith v. Grant, 15 S. C. 136, that mere notice of debts against the ancestor is not of itself sufficient to make an alienation by an *heir or devisee mala fide under the statute. In that case the alienation was made through a bankrupt court by a devisee, who was at the time also executor of the ancestor, and had been actually sued as such, but not as heir. The alienation in Richardson v. Chappell, was also made by those who were the executors of the ancestor, and had notice of the debt. There is no analogy between this case and Lowry v. Pinson, 2 Bail, 324 [23 Am. Dec. 140], cited by the referee. In that case Pinson purchased and paid for the land of his brother, in order to enable him to run away, and thereby evade an action which was about to be brought against him for a breach of promise to marry. In this case the facts show no such combination on the part of Rice and Raymond to defraud the creditors. What Rice did in January, 1876, was not done in combination with Raymond, but was his own act in enforcing rights acquired previously. Rice did no more than an honest creditor had the right to do—that is to say, acting upon rights previously secured, to take possession, and thus save himself from impending ruin. We agree with the Circuit judge, that the claim of A. G. Rice was conclusively determined by the judgment of this court.

The mortgagor, H. H. Raymond, being out of possession of the lands covered by Rice's mortgage, the mortgages covering the same lands to the executors of Poincignon operate also as an alienation.

The only remaining question is that which was "opened" by the decree, and referred back by this court, whether the mortgagor, H. H. Raymond, was, as to any of the other mortgages, out of possession before action brought against him as heir, January 17, 1876. The referee reports that, as matter of fact, he was not out of possession as to any of the mortgagees, and the Circuit judge concurs with him as to all of these except Rice, whose case has been disposed of. In the case of such concurrence this court, as a rule, will not disturb the finding, so far as it is based upon a question of fact.

It is contended, however, that H. H. Raymond was out of possession as mortgagor by operation of law, as to the parcels of land, of which he executed two mortgages, viz., lot No. 262 King street, first mortgaged to Ellen

Barker, trustee, June 28, *1870, and afterwards July 1, 1873, to Anna Dora Fleming; and lots No. 342 and 344 King street, first mortgaged to executors of J. C. Otjen, January 15, 1872, and afterwards July 27, 1875, to W. J. Gayer.

This is certainly a question of novel impression. If the view suggested should prevail, the mortgagor might be held to be legally out of possession, whilst he was in fact in possession. The act of 1698, "To prevent deceits by double mortgages" (2 Stat. 137), provided: "If it so happens there be more than one mortgage at the same time by any person of the same lands and tenements, the second mortgagees which have not registered or recorded their mortgages * * * shall have power to redeem, etc. And any person or persons which shall mortgage the same lands * * * a second time, a former mortgage being in force and not discharged, shall have no power or liberty of redemption in equity or otherwise." The act of 4 and 5 W. and M. (2 Stat. 534, 1712) provided: "And if the said mortgagor shall mortgage again the same land, and shall not discover to the said second or other mortgagee in writing under his or their hand, that then and in that case the said mortgagor shall have no relief or equity of redemption against the said second or other mortgagee * * * and shall hold and enjoy the premises freed from the equity of redemption * * * as fully as if the same had been an absolute purchase."

The act of 1791 (5 Stat. 169) changed entirely the character of a mortgage, making it merely a security for a debt instead of a conveyance on condition, declaring that the legal title should remain in the mortgagor, and then provided that "when the same lands are mortgaged at divers times, the debts meant to be secured by such mortgages shall be paid in the order the same are recorded, etc."

The law stood in this way until our General Statutes were adopted in 1872. It does not appear that there ever was an express repeal of the provision of the act of 1698, which imposed a forfeiture of the right to claim the equity of redemption for giving a second mortgage, but the subsequent acts giving the mortgagor the legal title, declaring a mortgage a security for a debt, and in case of double mortgages directing that the debts shall be paid in the order in which the mortgages are recorded, were manifestly inconsistent with that provision, which was thereby superseded and rendered obsolete, if not repealed by implication. This view is confirmed by the fact, that no trace whatever of the doctrine can be found in the reports since 1791, now nearly a century, although in that time many cases were before the courts in which two mortgages on the same property had been executed. In 1806, Duncan v. Fisher, 2 DeS. 369; in 1852, Matthews v. Preston, 6 Rich. Eq. 307, note; in 1854, Boyce v. Boyce, Id. 304; Reeder & Davis v. Dargan, 15 S. C. 175; Gibbes v. Greenville and Columbia R. R., 13 S. C. 228, and in 1878, Simons v. Bryce, 10 S. C. 363; and in this last case both mortgages were executed after the General Statutes were adopted in 1872.

It said, however, that the General Statutes (1872) repealed all these old statutes, and re-enacted only that part of the act of 1798, which declared "every person or persons who shall mortgage the same lands and tenements a second time, the former mortgage being in force and not discharged, shall have no power or liberty of redemption in equity or otherwise" (Gen. Stat. 424); and it is ingeniously argued, that as the second mortgages in this case were executed after the adoption of the General Statutes, this provision therein revived cannot now be said to be antiquated or to have gone into the General Statutes by accident or mistake, and is applicable to them. It is true the provision was re-enacted, and on the statute-book from 1872 to 1878, and must be considered; but the General Statutes at the same time re-enacted the act of 1791, which has long been regarded as the settled law of the state, and with its whole intent and scope the provision aforesaid was inconsistent and repugnant, and therefore inoperative, and was expressly repealed in 1878 (16 Stat. 335).

It was further contended that Raymond was out of possession in fact as to the lands mortgaged to W. J. Gayer, because Raymond had assigned the rents to Gayer. It does not appear that this mortgage had any covenant as in that of Rice, authorizing the mortgagee to take possession. The effect of the assignment of the rent was considered by the Supreme Court, which held that "in order to determine whether that transaction was of such a nature as to amount to a surrender of possession by the mortgagor to the mortgagee there should have been a finding of fact whether such was the act and intent of the parties." And accordingly the matter being thus "opened," the referee reconsidered it and reported as follows: "The whole testimony shows that Mr. Gayer did just what under the assignment he had a right to do, to collect and secure the rents from the King street property, and it shows nothing more. He employed an agent, and the payment of the rent to him, if known to Raymond, was only what was contemplated by the assignment. There is no allegation or proof that Gayer or King, his agent, was acting adversely to Raymond, or that Raymond ever contemplated or agreed to anything more than the collection of the rents and the retaining of the same by Gayer. In my opinion, there is no testimony, even admitting that of Mr. Gayer, to prove that the mortgagor, Raymond, surrendered possession of the mortgaged premises to the mortgagee Gayer, or that it was the act and intent of Raymond so to do, and I so find, etc." In this finding, the Circuit judge concurred, and we cannot say that it was error.

It was also contended that Raymond was out of possession as to the lands mortgaged to Douglas Nisbit, guardian. Upon this mortgage an action of foreclosure had been commenced in September, 1875, against H. H. Raymond, and William M. Thomas made a party. He urged as a defence against foreclosure the Carroll decree of 1868, at Greenville, and that an execution had been lodged in Charleston. The issues were referred to W. P. DeSaussure, Esq., who, among other things, reported "that as between the parties to the original suit, it (the Carroll decree) may constitute a general lien upon the property formerly of Mary Raymond, but which cannot be enforced to the prejudice of subsequent lien creditors or purchasers without notice." Judge Reed confirmed the report, and adjudged that "the exceptions filed by the defendant William M. Thomas, and overruled by the referee, be overruled by this court, and it is adjudged, ordered, and decreed *that the defendant, William M. Thomas, having failed to produce any evidence of an enrolled decree pursuant to the act of 1840, has failed to show a judgment which could constitute a lien upon the mortgaged property as against the plaintiff a third party, and that his claim to hold such lien be subordinated and postponed to the mortgaged lien held by the plaintiff." There was no appeal from this decree, but we do not consider that it adjudged the question now before the court. The decree was rendered December 4, 1875, before Warren had brought his action against H. H. Raymond, as heir in possession. Considering the property as belonging to H. H. Raymond, which they had a right to assume until action brought, it was simply a decision as to priority of liens as against him, and we have hereinbefore announced the same proposition, that all the judgments against H. H. Raymond, including that of Thomas without lien, must yield priority to the mortgages, but that is very different from the question now made by the creditors of Mary Raymond against H. H. Raymond as heir in possession of her property. The point now in issue was not decided. Hart v. Bates, ante, p. 35.

The sale was ordered January 6th, before, but was not actually made until after Warren had brought his action and made Nisbit a party. "There can be no doubt that when property descended is mortgaged by the heir, and such mortgage is foreclosed and the property actually sold under a decree of foreclosure, it is an alienation." But the title of the mortgagor is not divested until the sale is actually made. The referee finds that "no sale was made until June 6, 1876, with full notice of this action then pending, and to which Nisbit was in fact a party. The property was bid in at the sale by Nisbit, the mortgagee. I find as to this mortgage, the mortgagor was not out of possession prior to the commencement of this action," and the Circuit judge concurred in this finding.

But it is urged, that while the sale made under the decree of foreclosure June 6, 1876, may not have been an effective alienation as to Warren and Thomas, it was as to B. J. Whaley, trustee, who did not appear in the case as creditor of the ancestor until after the sale. It is true, that the question as to fectual alienation as to him it is necessary to inquire when B. J. Whaley brought his action against H. H. Raymond. Warren and Thomas were parties to the original bill, but Whaley was not. The first appearance of his claim in the case was in the report of the referee, December 7, 1877. The referee in his second report, February 12, 1880, says: "Some questions have been made as to the time when this bond was proved before the referee. I do not see that it is material. Mr. Whaley was examined on May 4, 1877, as a witness, but not to prove the bond. No exception up to this time has been taken as to the time when the bond was proved in the case, and I report as a finding of fact, that it was properly and duly proved in the cause before me." The first report held all the mortgages to be alienations, and there was then no occasion to except.

*the effect of alienation depends upon the time when the creditor brings his action against the heir. The words of the statute are "before action brought." In order to determine whether a transaction was an ef-

The view of the referee as to the immateriality of the time the bond was proved most probably was, that the suit of Warren was in effect also that of Whaley. The complaint did state that it was "in behalf of himself and all other creditors of Mary Raymond, deceased, who should come in and contribute to the expenses of the action." But this action as originally brought cannot be considered as in the nature of a creditor's bill to marshal the assets of Mary Raymond, upon whose estate there was at that time no administration. It could be nothing more than an action against the heir H. H. Raymond then living, to make him liable for the debt of his ancestor. Each creditor of Mary Raymond had the same right, but we cannot see that in such action the interest of creditors was in common in such sense as to bring them within the principle of the rule that allows one of a numerous class of creditors jointly interested to sue for himself and others. There was no common fund which belonged to all equally. As in the lifetime of Mary Raymond, each was entitled to have his debt paid according to the diligence he might exhibit in obtaining priority.

*In this view Warren's action was his own, and not that of any other creditor, whom he did not expressly make a party. As was said by Chancellor Johnston, in the case of Johnston v. S. W. R. R. Bank, 3 Strob. Eq. 336: "There is a difference among cases arising from their very nature which must govern the court in its rules of practice. There are cases where the very right under which the plaintiff claims implies that he is entitled to its enjoyment only in conjunction with other persons. There are cases where no such implication necessarily arises from the nature of the right, but yet it may be shown by the pleadings or proofs that other persons have in fact a community of interest with the plaintiff. There are other cases still in which the claim set up by the plaintiff is in its nature exclusive of of the latter class there are numberless instances, such as mortgagees or others holding a lien or suing to establish some peculiar interest, or seeking a priority of right. In such cases it would be error in the plaintiff to conjoin other creditors with him in the bill, or to sue in behalf of himself and other creditors. * * * He who comes to assert a peculiar or distinct claim cannot sue in conjunction with other persons. * * * At law, certainly every creditor must sue for himself, and cannot join the case of any other creditor." The action of the plaintiff, Warren, was under the statute against the heir then living, and could not be united with another creditor entitled to a similar action.

This was the state of the pleadings certainly up to the death of H. H. Raymond, and the grant of administration upon the estate of Mary Raymond, February 20, 1877. After this change in the condition of things it seems that the complaint was amended and other parties brought in so as to make it substantially an action to marshal assets, call in creditors, and enjoin them from suing, etc. The claim of B. J. Whaley, trustee, was presented under the call for creditors. It does not appear at what precise time he proved his claim, and thereby brought this action, but it must have been after June, 1876, when the Nisbit sale in foreclosure was completed, and therefore operated as an alienation before action brought as to Whaley. The sale to Wilson of part of the premises thus sold *was after the purchase by Nisbit, and the agreement to litigate for the proceeds instead of the land, made in order to quiet the title of the purchaser, cannot alter the case.

The same principle must be applied to the proceeds of the premises mortgaged to Mrs. Maria S. Hopkins. Her mortgage contained a power to sell and convey, yet she instituted suit against H. H. Raymond to foreclose her mortgage, and as early as June, 1875, obtained a decree of foreclosure and sale. The order authorized H. H. Raymond to sell the premises, and he offered them for sale in December, 1875, but the purchaser failing to comply with the terms of sale, Mrs. Hopkins was authorized by order of court, January 14, 1876, to take the premises at the price bid for them, and under this order titles were executed to her on January 17, 1876, the very day on which Warren commenced his action. In the order directing titles to be made to Mrs. Hopkins this paragraph was inserted: "And it being reported to the court that John D. Warren, a creditor of Mary Raymond, through whom it was alleged that the defendant, H. H. Raymond, has derived said property, may seek to subject the premises ordered to be conveyed to the payment of her debts, and that he is not a party to these proceedings, it is adjudged that said conveyance be without prejudice to his rights, and that the premises so ordered to be sold shall as to him be subject to the same rule which would have been applicable thereto in the hands of H. H. Raymond, the mortgagor."

This order saved the rights of Warren to proceed as if no sale had been made, but we do not see how it can have that effect as to B. J. Whaley, trustee, who had not appeared in the case, who was not named as a creditor, and did not present his claim until long after. By a subsequent arrangement with Thomas his rights against the alienation were also secured. We cannot discover, however, that any such arrangement was ever made with B. J. Whaley, trustee, and, as in this action the arrangement with Warren could not enure to his benefit in the matter of time, the conveyance to Mrs. Hopkins was as to Whaley an alienation "before action brought."

We conclude, therefore, that the proceeds of all the property *of which Mary Raymond died seized and possessed, except that which was alienated to A. G. Rice, by H. H. Raymond, must be applied, if so much be necessary, in payment of her debts, as established herein, viz.: John D. Warren, B. J. Whaley, trustee, and William M. Thomas, according to the principles herein announced. That is to say, the proceeds of all the remaining parcels, except those covered by the mortgages of Nisbit and Hopkins, in payment of all the three creditors in proportion to the amount of their claims, and the proceeds of the last-mentioned lots mortgaged to Nisbit and Hopkins in payment of the claims of Warren and Thomas.

It was stated at the bar that these claims would exhaust the whole proceeds of sale subject to their payment. If so, the order in which the proceeds should be applied is not important. We recognize the rule to be as stated in the case of the Savings Bank v. Creswell, 100 U. S. 638, where Mr. Justice Miller says: "The court granted such relief as is authorized by the principle that where real estate is subjected to a lien in the hands of its owner, and he sells or mortgages separate parcels of that property subsequently to different persons and at different times, these parcels shall be subjected to payment of the lien in the inverse order of their alienation." See Bank of Hamburg v. Howard and Garmany, 1 Strob. Eq. 178.

If Mary Raymond, the owner of this property, had executed these mortgages, that would certainly have been the rule, for the reason that each successive mortgagee would have had the right to throw subsequent mortgagees upon the property of the mortgagor not encumbered. The mortgagor would certainly have been liable in that order, and each mortgagee "sits in the seat of his mortgagor." The matter is not so clear however where the mortgagor was not the owner of the property except sub modo, subject to the debts of the ancestor. As against these all mere encumbrances by the heir were simply void. Nothing could affect them short of alienation under the statute. But as the heir had a possible interest in the property which might remain after satisfying the debts of the ancestor, we think it safer that the proceeds of sale of the different parcels of the property should be applied in the inverse order, *the last first, of the dates of the mortgages covering them respectively.

The judgment of this court is, that the judgment of the Circuit Court, subject to the modifications herein directed, be affirmed.

[4. Appeal and Error ⇐1197.]

The effect of a judgment of this court upon a judgment of the Circuit Court stated. Where the judgment below is modified by the judgment on appeal, the latter becomes the final judgment in the case, and is remitted to the court below only to be enforced.

Before Kershaw, J., Abbeville, February, 1881.

Mr. Justice MCGOWAN, formerly of counsel in the cause, did not sit at the hearing of this appeal. The Hon. T. B. FRASER, of the Third Circuit, sat in his stead.

This was a petition by John Knox for a rehearing of the cause of Cothran v. Knox, which will be found reported in 13 S. C., 496.

The affidavit upon which the motion is based alleges the discovery of a "cotton book" and papers since the last trial, which due diligence would not have enabled him sooner to discover, and from which information was derived pointing out the books of New York customers that also furnished material evidence; that this evidence brought before the referee would make a difference in the report in petitioner's favor of about $10,000.

The decree of the Circuit judge was as follows:

The principal cause was commenced by a complaint filed by *James S. Cothran, executor of J. J. Cunningham, deceased, against John Knox, the defendant, to recover judgment against him for certain moneys alleged to be due him upon a sealed note given by defendant to the plaintiff. The defendant, by his answers, set up a settlement or award of referee or arbitration, various moneys paid by him at the request of the plaintiff, and a counter-claim for said payments, offering judgment for $512 and costs.

Subsequently, by leave of the court, plaintiff filed an amended complaint, converting the cause into a demand for an account against the defendant individually, and for alleged transactions between plaintiff's intestate and defendant as co-partners in business as merchants and hotel-keepers. The defendant, in his answer to the amended complaint, admitted the co-partnership, and submitted to account for the remaining "unaccounted-for assets of the late firm of J. Knox & Co.," and set up the alleged settlement or award, and other matters tending to discharge him from liability. The cause was referred to a referee to state the accounts between John Knox and J. J. Cunningham in his lifetime, including the co-partnership, etc. There was a report of the referee, to which exceptions were taken; a hearing of the exceptions; a decree thereon of the Circuit Court; an appeal to the Supreme Court; and a decree of that court. This decree concurred in that of the Circuit Court in all particulars but one, and in that agreed with the referee.

A petition is now filed on behalf of the defendant Knox, asking that the judgment rendered in the cause, which has been remanded here and made the judgment of the court, "may be opened and reheard: 1st. For error apparent on the face of the decree. 2d. Because of newly-discovered evidence materially varying the facts." The plaintiff has answered the petition, contesting the demand on various grounds. The cause was fully and ably argued before me, and has received more than usual consideration on account of its importance, not only to the parties concerned, but to the public, on account of the principles involved.

the face of the *decree—it appears to me the petitioner is concluded by the principles decided in Carr v. Green (Rich. Eq. Cas. 407), where the court considered the question: “Whether the court will grant a rehearing, or bill of review, when a case has been heard and decided upon its merits by the Court of Appeals, upon any other ground than newly-discovered evidence since the trial?” After a review of all the cases prior to that, the court determined the question in the negative. “A decision of the highest tribunal of the country,” says the court, “must necessarily constitute the law of the case.”

The first of the cases referred to was Burn v. Poaug, 3 DeS. 596. There it is said the court has had occasion to consider these applications for rehearing, and it has formed an opinion that it is not at liberty under the present organization, after a full and final decree, to open cases for rehearing, though it has in a few instances corrected palpable errors arising from misstatements, oversight, or misapprehension. This case was followed in Haskell v. Raoul, 2 Tread. 896; and in same case upon a new application to the Court of Appeals, 1 McCord, Eq. 22; in Perkins v. Lang, reported in a note at p. 31; in Blair v. Farr, MSS. Dec., 1824. In Manigault v. Deas, Bail. Eq. 296, this point was regarded as settled and that “both policy and the safety of suitors require that it should not be open for argument.”

Although these cases are based mainly on the terms of the statutes establishing the courts which declare that their decrees shall be final, yet in principle they would seem to apply as well to the courts as at present constituted. The decrees of our present Supreme Court are as final as were those then existing. Moreover, this practice is said in Carr v. Green to be conformable with that of all the courts in England and the United States, the organization of which bears analogy to ours, which dictum is sustained by authorities both English and American.

2. There is no doubt that, upon a proper case made, a rehearing will be granted on the ground of newly-discovered evidence. All the cases cited evinced this: “The party must show some tangible and substantial fact constituting of itself a *defence, of which the evidence had come to his knowledge since the trial, not particles of testimony, as they are called, or cumulative testimony. * * * To this must be added, that the party had no means of discovering the fact by the exercise of close diligence.”

The petitioner here has brought himself fully within the rule as thus laid down, if we accept the reasoning of the court in Vandermissen's case, 5 Rich. Eq. 519 [60 Am. Dec. 102], which is fully justified by the authorities there cited. In that case the papers, whose discovery was made the ground of the application for leave to file a bill of review, had been in the possession of counsel for this petitioner during and before the trial, but, being in the French language, folded and not endorsed, had been overlooked and not discovered until after the original cause had been determined. It was contended that this could not be considered newly-discovered evidence; but Judge Colcock, delivering the opinion of the court, said: “I think neither the rule nor the reason of the rule go so far. A man may have possession of a paper and not know it; and the affidavits are satisfactory to that point. In the most guarded exercise of the power of reviewing cases, it is only necessary to ascertain that no imposition is attempted to be practised on the court as to the knowledge of the existence of the evidence offered. If the paper was not examined (or was not seen, being among others not thought to be important), it is a case of newly-discovered evidence. * * * It is a case I conceive, too, differing widely from those cases which speak of one having possession of a paper not being entitled afterwards to use it. There are cases where the person having the possession also had a full knowledge of its contents, and through culpable negligence or forgetfulness failed to produce it.”

I think, therefore, that the proofs presented are such as to entitle the petitioner to the rehearing sought, if the application be properly made to this court.

This brings me to a very important question, Can a single judge, sitting in the Circuit Court, open a decree of the Supreme Court and grant a rehearing of the matters determined by it? In Simpson v. Downs (5 Rich. Eq. 425) it is said of *the late Court of Appeals in equity that it only entertained appellate jurisdiction; no case could come before it except upon appeal; that the court was concluded by its organization from entertaining a petition for leave to file a bill of review, because that would be to assume original jurisdiction, and the court accordingly dismissed the petition.

*211

It is contended for the petitioner that the Supreme Court, too, has only appellate jurisdiction, and that an application there would only result in a dismissal of the petition for the want of jurisdiction. If this is correct, it would follow that this court is the proper forum for the exercise of this extraordinary power. In Simpson v. Downs there had never been any decision by the Supreme Court, and the application was only to reconsider a Circuit decree.

There can be no question, therefore, that it should have been read to the Circuit Court, and the petition was rightly dismissed by the Court of Appeals. But the ground of the decision, if applied to cases which had been heard and decided in the Supreme Court, would exclude that court from the power to correct any errors in their decisions after they had been rendered, and to confer that necessary jurisdiction upon a single Circuit judge. This would be a manifest inconsistency, and most dangerous in practice. While the Supreme Court may have no original jurisdiction of this sort, it must have all the powers necessary and proper to protect it in the exercise and administration of its appellate jurisdiction. Independently of the grant of supervisory powers over other courts contained in the constitution, it would, as an incident to its character as a court of final appeals, have the power to compel subordinate courts to execute its mandates in appeal cases. In order to maintain its jurisdiction when it has once attached, it must have the power to follow its judgments to the court below, and to secure to litigants their rights thereunder. One of those rights is, upon presentation of a proper case to have the judgment opened and the matters therein decided reviewed.

Where shall the application for this purpose be made? The judgment to be opened is that of the Supreme Court, over which the Circuit Courts can exercise no power but to enforce *it (code, § 12). It is remitted to them only for that purpose; it is not their judgment, but that of the Supreme Court, whose mandate in regard thereto they must obey. They may open their own judgments, in proper cases; but those of the Supreme Court they must enforce as directed. It would seem to follow, beyond a doubt, that if the judgment of the Supreme Court is to be opened at all, and the matters concluded thereby be again litigated, it must be done upon leave granted by the Supreme Court.

In the Supreme Court of the United States, a court of precisely analogous powers and constitution as ours in relation to this subject, having appellate jurisdiction only, it has been held that after an appeal a bill of review does not lie for any cause without leave of the Appellate Court. Southard v. Russell, 16 How. 547 [14 L. Ed. 1052]. There is no distinction in this respect between an application to file a bill of review when necessary, and for a rehearing, when the case is in such a condition as to make the latter a proper application. This question has never been expressly decided or considered by the courts of this state.

I can find no instance in which a Circuit Court has exercised the power of opening a judgment after the decision of an appeal. Petitions of this character have sometimes been filed in the Appellate Court, and sometimes in the Circuit Court, since the establishment of a separate Court of Equity Appeals in 1808. Of the cases filed in the Appellate Courts may be cited Haskell v. Raoul, 2 Tread. 894; the same case, 1 McC. Eq. 22; Ex parte Terry, Rice's Eq. 1; Johnson v.

Lewis, 1 Rich. Eq. 390; Hunt v. Smith, 3 Rich. Eq. 540. In not one of these was the objection suggested that the petitions had been filed in the wrong court. To this may be added Carr v. Green, above cited. On the other hand, in Hinson v. Pickett, 2 Hill Eq. 351, and Vandermissen's Case, 5 Rich. Eq. 519 [60 Am. Dec. 102], this petition was filed in the Circuit Court after an appeal, and without an objection on that ground. Simpson v. Downs has been decided since these cases, and has been followed in the later cases, in none of which, however, had there been a decision in the Appellate Court before application made.

In Tomlinson v. Tomlinson, 10 Rich. Eq.

300, an appeal *was taken by the plaintiff, and also a petition filed for a rehearing of the Circuit decree. They then moved the Appeal Court to stay the argument of the appeal until they could present their petition in Circuit. In granting the order the court said: "If the appeal be heard it will preclude the consideration of the petition upon Circuit." Upon this ground, therefore, the motion was granted. This would seem to imply that in the opinion of that court the Circuit Court could not entertain a petition of that character after the decision of the case by the Appeal Court. I am unwilling, unless I could find express authority controlling me, to assume the responsibility of opening a case already determined by the Supreme Court, without a reference to that tribunal. I find no such authority, but the reverse. The case of Southard v. Russell was considered by a court of the highest authority, and ought to govern here, unless we had some decision directly upon the point opposed to it.

That case refers to Stafford v. Bryan, 1 Hen. & Munn, 46, which held on the authority of Barbon v. Searle, 1 Vernon, 416, that the court cannot entertain a bill of review, after a final decree of the court, for the correction of errors. And counsel in this case have furnished me a reference to a case noticed in the Reporter as having been decided in the United States Circuit Court for the Southern District of New York during the present year—Hancock Ins. Co. v. Manning, where it was held, "that after decision of the case by the Supreme Court the Circuit Court cannot grant a motion for a new trial on the ground of newly-discovered evidence, but must execute the mandate of the Supreme Court."

I do not consider the cases of Pringle v. Sizer, 7 S. C. 131; Knox & Gill v. S. C. R. Co., 5 S. C. 73, and Whaley v. Bank of Charleston, Id. 262, as affecting the question. They decide that after the remittitur of a case to the Circuit Court the Supreme Court loses jurisdiction, so that it cannot grant a rehearing in that court. This very rule consists with the view presented, that though the rehearing of the review cannot be had in the Court of Appeals, in fact can only be had in the Circuit Court, yet leave to open a judgment for a review or *rehearing must first be had in the Supreme Court, when the judgment has been rendered by that court.

In Pringle v. Sizer the court says: "Strictly speaking, after a cause has been once remitted, this court loses all jurisdiction over it. * * * The Circuit Court, on the remittance of a case, is bound to follow the directions of the Appellate Court; it cannot change, alter, or modify them, or allow new issues." The application there was for a re-argument on the ground of error in the judgment of the Supreme Court.

In Whaley v. Bank of Charleston, a petition was filed in the Supreme Court, asking leave to file a bill of review or a bill in the nature of a bill of review, after a judgment had been rendered by the Supreme Court and remitted to the Circuit Court. The language of the court is guarded: "Even assuming our right to control the judgments of the court, so as to subject them to our review and reversal, we see nothing in the matter before us to require our interference. We take occasion here to refer to what was said in Knox & Gill v. S. C. R. Co.

Here is what was said in that case, which was an application to the Supreme Court for a rehearing by that court of a judgment already rendered but not remitted: "It is not our purpose now to prescribe any rule for the re-examination, on the mere petition of parties, of a final judgment duly pronounced and filed. Whatever may be our views in regard to any control which we may be authorized to exercise over the judgments and decrees of the court, or how far ex mero motu we are to reconsider them, we will announce when a proper case may so require." This language is adopted by the Supreme Court in the case of Whaley v. Bank of Charleston, and is the last utterance of the court on the subject which has come to my knowledge. It is, therefore, evident that the rule has not yet been established.

This case will furnish the opportunity. It is evident that the power must rest somewhere. I cannot suppose, in a case like this, it lies with the Circuit Court, whose duty it is to obey the mandates of the Supreme Court, not to review or reverse them. Such a ruling, in the language of Chancellor Gaillard *in Lang v. Perkins, involves this inconsistency: "That after a case has been solemnly determined by this (appeal) court in the last resort, a single judge in the Circuit Court might cause the decision to be again brought into question. This cannot be." The petition cannot be entertained without leave of the Supreme Court first had. Ordered, that the petition herein be dismissed.

The opinion states the grounds of appeal.

Mr. W. S. Monteith, for appellant.

Messrs. W. H. Parker, L. W. Perrin, contra.

May 12, 1882. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice FRASER. This was a petition in the Circuit Court, to reopen and rehear a judgment or decree of the Circuit Court modified by the Supreme Court. The original cause in which the petition was filed was heard on circuit at Abbeville, in April, 1879, on the report of a special referee and exceptions. The decree of the Circuit judge was filed December 18, 1879, and both parties appealed to the Supreme Court. The case was heard in the Supreme Court, and the judgment of the Supreme Court was filed, July 30, 1880, by which the Circuit decree was modified. The remittitur was filed in the Circuit Court August 31, 1880. This petition for a rehearing was filed in the Circuit Court September 14, 1880.

The grounds on which the petition is based are: 1. For error apparent on the face of the judgment: 2. Because of newly-discovered evidence materially varying the facts; and the petition prays that the original cause may be recommitted to the referee, to restate the accounts with instructions to inquire as follows to wit, into certain items of the account as to which it was alleged that there was error in the report as confirmed by the decree. The Circuit judge held that after there had been an appeal in the cause, and after a hearing, a judgment rendered thereon, and the remittitur filed in the Circuit Court, there could be no rehearing of the cause, or permission given to file a bill of review except for newly-discovered evidence; and that under such circumstances the Circuit *Court had no jurisdiction to make an order for a rehearing, or for leave to file a bill of review, even for after or newly-discovered evidence; that the judgment of the Supreme Court, the highest appellate tribunal, was final and conclusive on the Circuit Court.

From this judgment on the petition an appeal has been taken to this court: 1. Because it is respectfully submitted, that his Honor erred when he held that he did not have the jurisdiction to grant the relief sought. 2. Because it is respectfully submitted that his Honor erred when he held that the petition sought to alter and review a decree of the Supreme Court; whereas the case only went to that court in its appellate jurisdiction, and it having sent down the remittitur, the jurisdiction ended, and the decree was the decree of the Circuit Court.

In the argument before this court it was strenuously urged that the judgment or decree of the Circuit Court in the original cause which was modified by the judgment of the Supreme Court was not final, and was only interlocutory, and that the accounting between the plaintiff and defendant has been left open by it. It is sufficient to say, that no such question has been raised by the grounds of appeal, and it is not proper for this court to express any opinion as to the proper construction of the judgment which has been rendered. If, however, this be the correct view, it is not easy to see why this petition for a rehearing is necessary, or why all the questions which petitioner, the defendant in the original cause, desires to make cannot be raised in the ordinary way in the carriage of the original cause in the various stages of preparation and trial.

The grounds of appeal do not raise the question as to the right of the Circuit Court to order a judgment or decree to be reopened and reheard for error on the face of the decree, or for newly-discovered evidence where there has been only a Circuit decree which has not been affirmed or modified by the Supreme Court. The right of the Circuit Court to order a decree to be reopened and reheard for newly-discovered evidence in a case where there had been no appeal has been recently affirmed in the case of Durant v. Philpot, 16 S. C. 116. The only question in the case now before the court is *whether the Circuit Court has such jurisdiction in a case where the decree of the Circuit Court has been affirmed or modified by the Supreme Court on appeal.

In Ex parte Dunovant, 16 S. C. 299, this court holds the following language: "If, therefore, after a trial in the Circuit Court a party wishes to avail himself of the benefit of after-discovered evidence, his application should be made in the first instance to that court, as we have no jurisdiction to consider the question until after it has been passed upon by the Circuit Court." In Ex parte Dunovant there had been an appeal to the Supreme Court, the appeal heard, and the judgment of the Supreme Court rendered, and the remittitur sent down to the Circuit Court. While this court holds in the latter case cited that applications for a rehearing should be made originally to the Circuit Court, it does not hold that in that particular case it could have been granted there. The court did say that if heard in the Circuit Court, there were only such grounds alleged as were proper for an appeal and not for a rehearing, and might have assigned in that particular case another reason if it had been deemed necessary. The court did say what was sufficient for the purpose, and it amounted to this—that when a proper case arose the application for a rehearing should be made in the first instance to the Circuit Court.

The authorities have been so carefully and clearly stated by the Circuit judge in the judgment from which this appeal is taken, that this court does not deem it necessary to add much to what has been said by him. It is by no means safe to hold that because the old courts of law and equity, and of appeals, exercised certain powers, that the same powers can in all cases be exercised by the courts of the present day which have succeeded them. The present courts have been created by a new constitution, and are governed by new statutes which in many respects modify their powers. The code, § 12, provides that "the Supreme Court may reverse, affirm, or modify the judgment, decree, or order appealed from in whole or in part and as to any or all of the parties; and its judgment shall be remitted to the court below to be enforced according to law."

*When the judgment of the Circuit Court is simply affirmed it may seem that the judgment in the cause in which it is rendered is only a judgment of the Circuit Court unrevoked; to reverse a judgment of the Circuit Court may perhaps mean something more than merely to annul or set it aside; but when a judgment of the Circuit Court is modified by the Supreme Court it is certainly a new judgment with different provisions from the Circuit judgment. While such a judgment is the final judgment in the cause, it is difficult to see how it is merely the judgment of the Circuit Court. It is made, as in the case now under consideration, in the Supreme Court, and is made by an authority paramount to and which overrides the Circuit Court. This judgment of the Supreme Court is remitted, not to be reheard in, but to be enforced by, the Circuit Court according to law.

When a cause is heard only in the Circuit Court, that court has power in proper cases to reopen and rehear it. When a cause is heard in the Supreme Court, and before its jurisdiction ends by remitting its judgment to the Circuit Court the cause may be reheard in a proper case in this tribunal. But when its judgment is remitted to the court below, the Supreme Court loses control of the cause and the Circuit Court can only enforce it. There must be some end of litigation.

It may seem to be a hardship that in a case in which the Circuit judge thought there was a proper case for a rehearing, this court can give no relief. It must be remembered, however, that this court can only construe the law, and that it should be especially careful not to extend its control beyond the clear limits of its jurisdiction as prescribed by law. It is better that there should be cases of individual hardship than that the courts shall arbitrarily extend their jurisdiction to meet supposed necessities which may arise, if indeed this is such a case.

It is therefore ordered and adjudged that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed and the appeal dismissed.

17 S. C. *219

*HAND v. SAVANNAH AND CHARLESTON RAILROAD COMPANY. THE STATE, Ex relatione THE ATTORNEY GENERAL, v. SAME. Ex parte CUTTINGS, Executors, in re THE SAME.

[1. Railroads ⇨153.]

The decision of this court in Hand v. Savannah and Charleston Railroad Company, 12 S. C. 314, declared and explained, so far as it determined the respective priorities of the bonds of the defendant corporation, and held persons funding coupons under the act of 1869 estopped from claiming a prior lien under the act of 1856 for the bonds and other coupons owned by them at the time of such funding.

[2. Estoppel ⇨119; Railroads ⇨171.]

Under an issue of estoppel from the assertion of a preferred statutory lien, the question whether the holder of bonds and coupons secured by such lien has accepted, in payment of his past-due coupons, bonds issued under a later statute postponing such lien, is one of fact, with the burden of proof resting upon him who asserts the estoppel.

On such question, arising eleven years afterwards, entries in the handwriting of a deceased treasurer in the regularly-kept books of a railroad company are competent evidence to show who funded coupons and received in exchange therefor bonds under the later statute.

And such persons, or their representatives, having failed, after opportunity offered, to show that they were not at that time owners of the bonds and coupons (then immature) of the first lien, now produced by them, such evidence will be accepted as proof that they were such owners at the time of the funding by them of coupons, then past due, of first lien bonds,—the company being in possession of coupons from those bonds, although it cannot be shown that they are the identical coupons funded by these persons.

But the mere fact that coupons of the bonds now presented were funded in 1869 do not furnish that full and clear proof essential in estoppels, to establish the ownership of these bonds at that time by the same parties who did the funding.

The present owners of bonds may have acquired them prior to 1869 without the coupons, but if afterwards, the act of that year did not charge them with notice that the coupons cut off had been funded by parties then owning the bonds from which cut.

The fact that some coupons of first-lien bonds were paid in state guaranteed bonds under the act of 1869 raises no equity for the payment of the unfunded coupons of the same class and dates in preference to the bonds and later coupons. Such unfunded coupons are entitled to take only their pro rata with other bonds and coupons of the first lien not postponed by settlement or the estoppel of their owners.

[8. Corporations ⇨473; Railroads ⇨171.]

*The holders of first-lien bonds retaining that rank are exclusively entitled to the benefit of the first lien, and cannot be required to share that benefit with the second statute lien to the extent of the quantity of the first lien removed by the estoppel of parties holding under it. This was in effect held in the former judgment, 12 S. C. 314.

Nor (as also ruled in the former appeal) are the interest fund bonds, guaranteed by the state, issued under the act of 1869 in payment for the coupons of the first-lien bonds, entitled to the rank held by the coupons which these bonds satisfied.

A referee having reported a schedule of coupons proved before him, and the report in this particular having been confirmed, without exception, on Circuit, and then on appeal, it is too late afterwards to raise the point on Circuit that certain coupons included in such report had been before that time paid by the debtor corporation—that matter being necessarily involved in the proof of the coupons. The rule is not varied where other issues involved in the litigation are still undecided.

[11. Reference ⇨101.]

The application for a recommittal cannot be sustained under the act to vacate erroneous judgments, because not made within two years; nor under Section 197 of the code; nor as for a new trial on after-discovered evidence, for the reason that the remittitur of the Supreme Court had been issued.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Bleckley, Brown & Fretwell v. Branyan, 28 S. C. 451, 6 S. E. 291.

Uncancelled coupons having been taken up by parties who advanced the money to an embarrassed corporation for that purpose—although marked paid in the company's books—these parties have an equity to claim for their coupons the benefit of the lien which originally secured them. The recognition of this equity may be required at the hands of persons seeking the equitable powers of the court to enable them to contest the liability of the company to pay these coupons.

Claims against the receiver of an insolvent railroad corporation for moneys, services, supplies, damages, and necessary expenses of the management, cannot be paid out of the proceeds of the mortgaged property, which were insufficient to pay the mortgage debt. Unless specially authorized by the court to contract debts on the faith of the property, a receiver is restricted to the income and profits of the road.

The receiver was authorized by a consent order, without a reference, to construct an extension of the railroad at a cost not to exceed an amount stated, to be paid for out of surplus income, and the extension to stand pledged for such payment. The extension was built at a greater cost and then sold as a part of the entire road. Held, that the receiver acted only as agent of the consenting bondholders, but that the extension was covered by a lien, superior to existing liens, in favor of those who furnished the money to buy it, and that they were entitled to such ratable proportion of the proceeds of sale as the value of the extension bore to the value of the entire road, considered only in reference to the purchase money of the whole.

A railroad company was chartered with an exemption from taxation, and bonds were issued having a first statutory lien on the property of the corporation. Subsequently the general assembly passed an act undertaking to postpone the first lien in favor of a second issue of bonds by that act authorized, upon condition that the corporation would release its exemption from taxation—which was done. The postponement of the lien being unconstitutional, held, that as to bondholders under the first lien, who did not assent to the terms of the second act, the property of the corporation in the hands of the original company and also in the hands of its successor, a new company, was exempt from taxation.

Before Mackey, J., Charleston, March, 1881.

For the previous history of these cases in this court, see, in the following order, 5 S. C. 182, 8 Id. 207, 6 Id. 307, 10 Id. 406, 12 Id. 83, 314, 13 Id. 467; but most particularly, 12 S. C. 314, to the opinion in which case frequent reference is here made.

Upon the return of the case to the Circuit Court, Judge Aldrich passed the order of reference stated in the opinion of this court. It is contained in his decree of sale, set out in full in 13 S. C. 467. The referee reported as follows:

It will be necessary, in the first place, to determine what are the principles settled by the Supreme Court. On page 350 [of 12 S. C.] the court, after discussing the subject, sums up its conclusion in these words: "It would follow that one funding coupons under that act (1869) must be regarded as bound by its terms, as it regards any bonds or coupons held by him at the time of funding of the same class, at least with the coupons funded."

This seems precise and definite. In the next subsequent paragraph of the decision the court designates this as "this principle," and as "the conclusions just stated," and as

"the *principle laid down." It would not be within the province of a mere referee to extend the application of this precise rule and direction beyond its express terms, by any analogies or arguments drawn from the reasoning by which the court has reached the above conclusion. My interpretation of this conclusion is that that bondholder only who has funded the coupons from the bonds which he held at the time of the funding must be regarded as bound by the terms of the act of 1869, as it regards any bonds or coupons held by him at the time of funding of the same class, at least with the coupons funded. And that if any estoppel arises, it arises from the personal act of the party funding, and not from the character of the instrument.

The following is a summary of the evidence which has been submitted in the case:

First. The coupons either funded or paid, in the possession of the Savannah and Charleston Railroad Company. These coupons are contained in nine books, embracing the years 1861 to 1869, both inclusive. The coupons in these books are variously marked, some of them are punched and others are marked with a cross. The evidence of Messrs. Isaacs, Blacklock and Lee, which accompanies this report, will explain the circumstances and conditions of these coupons. I submit with this report a tabular statement, marked Appendix A, of all the six per cent bonds which have been issued under the act of 1856, for the above period, together with the names of those persons who have proved them either at the reference held under the present order, or at the references hitherto held, together with the statement of the condition of all the coupons on those bonds as far as such condition has been ascertained by the proof submitted. This statement shows what coupons are in the possession of the Savannah and Charleston Railroad Company and are presumed to be either funded or paid, and what coupons are held by different holders and are neither funded nor paid.

There is nothing upon the face of the coupons in these nine books to show by whom any of the funded coupons have been funded, nor to whom payment has been made for any of the *paid coupons. The fact of the possession of these coupons by the company is proof simply that such coupons have been either funded or paid by the company. It has been argued that the fact of the possession by the company of a coupon of any particular bond is presumptive that the coupon was funded by the holder of the bond, and that the burden of proof is upon him to show that he did not fund the coupon.

But there is better and more conclusive evidence as to who funded the coupons than is furnished by any presumption arising from the mere possession by the company of the coupons. The books of the company, if they are to be received as evidence, furnish precise and accurate evidence, as to who did actually fund the coupons and receive the bonds for which such funded coupons were issued.

These books, two in number, are marked as follows: "Statement of coupons from state guaranteed six per cent bonds, funded in state guaranteed seven per cent bonds, S. & C. R. R. Co.;" and "Bonds issued for funded interest. State guarantee." S. & C. R. R. Co." The entries contained in them are printed with the evidence filed with this report.

They are in the handwriting of Mr. S. W. Fisher, the treasurer of the company, at the time of the funding, and were contemporaneously prepared by him in the course of his employment, to serve, as is shown by the titles printed on them, as the official register and record of the funding, and with such accuracy and care as to leave but little, if any, room for discredit or doubt. Mr. Fisher is dead, and the books come fairly within the rule as laid down by Mr. Wharton in his "Treatise on Evidence," Sec. 238.

These books contain the names of all those to whom the bonds for the funded coupons were issued, and it is impossible to avoid the conclusion that those whose names appear on them did personally fund either coupons from the bonds which they at that time personally held, or coupons which they obtained from others.

If, therefore, it is proved by any evidence submitted in this case that a person is a holder of a six per cent bond, and the name of the same person appears in the books of the company *as one of those who have received a bond for funded interest, such concurrence and coincidence would be at least presumptive that the bonds which he now holds are the bonds which he held at the time he funded the coupons, and the burden of proof is upon him to show that he did not hold the bonds which he now holds at the time of the funding.

And if it should appear that the name of a present holder of a six per cent bond does not also appear in the books of the company, such non-appearance would be presumptive, if not conclusive, that the present holder of the bond was not the holder at the time of the funding, or that the coupons of his bonds were sold and not personally funded by him; since, with the exception of twelve bonds held by Mrs. Blair's estate, there are no bonds, some of the coupons of which are not in the possession of the company, and the names of all the parties who funded appear in the books of the company. The bonds being negotiable securities are not affected by any transactions of which the present holder has had no notice, and the present possession of such a bond is at least prima-facie evidence that such possession is bona fide and without notice of any equities affecting it.

The following is a comparative table, containing the names of all the parties who have received funded interest bonds, and those who in the same or nearly the same names have proved six per cent bonds in the cause: * * *

No such proof has been submitted as would show an identity in persons and interest in the following names in the above list, and, therefore, the bondholders cannot be presumed to have accepted the provisions of the act of 1869: * * *

The other parties mentioned in the above comparative table who have received interest funded bonds and have proved six per cent bonds, must be presumed to have accepted the provisions of the act of 1869, so far as the six per cent bonds are concerned, which they held at the time of the funding, and the burden of proof is upon them to show what bonds they did not hold at the time of funding.

The following parties have testified as to what bonds they did not hold at the time of funding: * * *

The holders of six per cent bonds who have not been proved *to have funded coupons, cannot be presumed to have accepted the provisions of the act of 1869.

Besides the six per cent bonds, which have been proved before me in this case, there have also been proved a number of detached and unpaid coupons, taken from the six per cent bonds. The following is a list of these coupons and the names of the parties who have proved them: * * *

None of the above parties have been proved by the books kept by Mr. Fisher, or by other testimony, to have received any of the interest funded bonds, with the exception of Mr. J. T. Robertson and Mr. A. Isaacs.

With their exception there is nothing to raise a presumption that any of the above parties have in any way accepted the provisions of the act of 1869. Mr. Robertson and Mr. Isaacs having been proved to have received interest funded bonds, the burden of proof is on them to show that they did not hold the coupons they have proved at the time they received the interest funded bonds.

It has been argued that all the past-due coupons held by the above parties, and maturing on or prior to first September, 1869, should be paid before coupons falling due at a later date, and before the principal of any of the bonds. In support of this position, the case of Stevens v. New York and Oswego R. R., 13 Blatch. 416 [Fed. Cas. No. 13,406] (Jones R. R. Sec., § 638), was relied on. This case seems directly on the point, and if its authority is to be followed, the coupons above referred to must be paid before the other coupons and the principal of the bonds.

It would be as well to state that all of the six per cent bonds issued under the act of 1856 have been proved before me, with exception of seventy-one bonds. And that all the coupons belonging to the six per cent bonds, for the nine years from 1861 to 1869, have been accounted for or proved except 564.

The following statement of the coupons will make this apparent: * * *

Entire interest for the 9 years....	$272,700 00
Accrued interest according to Mr. Fisher .....	268,470 00
Amount of interest paid, but not in Mr. Fisher's statement.....	$4,230 00

*Reducing the amount of interest according to Mr. Fisher's evidence, on page 209 of the brief to coupons, the following would be a statement of the entire interest in coupons:

Whole amount of coupons ($272,700)...	18,180
$ 4,230 paid .....	282 coupons
$ 20,145 paid by Mr. Fisher .....	1,343 "
$172,800 funded by Mr. Fisher .....	11,520 "
$ 67,065 held by Hand and others....	4,471 "
$ 8,460 in unproved coupons .....	564 "
$272,700	18,180

The next evidence submitted is that of Mr. Alexander Isaacs, the former president of the company. He merely corroborates the evidence of Mr. Fisher, and does not prove the funding by any one whose name is not in the books kept by Mr. Fisher.

The order of reference under which I am acting directed that I should inquire and report "what claims and demands against the Savannah and Charleston Railroad are undisputed and entitled to immediate payment." The following claims against the road have been presented, none of which however are undisputed:

1st. The claim of Henry R. Williams for land taken by the Charleston and Savannah Railroad Company for a right of way in 1860.

2d. The claim of the state for taxes.

3d. The claim for materials, labor, and services up to the time of the sale of the road, and paid by Mr. Mitchell and the receiver.

4th. The claim of Daniel Green for a horse killed and injuries to a mule.

In reference to the claim of Henry R. Williams. * * *

As to the claim of the state for taxes:

In a former report the referee reported that the claim of the state for taxes was, under the act of 1856, postponed to the lien of the bondholders under that act. To this report the attorney-general of the state filed exceptions, among which was this: "That the referee erred in not finding that the claim

*of the state for taxes constitutes a lien on the property of the Charleston and Savannah Railroad Company, prior to all other liens and claims on the same." The Circuit Court confirmed the report on this point, and from the decree of the Circuit Court the attorney-general appealed on the same grounds on which he excepted to the report. Subsequently the Supreme Court decided as follows: "That portion of the decree (Circuit) which sustains the imposition of the taxes should be affirmed." It would, therefore, appear that the imposition of the taxes is postponed to the lien of the bondholders under the act of 1856, as the Circuit Court confirming the report had decreed; and as the road has not been sold for a sufficient amount to pay the bondholders under the act of 1856, the claim of the state for taxes must be disallowed.

In reference to the claims due by the receiver:

The order of reference relating to these claims requires me to vouch the said claims, and to inquire and report upon what funds the same are chargeable.

I find in the order appointing the receiver, signed April 28, 1874, the following provision: "The said railroad stock, outfit, and property of the defendant company shall be held, worked, and managed by the said receiver and advisory board with the greatest possible skill and economy, and the results be reported quarterly to the court in this cause, and the net profits, after paying all necessary expenses, including such amounts, if any, as may be due the employees and officers, shall be applied quarterly to the payment" of the interest and principal of the debt of the company, in the order set down in the order appointing the receiver.

It would require a very liberal construction of this order to interpret it, as intended, that the necessary expenses, including the amounts due the employees and officers for services, should be paid out of any other fund than the profits of the road. If the amounts now due by the receiver are at all chargeable upon the fund arising from the sale of the road, now in the hands of the court, such chargeability must arise from some other authority than that contained in the order appointing the receiver. The general accounts of the receiver have not yet been *audited and vouched, nor does it appear that he has not worked and managed the road with all possible skill and economy.

In the case of Cowdrey v. Railroad Company, 1 Wood's Rep., 336 [Fed. Cas. No. 3,293], Mr. Justice Bradley says: "It may be laid down as a general proposition, that all outlays made by the receiver in good faith, in the ordinary course, with a view to advance and promote the business of the road, and to render it profitable and successful, are fairly within the line of discretion that is necessarily allowed to a receiver intrusted with the management and operation of a railroad in his hands. His duties and the discretion with which he is invested are very different from those of a passive receiver, appointed merely to collect and hold moneys due on prior transactions, or rents accruing from houses and lands.

"And to such outlays in ordinary course may properly be referred not only the keeping of the road, buildings, and rolling stock in repair, but also the providing of such additional accommodations, stock, and instrumentalities as the necessities of the business may require, always referring to the court or to the master appointed in that behalf for advice and authority in any matter of importance which may involve a considerable outlay of money in lump."

There does not appear to be anything in the claims due by the receiver in these accounts, now under consideration, which may not be legitimately embraced in the principle thus laid down by Judge Bradley. There has been no considerable outlay of money in lump, and all the expenditures are of such a character as were necessary for the very continuance of the business and existence of the road, as explained in the evidence filed with this report.

In the matter of the claim of Daniel Green for a horse killed and a mule injured by the train:

I find that some time in the month of April, 1880, the horse and mule belonging to Daniel Green strayed on the track of the road, and were run over by a passing train. The horse was killed and the mule was so injured as to be entirely useless. The horse was purchased in March, 1879, for $110, and the mule in January, 1877, for $150.

*In Davenport v. The Receivers of the Alabama and Chattanooga R. R. Co., 2 Wood's Rep., 519 [Fed. Cas. No. 3,588] it was decided "that a person who has recovered judgment against the receiver of a railroad for injuries received by him while travelling as a passenger upon the road, is not entitled to payment out of the earnings of the road nor the proceeds of its sale in preference to the first mortgage bondholders, unless it is so provided by the order of the court placing the road in the possession of the receiver." As there is no such provision in the order of the court which has placed the road in the hands of the present receiver, I therefore report that Daniel Green, under the principles of the above decision, is not entitled to compensation for the death of and injury to his animals out of the fund in the hands of the court.

Respectfully submitted,

W. Alston Pringle, Referee.

The facts connected with the motion to recommit for further proof of the coupons of Isaacs and others, and the application for payment of the Bee Ferry Extension, are sufficiently stated in the opinion.

The case was argued before the Circuit judge on exceptions to the referee's report. The decree was as follows:

These cases came up on the referee's report, made under the direction of the Supreme Court and exceptions thereto. The Supreme Court had established the priority of the Statutory Lien of 1856, securing the six per cent bonds, but held that that lien was displaced in behalf of the seven per cent bonds of 1869, in cases where the coupons of the sixes had been funded under the act of 1869, and the case was sent back to inquire and report upon this and other matters set forth in the decree.

As the testimony is of considerable extent, and embraces various propositions upon which exceptions are taken, it will be more convenient to take up the various cases made in their order.

1. As to Hand's coupons. These form the subject of the original suit, and have been duly proved. They are six per cent *coupons matured and held by the plaintiff, Hand, before the passage of the act of 1869. The referee has found that these coupons, amounting to $27,705, with interest from their various dates, are justly due, and stand as res judicata under previous proceedings, and the exceptions having been withdrawn, it is ordered that Daniel Hand have judgment for the said amount, with interest, to rank to be paid in like manner as bonds which have not lost priority by acceptance of the act of 1869.

2. The twelve (12) six per cent bonds proved in the name of W. C. Beaty, executor of Mrs. Nancy Blair, have not been impugned by any testimony, and it is ordered that these bonds, amounting to $6000 with the interest accrued thereto, be also paid in like manner.

3. The one hundred six per cent bonds, and their coupons, and the detached coupons proved by Bradley Martin, have been removed by sufficient testimony from the presumptions which affect the other six per cent bonds, and it is ordered that these bonds amounting to $50,000, and detached coupons amounting to $25,005, with interest accrued thereon, be also paid in like manner.

4. The whole of the remaining six per cent bonds seem to me to fall within one class. The act of 1869 requires the Savannah and Charleston Railroad Company to fund the coupons on the six per cent bonds which shall have fallen due in September, 1869, and the Supreme Court has declared that all bondholders whose coupons have been so funded have accepted the provisions of the act of 1869, one of which provisions is, that they shall be postponed to the seven per cent bonds authorized by that act.

The Supreme Court further holds that the bond and its coupons forming a single obligation are to be considered as one. The coupons and bonds were certainly one paper originally, and necessarily in the same hands. On the principle of continuity, as set forth by Mr. Wharton On Evidence, 1284, when a judicial relation is once established, it is not necessary to prove its continuance. The burden is on the adversary to prove that it *has ceased. And, in accordance with this view, it has been decided that the possession of the coupon is prima-facie evidence that the holder of the coupon owns the bond from which it was taken. McCoy v. Washington, 3 Wall. Jr. 381 [Fed. Cas. No. 8,731]; Moran v. County Comrs., 6 Ohio St. 287.

It follows in all cases where the coupons that have matured at or before September, 1869, have been funded under the act of 1869, the bond to which that coupon belongs is prima facie to be held bound by this Act of funding. The company is in possession of and had funded coupons of every bond issued except those of Mrs. Blair; and of those, the only parties who have made proof which rebuts the prima-facie evidence of acceptance is the holder of the Bradley Martin bonds, hereinbefore allowed. The result is, that all the six per cent bonds, with the foregoing exceptions, are postponed to the sevens issued under the act of 1869.

It is objected, however, that these bonds in the hands of an assignee, are protected from this infirmity of title by the Law Merchant. But it seems to me that the case of Furman v. Nichol, 8 Wall. 51 [19 L. Ed. 370], completely answers this objection. The public statute of 1869 required the railroad company to fund the coupons of 1869, and the court has declared the effect of that funding. The bond therefore, according to Furman v. Nichol, had this condition as it were written on its face, and whoever took it was affected with notice. The very absence of the coupons from the bond was absolute knowledge to the assignee that the coupons had been funded. It would seem to me that the act of 1869 itself took the bond away from the operation of the Law Merchant.

That act proposed a great public measure and prescribed the mode of carrying it out. If any one could defeat it by the simple transfer of the bond which had been postponed it would amount to the merest trifling, and it is far more consistent with public interest and justice to hold that, so far as this act is concerned, these bonds were excepted from the operation of the Law Merchant. Upon the whole I am of opinion that all the six per cents which have not been removed as above *set forth from the presumption created by the prima-facie proof are postponed to the sevens according to the provisions of the 6th Section of the act of 1869.

5. The question is here raised by one of the exceptions as to the relations to exist between the seven per cent bonds and those of the sixes which have not lost the benefit of the act of 1856 by acceptance of act '69. The sixes which are thus saved are only entitled to their relative share of all the sixes, and the postponement of their fellows cannot justly be made to give them any increased advantage. The sixes which are postponed in behalf of the sevens and the sevens will therefore take their place. Thus, if the sixes not postponed are equal to one fifth of all the sixes, then they will be entitled to one fifth of the fund for division until paid, and the sevens en bloc will take the four fifths till paid. It is adjudged therefore that in all cases where six per cent bonds are postponed the seven per cent bonds which are duly proved shall take their rank and place, and take a ratable share of the fund to be divided with the sixes which have been allowed.

6. All the seven per cent bonds which were issued under the mortgage to Williams, Aiken, and Robb have been duly proved by the executor of Cutting and by others, to the amount of $499,500, one bond of $500 short of the whole, and they, with the interest thereon, are entitled to take a ratable share of the proceeds of the sale with those six per cent bonds and coupons which have not accepted the act of 1869 to the extent of the amount set forth in the Statutory Lien of 1856; and if there be any surplus, then they would be entitled to claim that surplus to the extent of their debt.

7. The claim of Charles T. Mitchell and the several banks which advanced the money to construct the Bee's Ferry Extension and bridge. This claim has been established by the decree of Judge Pressley at $42,941.14-100, with interest from Oct. 1st, 1877. The evidence submitted together, with the report of the master, satisfies the court that the amount of the sale has been increased fully to that extent by this work.

The work was done by the consent of all parties except one, and as to that one he cannot claim a benefit from that to which *he objected; and as to him the cost of the construction would have to be reserved from the sale, so that in any event substantial justice will be best reached by paying from the proceeds of the sale prior to all other payments the cost of construction to those who have furnished the means. And the court is bound by every principle of justice to protect its own officer who simply obeyed its mandate, and from whom he took the protection which he held under the lien created when it ordered the sale of the whole road. It is also proper that in the litigation which ensued the receiver should in like manner be allowed his fees of counsel and the cost to which he has been put.

It is therefore ordered that the sum above reported, to wit, $42,941.14-100, with interest from Oct. 1st, 1877, be paid from the proceeds of sale to the South Carolina Loan and Trust Company, The First National Bank, and the People's National Bank, ratably and in proportion to the debts which they hold of the receiver under the lien, any surplus to be paid said receiver, C. T. Mitchell. As to the cost and expenses incurred by the receiver in defending this order of the court he ought to be fully protected, and these should therefore be paid together with the debt from the proceeds of the sale in preference to other claims.

It is therefore ordered that the master, Mr. Clancy, to whom this part of the case had been referred, do ascertain and report the cost and a reasonable fee for the receiver's counsel on this branch of the litigation, and that the same be paid with the debt from the proceeds of sale in like manner.

8. The referee has given preference to the coupons which he has allowed over the principal of the bonds, in accordance with a case from Blatchford's Reports which he cites. But the case of the Spartanburg and Union Railroad Company in 8 S. C., 129, has established a different rule, and there is no difference to be taken between the lien of the coupons and the bonds themselves. The exceptions taken to this part of the referee's report are therefore sustained and the report overruled.

9. Exceptions have been taken by McCrady and Son, which raised a question as to the rank of the bonds taken under the *act of 1869, for the coupons on six per cent bonds which were funded under that act. These bonds expressly recognize the priority of the seven per cents held by Cutting and others and therefore must take rank after them.

But, in relation to the six per cent bonds, it seems to the court that they should be reinstated to the rank which they would have held if these coupons had not been funded. When the court holds that the act of 1869 cannot be carried into effect as to these coupons, they should be restored to the holders, and these holders should be allowed to claim as for six per cent coupons under the Statutory Lien, which have been postponed to the sevens by their acquiescence in the act of 1869.

It is therefore ordered that these bonds be admitted to the same rank as the coupons on the sixes, which are to come in after the Cutting sevens.

10. The next subject to be considered is the claim of the state for taxes. It seems to the court that this point has already been decided. The original charter exempted the company from taxes. The act of 1869 made a new contract with the company, by which, in consideration of certain benefits granted by the state, the company agreed to waive its exemption.

The Supreme Court set aside the act which granted the consideration of the waiver, and the referee decided that the waiver fell with it, and held that the company was exempt from taxes. The Circuit Court sustained this report, and upon appeal the Supreme Court affirmed the decree of the Circuit Court. This seems to the court a complete adjudication of the question, and the exception taken to this portion of the report is overruled.

11. Mr. Pringle, by his former report of July 5, 1877, reported that the Hon. Thos. J. Robertson had proved 690 coupons, amounting to the sum of $10,350. This report was confirmed, and Mr. Robertson had judgment for the same on Circuit and on Appeal.

In his recent report, the referee finds that Mr. Robertson funded other six per cent coupons under the act of 1869, and thereby accepted that act. This report was filed in November, 1880. It does not appear that any exceptions were taken in this behalf, but afterwards, it does not appear when, Mrs. Robertson, the wife of Thos. J. Robertson, filed her petition, alleging that the coupons proved in the name of her husband were hers, and not her husband's.

On the 21st of February, 1881, an order of reference was taken to inquire into and report upon the facts stated in the petition, thus practically opening the judgment in favor of Thos. J. Robertson on these coupons. In signing the order I supposed there had been proper notice of the motion served, and that there was no objection.

Afterwards, Mr. Campbell excepted in open court that there had not been proper notice of the motion, and in fact he did not know when it was to be made, and also upon the merits, that the case stated was not sufficient to entitle the petitioner to the relief prayed for. The petition and notice appended are printed and both are without date. The attorneys for the petitioner say they "will move thereon before the presiding judge at the next sitting of the court in this county," as soon as counsel can be heard for an order "of reference to Hon. W. A. Pringle, referee," to take testimony upon the matter set forth in the petition. No other notice appears to have been given of the motion. This notice is clearly too indefinite and insufficient.

The order is set aside for want of due notice, without reference to and without prejudice to the merits of the petitioner's case.

12. During the sitting of the court, sundry holders of six per cent bonds, namely, John M. Guerard, J. L. Lamar, and others, in behalf of themselves and all others claiming a like interest, brought their petition verified by their attorney, whereby they seek to have so much of Mr. Pringle's report of July, 1877, as relates to the coupons of the six per cent bonds of the Charleston and Savannah Railroad Co., guaranteed by the state, produced and proved before Judge Pringle in the names of James Adger & Co., Geo. N. Miller, and Alexander Isaacs, recommitted to the referee, and that he inquire and report whether the said coupons have, by reason of payment or from any other *cause, lost the rank to which they would otherwise be entitled under the principles of his report, with leave to him to report any special matter. Everything stated as ground for asking this order appears in Mr. Pringle's report of July, 1877, and in the schedule appended thereto.

There is no alleged discovery of any fact which will not appear upon an examination of that report stimulated by ordinary care and vigilance. These coupons are especially brought to view in the body of his report, besides being set forth in detail in the schedule appended thereto.

Judge Pringle reports them as duly proved, and recommends their payment on the same footing as the bonds from which they were detached. No exceptions were taken to his findings and recommendations in this report, and they were confirmed by the Circuit Court. No appeal was taken as to these coupons, and the judgment of the Circuit Court was affirmed by the Supreme Court.

The purpose of this petition is to open this judgment of four years' standing, and upon the ground that it had been recently discovered that said coupons had been paid. It was not denied, but seemed to be admitted, that the bondholders who are now alleging a recent discovery did several years since receive payment for these coupons. There could not, therefore, be any recent discovery of that fact. The question which might have been made at the proper time was, whether the present holders of these coupons, having advanced their money and paid for them, were entitled as purchasers to stand in the place of the bondholders who got their money, and to claim re-payment of what they got for them. Fraud is not alleged. The opinion of the court is, that the petitioners, having neglected to raise the question, are now too late. It is res adjudicata, and there is no sufficient reason for opening the judgment heretofore rendered, even if it were within the jurisdiction of this court to do so.

The motion is refused and the petition dismissed.

*Supplemental Decree.

On delivering the original manuscript of my decree herein to my clerk, to be copied for signature, I inadvertently omitted the loose sheet, containing so much of my decision as relates to the claims due material men. I now transcribe the sheet thus omitted, and embody, in this form, my decision in reference to the said claims, directing that the clerk of the court shall securely attach it to the decree as filed, that it may be deemed and taken as a necessary part of the same.

The report of the referee upon the claims, "properly vouched and audited," due by the receiver to the material men, is hereby confirmed.

In deciding a similar claim, the Supreme Court of the United States said (Myer v. Car Co., 102 U. S. 13 [26 L. Ed. 59]): "In other words, it is, in effect, admitted, that the use of the cars was worth, to the court, while operating the road under the trust created by the appointment of a receiver at the instance of these appellants, just what has been decreed. There can be no doubt that it is the duty of a court to pay, from the trust fund it has in its possession, all the debts it incurred in its judicial capacity while administering the trust assumed pending the litigation in behalf of the litigating parties. * * * It is sufficient for our purpose, on this appeal, that an authorized officer of the court has, in a legitimate way, charged the fund in hand with the debt, the payment of which has been ordered."

Recognizing this decision of the highest judicial tribunal of the country as the settled law of the case, I hold, that these most meritorious claims must be paid; and that they are entitled to precedence over the bond debts, in the order of payment.

It is, accordingly, ordered, that the master, from any funds in his hands, shall pay the said claims of material men, with interest, to the solicitor of the petitioners.

The amounts due to employees, on the pay-rolls, have already been adjudged by me, and paid, and are, therefore, not embraced in this decretal order. The claim of Daniel Green was not argued before, and hence I have not decided it.

*The six per cent bond, No. 257, with coupons, from March 1, 1867, belonging to the estate of W. P. Ingraham, should rank with the six per cent bonds which have not accepted the act of 1869. And it is now so ordered, to remedy the accidental omission.

T. J. Mackey, Presiding Judge.

June 24, 1881.

To this decree, numerous exceptions were filed, but the precise points raised are clearly stated in the opinion.

The case was very fully and elaborately argued in this court by Messrs. Buist & Buist, Brawley & Barnwell, Thos. M. Hanckel, Lord & Inglesby, C. R. Miles, Mitchell & Smith, Hayne & Ficken, A. T. Smythe, John Wingate and James Conner, for holders of six per cent bonds and coupons; by Messrs. Youmans, attorney-general, and DeSaussure & Son, for the state and for the county treasurers; by Mr. J. B. Cambell, for the railroad company, and seven per cent bondholders; by Messrs. Memminger & Son, for Cuttings, executors and Mitchell; by Messrs. McCrady & Son, and A. G. Magrath, for seven per cent bondholders; by Mr. H. E. Young, for the receiver, claims against the receiver, and for Isaacs; by Mr. F. D. J. Lawrence, for Daniel Green.

August 9th, 1882. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. The "Charleston and Savannah Railroad Company" was incorporated in 1853, to build a railroad from Charleston to Savannah.

In December, 1856, the Legislature of South Carolina passed an act, entitled "An act to aid in the construction of the Charleston and Savannah Railroad." (12 Stat. 543.) This act provided for the endorsement of the guarantee of the state upon the six per cent bonds of the said company to be issued, not to exceed $5000 per mile; said bonds not to be used for any other purpose than "procuring the iron rails, chairs, spikes, and equipments, and for putting down the rails," etc., and then declared: "When the whole of said road shall be completed, *the state of South Carolina shall be invested with a lien, without a deed from the company, upon the entire road, including the stock, right of way, etc., * * * and the whole superstructure and equipments, and all the property owned by the company, as incident to or necessary for its business, for the payment of all of said bonds endorsed as aforesaid, as provided in this act, and for the interest accruing on said bonds," etc. And the act further declared that "the said lien or mortgage of the state shall have priority over all other claims existing, or to exist, against said company," etc. Under the provisions of this act the six per cent bonds of the company, payable March 1, 1877, were endorsed by the state of South Carolina to the amount of $505,000, and issued by the company.

On January 1, 1858, before the road was finished, the company needed more money, and conveyed to I. W. Hayne, Edward Sebring, and E. M. Beach, as trustees, all its then present and after to be acquired property, and all franchises, rights and privileges of the said company of, in, or concerning the same, in order to secure the payment of bonds to the amount of one hundred thousand dollars, a large part of which was issued. The road was completed and opened at the close of the year 1860.

The property was greatly damaged during the war. The referee reports that the company was reduced to insolvency; the road was broken up, the bridges destroyed, great part of the iron carried off, and the road as a whole no longer fit for use. Under these circumstances, the trustees under the deed of January, 1858, by virtue of the powers therein contained, proceeded to foreclose, and in December, 1866, the mortgaged premises were sold subject to the lien created by the act of 1856. At this sale the property was purchased by Geo. W. Williams and others associated with him, for the sum of $30,000, and in December, 1866, another act was passed incorporating the purchasers as a new company under the name and style of the "Savannah and Charleston Railroad Company," and thereafter the company has been known throughout these long legal proceedings by that name. The court confirmed the sale, and the new company was duly organ-

They had no other means of repairing the road but by a loan; but that they were unable to effect as long as the lien created by the act of 1856 in favor of the state was the first lien, and, therefore, in 1869 they memorialized the Legislature upon the subject, and on March 2, 1869, an act was passed, entitled, "An act to enable the Savannah and Charleston Railroad Company to complete their road," by which the company was authorized to issue other bonds to the amount of $500,000, bearing interest at seven per cent, the proceeds to be used in the extension, building, and outfit of the road. As they are frequently referred to in this opinion, the third, sixth, and seventh sections of this act are as follows:

Sec. 3. "That the said company is hereby authorized and required to fund and redeem the coupons for interest of the bonds of the Charleston and Savannah Railroad Company guaranteed by the state, now past due, and that may fall due on or before the first day of September, 1869, by issuing therefor an equal amount of their bonds with coupons attached for interest, payable semi-annually, at the rate of seven per cent per annum, and the principal to become due in twenty years after the date thereof. And the payment of the said bonds so to be issued in substitution for interest coupons shall be guaranteed by the state in the same manner and as fully as the said original bonds of the Charleston and Savannah Railroad Company are now guaranteed: subject, however, to the provisions of section six of this act."

Sec. 6. "That the present lien of the state of South Carolina on said railroad shall, upon the issue of the bonds provided for in and by the first section of this act, be postponed and become a second lien, which said second lien shall extend over and cover the whole road, its outfit and real estate, as fully as is already provided for by law. The said road shall be completed by the first day of January, 1870."

Sec. 7. "This act shall not be of force until said Savannah and Charleston Railroad Company consent to the amendment of their charter, so that the property of said corporation shall *be subject to taxation, in conformity with Section 2 of Article XII of the constitution, and said consent be certified under the seal of said company to the comptroller-general and secretary of state. Upon the filing of said consent, the said charter shall be deemed and held to be modified in conformity with said section of the constitution: Provided, That no tax shall be assessed or levied upon said road until the same shall have been completed."

The company in form accepted this act, and in accordance with it issued bonds to the amount of $500,000, bearing interest at seven per cent per annum, covered by a mortgage to Wm. Aiken, James Robb, and Geo. W. Williams, as trustees, which represented that the state having postponed the statutory lien, it was the first lien upon all of the property of the company. The bonds were negotiated with the contractors who rebuilt the road, and for other purposes connected with running the same.

In 1871 the stockholders of the company authorized another issue of bonds to the amount of $300,000, at the rate of eight per cent per annum, which were covered by another mortgage of the property of the company, its rights, privileges and franchises, in this state and Georgia, executed to Andrew Simonds, H. H. DeLeon, and E. Bates, as trustees.

Much controversy has arisen under these acts and mortgages as to the rights of the different classes of creditors of the company, but it is believed that for the purpose of making intelligible the issues now involved it will not be necessary to do more than make the following brief statement:

On April 12, 1870, Daniel Hand filed his complaint of foreclosure against the Savannah and Charleston Railroad Company, D. H. Chamberlain, attorney-general of the state, and others, to enforce payment of the amount alleged to be due him on unfunded coupons issued under the act of 1856, to wit:

Principal, $27,705, together with interest on the same. Soon after the attorney-general instituted proceedings to foreclose the statutory lien of the state, praying, among other things, that the creditors might be called in, for the appointment of a receiver, the sale of the property, etc. These cases, *considered together, were argued twice before the Circuit Court, and, on appeal to this court, were dismissed, without prejudice, and the cause sent back, that the Circuit Court might decide the character of the relief to which the parties were entitled. 5 S. C. 183.

On April 28, 1874, after the case went back to the Circuit, Judge Graham, seemingly by the consent of all parties, made a decree appointing Charles T. Mitchell, Esq., receiver of the road, who, in connection with an advisory board, was to work and manage the said railroad "with the greatest possible skill and economy, and the results be reported quarterly to the court in this cause, and the net profits, after paying all necessary expenses, including such amounts, if any, as may be due the employees and officers for services, shall be applied quarterly to the payments of the debts." The order in which the debts were to be paid by the receiver was declared in the decree, and all suits against the company were enjoined, etc. Soon after, Judge Reed enlarged the powers of the receiver so as to allow him to sell the road for the sum of $1,500,000, which, as stated, had been or would be offered for the same. About this time Solomon L. Hoge instituted proceedings to take possession of the road as comptroller-general, under the fifth section of the act of 1869, but this effort seems to have failed, and needs no further notice here. See Ex parte Dunn, in re Hand v. Savannah and Charleston Railroad Company, 8 S. C. 208.

In 1875, William Cutting and Heyward Cutting, executors of Francis H. Cutting, deceased, who held a large number of the seven per cent bonds issued under the act of 1869, made themselves parties in the cases, stating, among other things, that the income of the road under the management of the receiver and advisory board had proved insufficient to pay any of the debts set forth in the decree making the appointment, and praying a sale of the road, and that the bonds of 1869, and the state indorsed bonds of 1856, should be placed upon the same footing and the guarantee of the state entirely discharged, and accordingly on May 1, 1875, a consent decree was entered ordering the sale of the road on a credit, and discharging the *state from liability on its indorsement; yet it seems for some reason or other the sale and further proceedings under the decree were suspended by an order of Chief Justice Moses in the case of Ex parte Dunn above stated.

On April 19, 1877, Judge Reed made an order appointing William Alston Pringle, Esq.,

special referee, to report the rank of the different claims and in the order in which they should be paid upon the foreclosure and sale of the property, and on July 5, 1877, the said referee made a full and exhaustive report, both on the main question as to the priorities of the bondholders and all the collateral questions arising in the case. He held that the lien of 1856 attached to the bonds issued under it and retained its priority, and that the state could not postpone that lien to the bonds and mortgage of 1869.

He further held that the holders of the coupons belonging to the bonds issued under the act of 1856, who received in exchange for their coupons the bonds issued under the third section of the act of 1869, thereby accepted the provisions of the act of 1869 and consented to the postponement of the lien of the act of 1856, so far as the coupons funded were concerned. "The bonds, therefore, issued under the third section of the act of 1869 have no lien on the property of the company, and will take rank after other obligations of the company which have a lien on its property," etc.

The referee, therefore, after providing for certain liens on particular property, reported the priorities of the bonds to be as follows: First. The bonds and coupons still unfunded issued under the act of 1856 to be the first lien upon all the property of the company. Second. The bonds and coupons issued under the mortgage of 1869 to be a second lien upon all the property of the company. Third. The bonds and coupons issued under the mortgage of 1871 to be the first lien on all the corporate franchises of the company and the third lien upon all its property. Fourth. The judgment held by W. C. Bee, assignee, being the next lien after the foregoing on all the property of the company. Fifth. The seven per cent interest funded bonds having no lien on the property of the company, etc.

*To this report exceptions were filed, and the case came on to be heard before Judge Wallace, who, in so far as it related to the priorities of the different classes of bonds, confirmed the report, and ordered it to stand as the judgment of the court, and ordered the property sold by one of the Masters of the court. Exceptions were filed, and upon appeal to this court the case was heard here at the April Term, 1870. See 12 S. C. 314. In regard to the main question as to the right of the state to postpone the lien of the bonds issued under the act of 1856 to those issued under the act of 1869, this court concurred with the judgment of the Circuit Court. It also concurred with the referee and Circuit judge that the holders of the coupons belonging to bonds issued under the act of 1856, who received in exchange for the coupons the bonds issued under the third section of the act of 1869, accepted the provisions of the act of 1869, and consented, so far as the coupons were concerned, to the postponement of the lien of the act of 1856. But this court went further and held as follows:

"The referee, and the court sustaining his conclusions, held that the effect of the act of 1869 on those funding coupons thereunder was confined to the coupons so funded, and did not preclude parties having funded coupons from afterwards asserting their original rights as it regards the bond and other coupons not funded. The correctness of this conclusion will next be considered. The exact question is whether one having a bond of the class of 1856, and also coupons of the same class, whether detached or otherwise, and funding such of said coupons as were matured, under the third section of the act of 1869, can be regarded as having accepted the provisions of that act as well as it regards such bonds and immature coupons as the coupons that are matured and actually funded. The bonds and their coupons constitute a single obligation. State v. Railroad Company, 8 S. C. 153. The coupon merely evidences the obligation collaterally, as it regards one of its incidents. The act of 1869 operates upon the entire obligation, both principal and interest. One who accepts its provisions for one purpose, necessarily accepts it for all purposes, for its provisions are not capable of severance. When one claiming upon an obligation for principal and interest accepts interest upon a composition in terms assuming to affect the conditions upon which the same is due, he must be regarded as accepting the terms of composition in their whole scope. This conclusion is so obvious that it does not require authority or illustration. It depends upon the principle that when the contract is one and indivisible, if it takes effect at all it must do so as to all its parts. This does not preclude the possibility of severing the terms and conditions of a contract, but that depends upon mutuality of consent, while in the present case there is no evidence that the state has assented that the act of 1869 may take effect otherwise than according to its entire scope and purpose. It would follow that one funding coupons under that act must be regarded as bound by its terms, as it regards any bonds or coupons held by him at the time of funding of the same class, at least, with the coupons funded. The case before us does not enable us to apply this principle to the facts of the case; we can, therefore, only set aside the conclusion of the Circuit Court to the extent that it conflicts with the conclusions just stated, and the exact application of the principles laid down must be made upon a further hearing in which such evidence may be introduced on that point as the nature of the case demands." 12 S. C. 350.

Accordingly the case went back, and Judge Aldrich made another order for the sale of the property, which was affirmed on appeal. See 13 S. C. 467. The sale was made by Mr. Porter, one of the masters, for the sum of $300,200, less than either class of the bondholders seeking payment, and was confirmed by the court, and title made to the purchasers.

The order of Judge Aldrich also directed Mr. Pringle, the referee, to inquire and report as follows: 1. "What claims and demands against the Savannah and Charleston Railroad Company are undisputed and entitled to immediate payment. 2. What bonds and coupons of said company issued under the act of 1856 are entitled to priority of payment out of the property of said company, under the principles settled by the *judgment of the Supreme Court. 3. The amount of bonds issued under the act of March, 1869. 4. The amount of bonds and coupons issued under the Act of 1856, and entitled to priority of payment. 5. The bonds and coupons issued under act of 1869, indorsed by the guarantee of the state. 6. What coupons of bonds, issued under the act of 1856, have been funded under the third section of the act of 1869, the number and value of said coupons, by whom, when, and under what circumstances funded, etc."

The referee took testimony and made another report upon the point recommitment to him. He construed the opinion of the Supreme Court to mean that only the bondholders, personally, who funded coupons from bonds of 1856 must be regarded as bound by the terms of the act of 1869, so far as regards bonds and coupons held by them at the time of funding, and that those who presented six per cent. bonds, and were not found to have funded coupons, could not be presumed to have accepted the act of 1869. Considering the evidence offered with reference to this principle, he found that certain persons presenting bonds of 1856 were estopped, for the reason that it appeared from the books of the company that coupons had been funded in their names. From the identity of the names he felt authorized, nothing appearing to the contrary, to conclude that the same parties presenting the bonds had owned them at the time of funding the coupons. He furnished a list of the bondholders falling under this category, showing their names, and their bonds amounting in the aggregate to $65,500. But as to all the other bonds and unfunded coupons issued under the act of 1856, he held that the proof necessary to bring them under the principle of estoppel had not been furnished, and that they are entitled to retain their prior statutory lien, notwithstanding the act of 1869.

To this report exceptions were filed, and the case came on to be heard by Judge Mackey, who, upon the main point as to the sufficiency of proof to estop the holders of the six per cent. bonds, reversed the report of the referee, and after excepting the coupons of Daniel Hand as res adjudicata, and the bonds held by Beaty, as executor of Mrs.

Nancy *Blair, and those proved by Bradley Martin, decreed as follows: [The opinion here quotes nearly all of the sections numbered 4 and 5 of the Circuit Decree on pages 230-232 ante.]

Exceptions by the various parties and in different forms have been filed to this decree, and the question is, whether it is erroneous, and if so, wherein?

We cannot follow the exceptions seriatim, but will endeavor to consider all the points as they arise.

Most of the complications of the case originate in the fact that while the act of 1869 was unconstitutional and void so far as it undertook to postpone the lien of 1856, yet it has been held to be valid in part; that is to say, bad in the general, but binding as to certain persons and for particular purposes. The rights of the parties might have been easily determined if the act of 1869 had been legal and binding in all its parts, or if, on the other hand, it could be considered as wholly void and expunged from the statute book. But when the provision aforesaid, void in the general, has been held to take effect as to certain persons, not from its intrinsic authority as an act of the legislature, but from the conduct of the parties in accepting the benefit of some of its provisions, there necessarily springs up a new class of questions such as these, viz., who have done these alleged acts of acceptance and as to the proper effect and extent of such acts as to other persons and claims not involved in the acts themselves? In this state of the case the difficult duty is devolved upon the court of determining these vexed questions without the least assistance from, but really in seeming conflict with some of the express provisions of the act of the legislature in connection with which they arise.

The most important question in the case is that as to the priorities of the bondholders under the acts of 1856 and 1869. This court in its former judgment determined the rights of the parties. It decided that the state could not postpone the lien of the act of 1856, and that the act of 1869, purporting to do so, was unconstitutional and void; but it held at the same time that to this general conclusion there was an exception so far as concerned those who had funded coupons taken from bonds *issued under the act of 1856 then owned by them, and taken in exchange bonds issued under the act of 1869. As to these it was held that they had accepted the act of 1869 quoad these coupons so funded; and further, that on the principle of estoppel "one funding coupons under that act must be regarded as bound by its terms as it regards any bonds or coupons of the same class held by him at the time of funding." In order that the principle here laid down might be intelligibly applied, it was necessary to send the case back; and it was remanded in order to have it ascertained whether any of those who funded coupons held other bonds or coupons of the same class "at the time of funding," and if so, what bonds or coupons were so held, and by whom. As we understand it, this was simply a question of fact, and being a question of evidence must be determined precisely as other questions of that kind are determined; and it will probably assist us in reaching a satisfactory conclusion to keep constantly in view the simple character of the issue.

The doctrine declared by this court as to the effect of funding coupons, upon the holders of six per cent. bonds, does not proceed upon any supposed relation between the coupons funded and the bonds from which they were taken, but is of that class of estoppel which arises from the "conduct of parties." As it springs only from the act of the party it is purely personal, and in its effect cannot reach beyond the bonds or coupons actually held at the time by the party funding. It is true the estoppel springs from the funding of the coupon; that is to say, not from the coupon itself, but from the act of funding it; upon the principle that an admission of one as to a part of his property, may be held to affect all his other property of the same character. We think it is a misapprehension to suppose that the estoppel either arises from or rests upon a principle in the nature of a proceeding in rem, inhering in the coupon and thereby affecting the bond from which it was cut without regard to who was at the time the owner of the bond. The ownership at the time of funding is the indispensable prerequisite to the existence of the liability, and the fact that the coupon and bond were originally parts of the same paper can *have no effect whatever upon the question of estoppel, except in so far as it may be considered as a circumstance of proof upon the question of ownership at the time of funding, in which view it will be considered hereafter.

Was the proof sufficient to show that any of those now presenting bonds or coupons of 1856 had funded coupons of that class in bonds of 1869, being at the time of funding the holders of the bonds now presented, and, if so, as to what bondholders and as to what bonds or coupons was such proof made?

In this issue the onus was on those who alleged the existence of facts necessary to create the estoppel. The court had settled the law that the lien under the act of 1856 was not postponed, but that practically there might be an exception to be determined by the existence or non-existence of certain facts. When a party proved that he held bonds of the issue of 1856, he was entitled to priority, unless it could be made to appear that he fell within the exception, and it was incumbent on those who affirmed that he did to prove the fact. This is elementary. "A third rule which governs in the production of evidence is that the obligation of proving any fact lies upon the party who substantially asserts the affirmative of the issue. This is a rule of convenience, adopted not because it is impossible to prove a negative, but because the negative does not admit of the direct and simple proof of which the affirmative is capable. It is therefore generally deemed sufficient, when the allegation is affirmative, to oppose it with a bare denial till it is established by evidence. Such is the rule of the Roman law. 'Ei incumbit probatio qui dicit, non qui negat.'" 1 Greenl. Evid. § 74.

Accordingly the six per cents, with the exception of three or four individuals, offered no proof, but stood upon the former judgment of this court that the act of 1869 did not postpone them. The seven per cents undertook to make out against them the case of estoppel authorized by the judgment, and for that purpose introduced testimony, including the books of the company, to show who had funded coupons in 1869. The books were objected to as incompetent against the sixes. The entries were made in the handwriting of S. W. Fisher, treasurer of the company at the date of the entries, who is now dead. The referee admitted the books "as coming within the rule laid down by Mr. Wharton (On Evidence, § 238), as memoranda or book entries of an officer, agent, or business man when in the discharge of his duties, after his decease." We cannot turn aside now to go fully into the matter, but only say that under the circumstances of the case we think the referee did right in admitting the evidence, on the ground that it was the best proof the nature of the subject admitted of, and from the necessity of the case.

As to the sufficiency of the proof made, the referee and the Circuit judge took very different views, arising principally from the force of presumptions accorded by the judge to the simple possession of the coupons funded. We think it appears that the company is in possession of coupons from all the six per cent bonds, except perhaps twelve held by Mrs. Blair's estate. It was claimed on one side, and as strongly denied on the other, that all these coupons had been funded and none were taken up by payment. The evidence on the subject was somewhat confused. Mr. Fisher, who superintended the funding and made the entries, is dead, and the other witnesses for the most part could speak only from the books. It was much easier to issue other bonds than to pay the cash, and it is reasonably certain that a large majority of coupons now in possession of the company were funded—certainly to the amount in the aggregate of $172,800, but it is not quite clear that the company funded coupons from all the bonds, and to the extent of that uncertainty it would be difficult to say when any particular bond was presented, whether it was one of those from which funded coupons had been taken. But this is not very important. If we assume that the company has funded coupons of all the bonds, with exceptions as stated, how does the matter stand?

I. We have the names of those who now present six per cents, and the books give us the names of those who funded coupons from sixes, and we find that in a large majority of cases the bonds are now presented by persons whose names do not appear in the funding. As a rule those who funded and *those who now present bonds are different persons. There are, however, some cases in which the bonds are now presented in the name or at least in the right of those who appear to have funded coupons. As to this class the referee, as we understand him, having received no explanation from the parties after opportunity given to them, held it sufficiently proved that those now presenting bonds were the holders thereof at the time they funded the coupons, and in consequence that as to these bonds they are estopped by the act of 1869.

In opposition to this view it is urged that none of these bonds are certainly shown to be the identical bonds from which their coupons were funded, and that after such a lapse of time it may be that the bonds now presented were purchased after the coupons were funded. This may be possible, but considering how easy it would have been for the parties to make such explanation if they could have done so, we concur with the referee in his conclusion, that as to this class of bondholders it was proved that they were the holders of these bonds "at the time of funding." The principal witness being dead, it was from the nature of the subject difficult to make proof of the fact of ownership at the time of funding, and as a circumstance, the coincidence of the names of those who funded and those who present the bonds is so strong that unexplained it affords reasonable proof of the ownership of the bonds at the time of funding, although that occurred as long ago as the year 1869. The referee gives a list of those whom he places in this class, with some explanation, in his second report, which upon this point is affirmed and made the judgment of the court.

II. As to all the remaining bonds and unfunded coupons issued under the act of 1856, which are now presented by parties other than those who had to do with funding coupons, the question is more difficult. As to these the referee held that "the non-appearance of the name of the present holder in the books of the company is presumptive, if not conclusive, that the present holder of the bond was not the holder at the time of the funding, or that the coupons were sold and not personally funded by him. The bonds being negotiable secu*rities are not affected by any transactions of which the present holder has had no notice, and the present possession of such a bond is at least prima-facie evidence that such possession is bona fide, and without notice of any equities affecting it," whilst the Circuit judge took a different view, and held, as previously stated, that all the sixes, no matter by whom proved, are estopped by force of the presumption that the possession of the coupon is prima-facie evidence that the holders owned the bond from which it was taken at the time of funding.

It thus appears that the whole question is made to depend on a presumption which is claimed to arise out of what is called the "juridical relation" of a coupon to the bond from which it was originally taken. It is certainly true that the parties who funded coupons had possession of them at that time, and it is claimed that possession of the coupon is prima-facie evidence that the holder was at the time the owner of the bond from which it was taken. As we understand it, this is only another mode of expressing the proposition that the original unity of the bond and its coupons creates a presumption that such relation continues until the contrary is shown. If we are correct in this, the presumption claimed is clearly not one of those presumptions of law which are conclusive, but of fact, "which are, in truth, but mere arguments, of which the major premise is not a rule of law, and ought to be judged by the common and usual tests of the truth of propositions, and the validity of arguments." Greenl. Evid., § 44. Thus considered by the usual tests of truth, can it be said that the possessor of a coupon is, as a matter of fact, so certainly and universally the owner of the bond from which it was taken that it may be affirmed, as a rule of evidence, that the possession of one at any particular time subsequent to its issue proves the ownership of the other at that time?

It is true that the bond and its coupons were originally parts of the same paper; but, in regard to the idea of "continuity," it should be borne in mind that from the first the bond and coupons were not intended to remain, and that there is nothing in the character of their connection which requires that they should remain one and indivisible.

On the contrary, the *coupon, as its name indicates, was made for the purpose of being cut off, and it is well settled in law that such separation makes the bond and coupons distinct evidences of debt; and it is as well settled in fact that from the convenience or necessities of parties it is matter of everyday practice to separate them. As, for example, the action in this case was founded exclusively on coupons held by Daniel Hand, who, as far as it appears, never owned a bond of the company, but received his coupons in the course of business, without the least reference to the bonds from which they had been cut. In the case of Hartman v. Greenhow, 12 Otto, 684 [26 L. Ed. 271], the United States Supreme Court say: "The coupons, when severed from the bonds, are negotiable, and pass by mere delivery. They then cease to be incidents of the bond, and become in fact independent claims. They do not lose their validity if, for any cause, the bonds are cancelled or paid before maturity. * * * Here, also, the coupons held by the petitioner are distinct contracts, imposing separate obligations on the state. He was not the owner of the bonds to which they were originally attached. In his hands they were as free from all liability on the bonds as though they had never been connected with them." In Ketchum v. Duncan, 96 U. S. 659 [24 L. Ed. 868], Mr. Justice Strong says: "Interest coupons are instruments of peculiar character. Title to them passes from hand to hand by mere delivery. A transfer of possession is presumably a transfer of title."

We cannot, therefore, certainly say that any particular bond now presented is the identical bond from which coupons were funded; or, if so, that such funding was done while the person now presenting the bond was the holder of said bond. We cannot regard the mere possession of the coupon funded as affording satisfactory proof of the ownership of the bond at that time. This would be giving to the original unity of the bonds and coupons a continuing force and effect inconsistent, it seems to us, with the usual course of business as to such papers, and most probably, at least in some instances, at variance with the truth. The evidence does not come near enough or show the necessary fact with sufficient certainty and distinctness. Proof of facts which are to create an estoppel should be full and clear. "Certainty is essential in all estoppels. The courts will not easily suffer a man to be deprived of his property or security when he had no intention to part with it." Big. on Est. 441.

"When the burden of proof lies upon the plaintiff there must be something more than probability or even strong probability. * * * It seems to me that it would be very unsafe to say that because there is a strong probability of the existence of a state of things from which a prior authority, or subsequent ratification, might be inferred, a jury would be warranted in acting upon it as if there were strict legal proof." Fitzgerald v. Dressler, 97 Eng. Com. L. Rep., 395. The case of McCoy v. Washington County, 3 Wall., Jun., 381 [Fed. Cas. No. 8,731] and Moran v. County Com'rs, 6 Ohio St. 287, cited and relied on as announcing a different doctrine, are not analogous to this case. If these cases are examined carefully, not with reference to the doctrine and dicta of the opinions, but to the essential facts and the points decided, it will be found that neither of them holds anything inconsistent with the views here presented.

The inherent insufficiency of the proof to estop the bondholders of the class now under consideration will be more manifest when reference is made to the nature and character of the bonds as negotiable instruments. These bonds, although issued as long ago as 1856, were not due and payable until March, 1877. They were not dishonored, and passed from hand to hand by mere delivery. Whatever presumption as to the ownership of the bond at the time of funding may have arisen from the possession of the coupon at that time, is, at least, counterbalanced by that other presumption which arises from the possession of the bond itself.

"Bonds with coupons payable to bearer are negotiable securities and pass by delivery, and, in fact, have all the incidents of commercial paper. It is not necessary that the holder of coupons in order to recover on them should own the bonds from which they are detached. The coupons are drawn so that they may be separated from the bonds, and, like the bonds, are negotiable, and the owner of them can sue without the possession of the bonds to which they were originally attached, or without being interested in them." Thomson v. Lee County, 3 Wall., 331 [18 L. Ed. 177], and the authorities there cited; Langston v. S. C. R. R. Co., 2 S. C. 248.

But it is said that the present holders acquired their bonds after the act of 1869, and with knowledge that some of the coupons originally attached had been cut off, which itself was information that they had been funded by the owner under the act of 1869, of which they are bound to take notice; therefore, the present holders are in no better condition than those who, it is alleged, funded coupons from them while they were the holders. It will be observed that this doctrine of notice is based entirely on the assumption not only that the missing coupons were necessarily funded, but that it was done by the persons then owning the bonds, which we have endeavored to show could not be taken as universally true. Can a party be fairly fixed with notice of a fact proved only by a presumption which itself is at least uncertain?

It does not appear at what time the holders of these bonds acquired title to them, which might have been during the period from 1856 to 1869; but if we assume that it was after the act of 1869, and that that was a public act, of which every citizen was chargeable with notice, yet that act of itself cannot justly be considered as giving notice of anything outside of its terms. It did give notice that the company was required to fund the past-due coupons of 1856, but it gave to the public no information as to what coupons had been funded, nor by whom, nor whether those funding owned the bonds "at the time of funding." Whilst notice of the act as it was written was possibly notice of all the consequences which it involved, whether then known or unknown, yet, in considering a question which touches the "bona fides," we cannot shut our eyes to the fact that the act did not on its face declare what was subsequently developed by the courts, that the postponing provision was void, but contained in itself a latent power of restoration, as to the persons who should, even in ignorance of the true condition of things, accept some of its provisions.

*negotiable paper, which by the Law Merchant passes by mere delivery "Possession, even without explanation, is prima-facie evidence that the holder is the proper owner or lawful possessor of the instrument, and the settled rule is that nothing short of fraud, not even gross negligence, is sufficient to overcome the presumption and invalidate the title of the holder, as inferred from his actual custody of the instrument." Commissioners of Marion County v. Clark, 94 U. S. 278 [24 L. Ed. 59]. "The purchaser of negotiable securities before their maturity, whatever may have been their original infirmity, can, unless he is personally chargeable with fraud in procuring them, recover against the maker the full amount of them, though he may have paid therefor less than their true value." Cromwell v. County of Sac, 96 U. S. 51 [24 L. Ed. 681]; Witte v. Williams, 8 S. C. 290 [28 Am. Rep. 294]; McKnight v. Gordon, 13 Rich. E. 244 [94 Am. Dec. 164]. In our own well-considered "Bond Debt Cases," 12 S. C. 272, Judge Melver, as the organ of the court, after reviewing the authorities, announces the law in these terms: "The holder of commercial paper, in the absence of proof to the contrary, is presumed to have taken it under-due for a valuable consideration, and without notice of any objection to which it was liable."

The referee's report as to the class of bondholders under the act of 1856, now under consideration, is also affirmed.

In the general view taken by the Circuit judge, it was not necessary to consider special cases, and, therefore, they are not regularly before this court. The claims of Lord, as executor of Mrs. Roper, Tiedeman, and Quinby, should be recommitted to the referee to inquire and report in what class they should be placed respectively according to the principles herein indicated.

III. It is insisted that the coupons of the six per cent bonds which matured prior to September, 1869, are entitled to payment in full before distribution of the proceeds of sale among the bondholders, for the reason that all the coupons of the same class were settled, and the priority thus claimed is necessary to establish that equality which is demanded by the principles of equity. In support of this doctrine is cited the case of Stevens v. N. J. and Oswego Midland R. R. Co., 13 Blatch., 412 [Fed. Cas. No. 13,406].

*The referee adopted this view, but the Circuit judge denied the claim, and upon this point we agree with the judge. The holders of these coupons, if they had so desired, could at any time after 1869 have funded their coupons in bonds under that act, and thus placed themselves upon an equal footing with others holding coupons of the same class. They did not do so, and as to the fund now in the hands of the court arising from the sale of the property, being in the nature of equitable assets, they are only entitled to their pro rata with the other bonds and coupons of 1856, which are not affected by estoppel. The State v. S. and U. R. R. Co., 8 S. C. 129, and the authorities there cited.

IV. It is further claimed that inasmuch as some of the sixes have by their conduct accepted the act of 1869, and as a consequence taken their place in the postponed class, a corresponding number of the sevens should be advanced and allowed to take their places thus vacated in the first class; that the waiver of the lien enures to the benefit of those in whose favor it was made; that it must be held to operate as an assignment of the interest under the first lien, and that to the extent of the estoppel the parties simply change places. We do not see that the unaffected sixes would have any equity to object to such a result. They took their security knowing that it covered the whole class; so far as they are concerned it was a mere accident that some of their associates obeyed the law as it was written, and did that which postponed them. Those who did nothing have no equity to have their security increased in value, as each associate, who might have stood still, as they did, fell by his own act into another and a lower class. They have no right to complain when they get all the rights originally secured to them. If the act of 1869 were legal as a whole, or if it had been accepted by all the sixes, it is clear that by the terms of the act they (the sixes) would have been postponed, and we suppose the sevens would have become thereby "the first lien."

But in case of an acceptance only in part, can we declare the same result pro tanto as to the claims of those who are held to have accepted the act of 1869? We regret to say that we *think that is beyond the power of the court. The act proceeded on the assumption that it was to take effect as a whole, and of course it made no provision for the case which has arisen. It has been declared void, and is only revived quoad those who have accepted it, and there is still a class of sixes who stand out and insist upon their rights as having "the first lien." We see no authority which would authorize the court to declare any part of the sevens entitled to take the place of the postponed sixes, and share in that first lien. Estoppel is not declared by the act, but is the result of judicial interpretation. We cannot amend the law so as to meet an emergency which was not foreseen or provided for by those who framed it. We can do no more than simply declare the result of the estoppel as to the sixes, who have, by their own act, satisfactorily proved, lost their priority, leaving the sixes who are not estopped entitled exclusively to the first lien, as given to them by the act of 1856. This was in effect held by the former judgment.

V. It is still further contended that the interest funding bonds of 1869, which were taken in exchange for funded coupons of 1856, are entitled to rank as high as the coupons for which they were taken; that the state proposed to put these bonds exactly upon the same footing as the bonds from which they were detached, and that proposition as a whole having failed because of the unconstitutionality of the act, the holders of these bonds should not be bound by any of the provisions of the act, but be remitted to their former condition. If we could administer abstract justice, there might be force in this view. It is undoubtedly true that coupons are of the same grade as the bonds from which they are taken, and it is also true that nothing is payment but that which produces payment, or is received as payment. "To give one security for another of equal dignity, without the intention of discharging the debt, is not payment, but substitution." Gibbes v. G. and C. R. R. Company, 13 S. C. 228. The difficulty here, however, is that the parties funding took the bonds as payment under the act of 1869, and gave up their coupons; and there is also a further difficulty that the act of 1869, which they *accepted by receiving bonds under it, provided no security whatever for this class of bonds, except the guarantee of the state. This question was also adjudged by the former decision in this case, which declares as follows:

"There was no error in ruling that the bonds issued under the act of 1869, for the redemption of coupons of 1856, were not entitled to any lien on the property of the company. It has already been held that the act of 1869 was, in effect, an assertion on the part of the state of exclusive control over the lien or mortgage created by the act of 1856, and that the holders of bonds and coupons who accepted the benefit of the act of 1869, assented to and are bound by this view of the act of 1856. It would follow that they can claim nothing but what the act of 1869 recognizes by way of security. In that act the state waives its lien under the act of 1856 in behalf of the holders of bonds issued under the first section of that act, which does not cover the redemption bonds. Consequently the position of the redemption bonds is this: The property of the company is liable, as far as the bonded debt is concerned, in the first instance, for the payment of the bonds and coupons of 1856, where the rights of the holders have not become subsequently impaired; secondly, to the bonds issued under the first section of the act of 1869; thirdly, to indemnify the state upon its guarantee on the bonds and coupons of 1856, and on those issued under the act of 1869, which have upon them the indorsement of the guarantee of the state. This would leave the state bound as surety on the redemption bonds, and holding a third lien wholly subject to its control for its protection from liability thereunder."

To pay the liens in the order here indicated the sale of the road was ordered, and the judgment further declared "that as to all that part of the permanent property mortgaged that lies within the state of Georgia, such sale must be made subject to such liens as have been or may hereafter be established under the laws of that state." That is to say, subject to such liens by mortgage, execution, or otherwise, as by the laws of that state exist upon the permanent property of the company within the borders of that state.

*The next question is as to the coupons of Alexander Isaacs, G. N. Miller and James Adger & Co. On February 19, 1877, an order was made referring the issues to Wm. Alston Pringle, Esq., as referee, to take testimony, "ascertain and settle the rank and priorities of the claims proved by the parties to the suit, and all others whose debts are secured by mortgage or other liens upon the property and franchises of the company, and to report the order and rank in which the respective claims or classes of claims proved before him were to be paid upon the foreclosure and sale of the property."

The referee took the testimony, and on July 5, 1877, reported that the bonds and coupons of 1856 proved before him were stated in "Schedule A" as part of his report, which embraced detached coupons of the years 1870, 1871 and 1872, proved by James Adger & Co. to the amount of $14,580; by Alexander Isaacs to the amount of $14,730; and George N. Miller to the amount of $14,730. These items in the report were not excepted to. The Circuit Court confirmed the report April, 1878, and upon appeal to this court April, 1879, the Circuit decree was affirmed, except as to the extent of the estoppel resulting from funding coupons, as to which the court set aside the conclusions of the Circuit judge, to the extent that it con-licts with the conclusion just stated—"subject to the modifications hereinbefore indicated, the decree of the Circuit Court should be affirmed."

The case as directed went back to the Circuit. A second reference was ordered January, 1880, "to inquire and report what bonds and coupons of said company issued under the act of 1856, are entitled to priority of payment under the principles settled by the judgment of 1879, the amount of bonds and coupons issued under the act of 1856, not entitled to priority; what coupons under the act of 1856 have been funded; the number and value of said coupons, by whom and under what circumstances they were funded," etc.

While holding the reference under this order, it is alleged that facts were "satisfactorily ascertained" by some of the counsel, before overlooked, which led them to make a motion on March 30, 1881: "That so much of the report of the Hon. *Wm. A. Pringle, referee, of July, 1877, as relates to the coupons of the six per cent. bonds of the Charleston and Savannah Railroad Company guaranteed by the state, produced before him in the names of Alexander Isaacs, George N. Miller and James Adger & Co., be recommitted to the referee, and that he inquire and report whether the said coupons have, by reason of payment or from any other cause, lost the rank to which they would otherwise be entitled under the principles of his report, with leave to report any special matter."

Upon the hearing of this motion, affidavits were submitted stating in general the facts to be as follows: The company was required by the act of 1869 to pay in cash the interest due on the bonds of 1856 from and after 1870, and in default of payment the comptroller-general was authorized to take possession of the road. When the coupons of 1870, 1871, and 1872 fell due, the company was unable to pay them, and the President, Isaacs, and other friends of the road, agreed to advance the money necessary for that purpose upon condition that they should be allowed to hold the coupons so taken up as security for such advance. The company advertised as if they were about to pay, giving notice that the coupons would be paid on presentation at the First National Bank of Charleston. The parties holding coupons presented them and received the money which they called for, and the coupons were entered as if paid by the company; but, in fact, the money used belonged to the parties who advanced it.

The coupons thus apparently paid by the company, but in fact with money furnished by the parties, were delivered uncanceled to the parties, respectively, who advanced the money. When in this suit the creditors of the company were called in, the holders of the coupons thus acquired presented and proved them regular before the referee, who, as stated, reported as far back as 1877 that they were proved. There was no exception to this part of his report, which was confirmed by the Circuit and Supreme Courts.

Under these circumstances, the Circuit judge held that "the question which might have been made at the proper time, was whether the present holders of the coupons, having advanced *their money and paid for them, were entitled as purchasers to stand in the place of the bondholders who got their money? Fraud is not alleged. The opinion of the court is, that the petitioners having neglected to raise the question at the proper time are now too late. It is res adjudicata, and there is no sufficient reason for opening the judgment heretofore rendered, even if it were within the jurisdiction of the court. The motion is refused."

Was this ruling error? It is claimed that the matter now proposed to be referred to the referee was never in issue before him, and therefore could not have been decided by him in 1877, when he reported that these coupons were regularly proved and set down as existing demands against the company. It seems that at the time the coupons were proved no special attention was called to the circumstances under which possession of them had been acquired or the question as to their rights in terms made before the referee, but that the parties presented the coupons and proved them in the usual way without objection. The other creditors were all parties and did not suggest that these coupons had in effect been paid by the company. It may be that this omission was caused by the unusual mass of testimony and the complicated nature of the questions involved; yet it is undoubtedly the duty of a party to prove his case at the proper time or take the consequences. All matters which were then before the referee, or should have been before, or were necessarily involved in what was before him, were then in issue, and must be regarded as having been considered and decided by him.

The court cannot decide matters by halves. "If a defendant has been before a competent tribunal, which has proceeded to judgment, that decision, until reversed, is conclusive upon him in every tribunal having concurrent or other jurisdiction. It is conclusive upon him as to every matter of defence, not only presented but which could have been presented by him, and it is conclusive upon him, although the judgment be erroneous, if he acquiesce in it and does not proceed to reverse it. It is conclusive on him because a party whenever he is brought into a court is bound to full diligence, which, if he *uses, he will obtain his right—if he neglects either in putting in proper pleas, or introducing all his evidence to support them, he has no one to blame but himself; nor will his neglect in one court be allowed to give him a right to a second trial either in that court or another." Maxwell v. Connor, 1 Hill Eq. 22. The question of the ownership of the bonds and the right of the claimants to present them as still unpaid by the company, was necessarily involved in the proof of the coupons, which the referee reported had been made, and the judgment must be held to have embraced the very matter now proposed to be considered.

It is said, however, that even if this be so, the judgment was not final, as the cause is still in court. It is true that there has been no final judgment in the sense that the litigation has been entirely ended. The case has been before this court several times, and at different stages particular questions have been decided, and as to these the decisions were as conclusive and final as if they had been the only questions in the case, e. g.: The right of the state to postpone the lien of 1856 was decided by this court in the former judgment, and although the cause upon other points is still before the court that one cannot be again stirred. In cases involving many questions there is danger of the litigation being prolonged, and it is necessary to eliminate, in their order, those fully decided so as to be able to make progress with those still undecided.

In the case of Boyce v. Boyce, 6 Rich. Eq. 302, the court says: "We have numberless adjudications that where a party had an opportunity to except and has not excepted, he cannot again bring the matter either before the master (or the court) on Circuit or on appeal. The principle is essential to the due and orderly administration of justice, and must have a place in every well-constituted forum. If at law a party pleads to special points neglecting other points, he acquiesces in the pleadings of his opponent relating to the points he does not contest; and so here and so everywhere. We have other cases to the effect that if a party appeals he is concluded from considering points not covered by his appeal, and after the *appellate judgment is delivered upon the points to which the appeal refers, he is not at liberty afterwards, in a future proceeding in the case, either on Circuit or in the Appellate Court, to claim a consideration of the ground he has passed over and lost. See the opinion of Chancellor Harper in Britton v. Johnson, Dud. Eq. 28. A party who brings up a partial appeal loses every ground of appeal then existing which he neglects and leaves behind him, and cannot afterwards stir the objections lost by his supineness or acquiescence. The court is constrained to say that this objection comes too late. The report of the commissioner was made in 1842. Many exceptions were taken, but no objection was made on this ground. So far as the exceptions made were not sustained that report became the judgment of the court. The door of litigation must at some time be closed." Huson v. Wallace, 1 Rich. Eq. 1.

Considering the matter now agitated as necessarily embraced in the report of the referee, and determined by the orders therein, was it error to refuse to set aside that judgment and order it re-examined?

The application cannot be considered as made under the act now repealed, "To vacate and set aside erroneous judgments," for the reason that it was not made within two years after the judgment rendered. It cannot be considered as made under Section 197 of the code, for the reason that said section was intended only for the relief of parties who, by reason of some "mistake or inadvertence," etc., may have lost the opportunity of being present at the trial, or to be represented there, and for the additional reason that the motion was not made within one year. As an application for a new trial upon subsequently discovered evidence, the Circuit judge had no right to entertain the motion after the remittitur from the Supreme Court on the judgment, covering the point decided, had gone down to the Circuit Court. Cothran v. Knox, ante, p. 207.

But, finally, it is urged that this motion was an appeal to the large equity jurisdiction of the Circuit judge sitting as chancellor; that as long as the cause is still pending, and the court in possession of the fund, it is competent for the court *to correct any error which may have occurred, and to make any order necessary for the correct ascertainment of the rights of the parties. There is no doubt that the Court of Equity, in the interest of justice, exercises large powers before a matter has been finally decided, as in the case of Gist v. Gist, Bailey's Eq. 343, but that court does not undertake to ignore the principle of adhering to former decrees. On the contrary, some of the strongest cases on the subject originated in that jurisdiction. No case has been cited where the Court of Equity, after the court of last resort had finally decided a matter, has for any reason whatever disregarded the well established principles of res adjudicata.

From the view which we take it is not necessary to touch the merits of the application, but we may say that where an appeal is made to the court to put forth its extraordinary chancery powers and grant equitable relief, the party may with propriety be required to submit to the rule which makes it necessary to do equity in order to get equity. In such case the appeal does not proceed upon strict right, but is addressed to the equitable conscience of the judge, which will not be exercised except for the purpose of preventing a manifest wrong. As stated in the case of Gist v. Gist, supra, "the court is always reluctant, where the case is in its power, to exclude any apparently just claim or defence."

In this case the Circuit judge was not impressed with the equity of the claim. Without reference to the legal defence of payment, if the company had seen fit to make it, and insist upon the transaction as it appeared on the books, and not as it really existed, we concur with the Circuit judge that the equities of the parties who made the advances to take up the coupons in this case are substantially the same as they were in Ketchum v. Duncan, 96 U. S. R. 659 [24 L. Ed. 868].

What Chief Justice Waite said in Claffin v. The South Carolina Railroad Company [C. C.] 8 Fed. Rep. 118, may not be inappropriate here: "The next question is whether, as between the bondholders and the Syndicate, the coupons were bought or paid. I shall not undertake to recapitulate the evidence on this point, but content myself with saying that the *evidence, as I think, brings the case clearly within the rule laid down by the Supreme Court in Ketchum v. Duncan. Certainly there can be no claim of bad faith on the part of the Syndicate. * * * The arrangement was in every respect fair and honorable. All the members of the association were directors and members of the finance committee of the board. They were to be paid nothing for their services or the risk they assumed. So far as it appears, they were in no condition to be personally benefited by what was done, and in all the mass of testimony not a word is to be found reflecting on their integrity in the matter. There is nothing whatever in the case to show that the transaction was anything else than a laudable effort on the part of the directors to tide the company over what was supposed to be but a temporary embarrassment, brought about by an unexpected falling off of business, with the hope that upon a revival of business a disastrous failure might be avoided. The bondholders have lost nothing. The money they got when they gave up their coupons is certainly worth as much as their security under the mortgage would be to them now."

So much of the Circuit decree as relates to the subject under consideration is affirmed.

VI. The next question is as to certain debts contracted by the receiver, and called in the Circuit decree "Claims of Material Men."

The referee reported that the accounts against the receiver were classified as follows—viz., 1. Notes payable, $4311.62; 2. Open accounts on ledger, $4116.97; 3. Transient creditors, $6796.35; 4. Pay-rolls, $2368.53; 5. Balances due connecting roads, $5728.24; and recommended that they be paid from the proceeds of sale.

The Circuit judge confirmed the report and ordered them first paid. The fourth item, including amounts due to employees on the "Pay-rolls," was paid by consent of all parties on account of the necessities of men who earn their daily bread; but the payment of the other claims is strenuously resisted on the ground that the functions of the receiver, Mitchell, were limited to "income," and that miscellaneous *debts contracted by him are not chargeable on the corpus in preference to the mortgages, unless specially provided for in his appointment or subsequent order of the court.

The doctrines relative to the rights and duties of railroad receivers, and debts contracted by them, are comparatively new. They have grown up with the growing importance of railroads within the last few years, and even now are only in the process of development. Some principles, however, may be regarded as settled, but there are others still in controversy. It may be regarded settled that the receiver is merely the executive officer of the court; that his custody is the custody of the court, and that he has no inherent powers independently of the court expressly authorizing acts or approving them when done. We believe it to be also settled that the court, having taken possession of a railroad, has certain duties to perform, and, among others, will see to the liquidation of all proper debts contracted by its express order or authority; but we are not aware that it has been precisely settled as to what debts contracted by a receiver outside of his express authority the court will undertake to provide for, and more especially in a case where there is no "income," and the property out of which they are to be paid is already under mortgage.

In this case it is admitted that there is no "income," and it is proposed that certain debts contracted by the receiver shall be first paid—not out of any receiver's fund from profits, but out of the proceeds of sale, thus giving them an equity over the mortgage bondholders. The order appointing Mitchell receiver did not give him the right to contract debts and charge them upon the corpus. It contemplated income, and provided that "the net proceeds, after paying all necessary expenses, including such accounts, if any, that may be due the employees and officers," should be applied quarterly to the payment of certain mortgage debts. We agree with the referee that "it would require a very liberal construction of this order to interpret it as intending that the necessary expenses, including the accounts due the employees and officers for services, should be paid out of any other fund than the profits of the *road. If the amounts now due by the receiver are at all chargeable upon the fund arising from the sale of the road now in the hands of the court, such chargeability must arise from some other authority than that contained in the order appointing the receiver."

This would seem to dispose of the whole matter, but it is strongly urged upon us that these are meritorious claims, and have a special equity on account of their character; that the order appointing the receiver gave him authority "to hold, work, and manage the road with the greatest possible skill and economy," and that having done so, producing debts instead of profits, the court should take care of its own officers, and order them paid out of the property mortgaged to others. It was the duty of the receiver to keep his current expenditures within the current income, and if he could not do so he should have reported to the court, and asked leave to contract debts on the faith of the property. This would have given the parties in interest an opportunity to be heard upon the question whether a receivership should be continued which was not clearing expenses.

Many authorities have been cited as to what are proper allowances in a receiver's account, which are undoubtedly correct; but none of them, so far as we can discover, clearly mark the line which is important between "income" and "corpus." When general reference is made to the "receiver's fund," or the "trust fund" in the hands of the court, or "funds to the credit of the suit," we infer that the funds meant arose from "income," as nothing else can with any degree of appropriateness be called the "receiver's fund."

The referee rests his judgment on the case of Cowdrey v. Railroad Company, 1 Woods, 336 [Fed. Cas. No. 3,293] (also reported in 11 Wall. 459 [20 L. Ed. 199], and 3 Otto, 352 [23 L. Ed. 950]), and the Circuit judge relies on the authority of Myer v. Car Company, 102 U. S. 13 [26 L. Ed. 59]. In both these cases questions were discussed as to what expenditures should be allowed the receiver out of the "trust fund" under the control of the court, or out of "the fund to the credit of the suit;" but it does not appear whether such "trust fund" arose from "income" or the sale of the property. These cases *do not decide the precise question here, and, therefore, can give us little assistance. We may concede that under the authority of these cases, and others, these claims would be allowed if there was a fund from "income" out of which to pay them; but there is no such fund, and the question recurs, Shall they be paid out of the proceeds of the mortgaged property against the protest of the mortgagees?

In this vague state of the authorities, we are obliged, though with some hesitation, to render our own unaided judgment on the subject. A mortgage has a lien upon the property itself, but, without special provision, no lien upon the income. The mortgagor is entitled to the use and rents and profits until an order of foreclosure. He may use this income in working the property, paying current expenses, or in any other way; but he has not the power to give any liens upon the corpus for any purpose whatever, even that of cultivating or operating the property itself, which will postpone liens already fixed upon it. Any debts he may contract must take their place behind liens already resting upon the property. There may be cases where the court will declare an equity on account of additions made to the value of the property; but such are exceptional cases, and proceed upon different principles. When the court takes the place of both the mortgagor and mortgagee, and takes possession of an insolvent railroad by appointing a receiver to preserve it and make it profitable pending litigation, it has been established as a rule to allow the receiver to pay the necessary expenses of running the road, including damage to persons and property inflicted in so doing, out of the income in his hands called the "receiver's fund." Ex parte Brown, in re Gibbes v. G. and C. R. R. Co., 15 S. C. 518.

This is manifestly just, as the mortgage only covers the corpus, and the mortgagee has no right to the income until current expenses are paid. It would clearly be inequitable to allow the receiver to use the labor of the employees and then turn over all the fruits to the mortgagees, leaving them unpaid. In administering this equity, the courts have gone so far in providing for the payment of current expenses as even to recall any income that may have been paid to the mortg*gagees, and in that way temporarily diverted from the payment of the expenses.

Chief Justice Waite, in the case of Fosdick v. Schall, 9 Otto, 251 [25 L. Ed. 339] thus states the doctrine: "The income out of which the mortgagee is to be paid is the net income obtained by deducting from the gross earnings what is required for necessary operating and managing expenses, proper equipments, and useful improvements. Every railroad mortgagee, in accepting his security, impliedly agrees that the current debts made in the ordinary course of business shall be paid from the current receipts before he has any claim upon the income. If, for the convenience, of the moment, something is taken from what may not improperly be called the current debt fund, and put into that which belongs to the mortgage creditors, it certainly is not inequitable for the court, when asked by the mortgagees to take possession of the future income and hold it for their benefit, to require, as a condition of such an order, that what is due from the earnings to the current debt shall be paid by the court from the future current receipts before anything derived from that source go to the mortgagees."

But it seems to us that as a general rule this equity must be limited to the existence of income. The very fact that it is thought necessary to invoke the doctrine of diversion, shows that in this respect there is a difference between "income" and "corpus." As the mortgagor himself could not contract debts to displace liens upon the corpus, it is not clearly perceived how the court can give that effect to debts contracted by the receiver, who has nothing whatever to do with the finances of the company except the money which arises from the "income." Possibly the court might do so in an extraordinary case, where it clearly appeared that the debt was contracted at the instance of the mortgagees and for their benefit, but not in an ordinary case of excess of expenditures over income, without express authority to contract debts upon the faith of the property. "The extent of this power is measured by the absolute necessity of the expenditure for the protection of the property of which the court has taken charge." Jones on Railroad Securities, § 542.

*The possession of a railroad by a receiver changes no right of ownership; perfects title to no part of it; gives no new or additional right to any part; but is merely a holding by the same title, subject to the same contracts, limitations, and conditions under which the railroad company held the property at the time the court took possession. It is said in the case of Fosdick v. Schall, supra, that "the court will do what—if a receiver should not be appointed—the company itself ought to do." It is true that in the same case it is also said that "while ordinarily this power is confined to the application of the income of the receiver, cases may arise where equity will require the use of the proceeds of the sale of the mortgaged property in the same way," etc. What cases were here referred to we do not know; but, without going into that, it is enough to say that we see nothing in this case which takes it out of the category of ordinary cases, in which the receiver, without the express authority of the court, has contracted debts, having no income in his hands to pay them.

We have no reason to doubt that these are meritorious claims, and regret that there are no "profits" out of which they could be paid. If it were proper for the court to express a wish, it would be that they could be paid, but they are not receiver's certificates issued by the express order of the court for a particular purpose. They are simply debts contracted with the receiver, limited in authority, of an insolvent railroad, known to be covered with mortgages and not making expenses. We are not satisfied that there is any principle which would authorize the court, overlooking the terms of its previous orders, to transpose legal priorities and order these debts paid out of the proceeds of property bound by prior mortgages.

So much of the Circuit decree as orders the claims against the receiver to be paid out of the proceeds of sale in preference to the mortgage bondholders, is reversed. And this disposes of the claim of Daniel Green for damages for a horse killed and mule injured by the train, while the railroad was under the control of the receiver. If the damage was negligently done, this claim ranks as high as other debts of the receiver; but it is not a lien to take priority, and there is no "receiver's fund" out of which it can be paid.

VII. The claim of Charles T. Mitchell for cost of construction of the Bee's Ferry extension. Upon application of the receiver, Charles T. Mitchell, on July 11, 1877, Judge Reed ordered: "That the said railroad company be and hereby is authorized to construct, or cause to be constructed, a new track from the John's Island Station to Bee's Ferry, and to build a suitable bridge over the Ashley river at that point, as recommended in and by the report of Mr. Gadsden, and at a cost not exceeding the estimate appended hereto ($32,846.20). That the cost of said track and bridge be paid out of the surplus income of the road, after paying current expenses, repairs, and other charges already upon it; and the same when built and paid for at the cost of construction, shall be subject to and covered by the present liens according to their priority, etc., as shall any agreement with the Ashley River Company, or other persons for the use of their property. And until the works hereby ordered shall be paid for, in the manner provided aforesaid, they shall be and stand as a security for such persons as shall furnish material or construct them, or shall advance, or loan money, for such material and construction," etc.

Most of the attorneys representing mortgaged bondholders assented, but James Conner, owning $11,500 of six per cent bonds, objected to this order and appealed from it. The Supreme Court stating that "the propriety of the order can only be considered as it regards parties who did not assent to it," adjudged that "the order as to the appellant must be set aside." 10 S. C. 411.

Notwithstanding the decision of the Supreme Court that the alleged authority to the receiver was without the approbation of the court, the work of constructing the new track and bridge went on, and the money used for that purpose was furnished chiefly by the South Carolina Loan and Trust Company and the First National Bank of Charleston. It was advanced on notes of the company indorsed by Mitchell individually. *No money was paid towards the extension out of the surplus income of the road, as the order directed, but the debts remained unpaid and were growing by the accumulation of heavy interest.

On July 11, 1879, Mitchell filed a petition in the case praying for the payment of the moneys lent to him for the aforesaid purposes. The banks which had loaned the money answered the petition, putting forward their claims, and James Conner, a bondholder, also answered, objecting. It was referred to master Clancy "to ascertain and report the amount expended for the construction authorized by the order, and what amount is due upon the lien thereby created," etc. Master Clancy reported that the cost of construction was $42,941.14. Mitchell excepted, and Judge Pressley filed a decree fixing the amount due on "the lien claimed by the petitioner at the sum of $42,941.14, with legal interest thereon from October 1, 1877, when the work was completed."

It seems that after having the cost ascertained as above, Mitchell proceeded no further in his effort to foreclose his lien on the extension considered as a separate piece of property. On January 9, 1880, the whole road "included in the several deeds and mortgages proved in these cases," was ordered to be sold. An appeal was taken, which was dismissed. 13 S. C. 469. On January 7, 1880, the road was sold for $300,200. At the sale, no notice of any kind was given by the claimant, Mitchell, or any one else. It was referred to master Porter to report whether, under the sale made, the Bee's Ferry extension and bridge were sold, and what proportion of the purchase money Bee's Ferry junction and bridge bears in value to the whole road. Master Porter reported that the extension and bridge were included in the sale, and that the said branch had been in operation about two and one half years previous to the sale, and also "that upon the whole testimony his conclusion is that the extension and bridge added to the road a value equal to the cost of construction, and that the cost is the proper measure of the proportion in value it has to the purchase money of the whole road."

To this report exceptions were filed, and

Judge Mackey *ordered that "$42,941.14, with interest from October 1, 1877, be paid from the proceeds of sale to the South Carolina Loan and Trust Company, the First National Bank, and The People's National Bank, in proportion to the debts which they held of the receiver under the lien, any surplus to be paid said receiver, C. T. Mitchell. As to the costs and expenses incurred by the receiver in defending this order of the court, he ought to be fully protected, and these should, therefore, be paid, together with the debt, from the proceeds of the sale, in preference to other claims," etc.

The question now is, Was this error? Under a former order of the court, Mitchell had been appointed receiver, "to hold, work, and manage the road," and after discharging current expenses, to pay "the net profits" to certain mortgage bondholders. It can hardly be necessary to say, what has been so often held, that the objects for the appointment of a receiver are temporary in their character. It is not intended that the receiver should be permanent, and like the owner of property, look to remote advantages, or make permanent improvements; but simply preserve the property and make it profitable pending litigation. The receiver, as such, has no power or duty outside of the order of the court. See 10 S. C. 407, supra.

It is manifest that the order appointing Mitchell receiver did not authorize any such expenditure as that for the Bee's Ferry extension. Judge Reed's order of 1877 did in terms give such authority. That order, however, was granted, without reference, upon the consent of the counsel representing most of the bondholders, and was declared by the Supreme Court to have been improvidently granted, was set aside as to James Conner, the party contesting it, and left undisturbed as to the other parties, only for the reason, that being a consent order, it was in effect simply the agreement of the consenting parties. Mitchell, therefore, in building the Bee's Ferry extension, was not really acting as receiver, under authoritative orders of the court, but as agent of the consenting bondholders.

"When the object of a receivership has been accomplished, *and the occasion for it no longer exists, but it is nevertheless continued in form and manner, by consent of the parties in interest, the managing party is not regarded as a receiver, in the sense of the law, but as having the character and office of an administrator of a trust, by agreement of the parties. Consequently, the debts contracted by such manager, although having the formal sanction of the court, cannot be established as receivership liens, but are debts which are liens upon the trust property, under the common doctrine that disbursements and expenses properly made are entitled to payment out of the trust property. A decree entered by consent after the occasion for a receivership has ended, for a new and continuing system of tenure and management, does not make the manager the officer and representative of the court, but merely the agent and representative of the parties. * * * It is fundamental in every idea of receivership that the court is to have the active and responsible control of the administration. That was not so in this case; but, on the contrary, the whole course in general and in detail was devised and executed by the managers and their associates, without any supposition that the court had any real office to perform, calling into exercise judicial judgment, direction, or control." Jones on R. R. Sec., §§ 548, 549.

So we might say in this case. The Supreme Court not only set aside the order of Judge Reed, so far as it was contested, but afterwards declined to adopt the policy of endeavoring to make additions and improvements of a permanent character through the receiver, as the officer of the court. Of this all the parties had notice, and it cannot fairly be claimed that the court is responsible for the result. Ex parte Mitchell, 12 S. C. 83.

Considering Mitchell as the agent of the consenting mortgagees, he failed to perform the agreement, both as to the amount of the cost and paying it "out of the surplus income of the road." There is no income, and he now asks to be paid for his entire outlay from the proceeds of the sale of the whole property. The mortgage bondholders insist that their agreement was made on conditions, which have not been complied with, and that Mitchell, having failed to perform his part of the agreement, is entitled to no compensation; that as soon as the extension was built, it became part of the road, and the old lien extended over it, and the road having been sold as a whole, he may have a claim against the company for work done, but no security therefor.

We cannot accept this view to the extent claimed. There can be but little doubt that Mitchell made a valuable improvement to the property, and we think that he had by this agreement of the consenting mortgagees a lien on the road he built, according to the terms of the consent order, which provided that "until the works (describing them) shall be paid for in the manner aforesaid, they shall be and stand as for a security for such persons as shall furnish material or construct them, or shall advance or loan money for such material and construction," etc. It is true, as matter of law, that the old liens stretched over the extension as part of the road; but we think it did so subject to the lien of the builder above provided for.

At the sale of the property under the order of court, Mitchell did not object to the extension being sold as part of the road. The whole road, including the extension, was sold, and he has an equity to share in the proceeds of the sale to the extent that the branch built by him enhanced the price which the whole road sold for. We do not mean that he is entitled to what the extension cost, for it is rare that a railroad brings at public sale half the original cost, nor that he is entitled to receive a theoretical estimate of its real abstract value; but the proportion of the purchase money which was produced by his part of the property. If the whole property unfortunately sold for less than its true value, we do not see why he should not be required to share in the sacrifice. He had a case pending in court to sell separately the branch extension, on which he had a lien. He did not, perhaps could not, insist upon a separate sale, but acquiesced in the sale of the whole, which thereby became in part his sale. It was as if the owners of two adjoining lots of land should agree to sell them together, or as if the sale had been made for partition between Mitchell and the consenting bondholders as tenants in common, having un*equal interests—the bondholders owning the old and Mitchell the new road.

As was said in a former judgment of this court, in this very case, in regard to another local lien created after the mortgages, and substantially analogous to this: "It cannot be doubted that a railroad corporation may mortgage after to be acquired property. Dunham v. Railway, 1 Wall. 259 [17 L. Ed. 584]; Pennock v. Coe, 23 How. 117 [16 L. Ed. 436]; Pierce v. Railroad, 24 Wis. 551. * * * But to hold that a railroad company may make a mortgage of land to be acquired so as to defeat a purchase money mortgage of land subsequently acquired, stands on an entirely different footing, and cannot be admitted. The Charleston and Savannah Railroad Company having given a purchase money mortgage for the land, no obligation or lien affecting that company or its property can be interposed prior to such purchase money mortgage. The mortgage of Trenholm and Potter was properly upheld by the decree as a first lien as to such mortgaged property. So far as it regards that portion of the mortgaged land that was requisite for the use of the railroad as such, the claims of the estates of Trenholm and of Potter must be confined to the fund arising from the sale of the railroad as a whole, and for that purpose there should be an inquiry to ascertain what ratable proportion of the whole fund arising from such sale would properly represent the relative value of that portion of the mortgaged land." 12 S. C. 365.

In this view there was error in the order of reference upon this question, and it should be recommitted to ascertain what ratable proportion would properly represent the relative value of the old road and the extension considered only in reference to the purchase money of the whole.

We have seen that the Bee's Ferry extension was made by agreement with certain mortgagees, acting through a consent order of court. James Conner gave no consent at any time, and his interest was expressly excepted in the contract with Mitchell. Under these circumstances the court cannot exclude him against his protest from the full share that he may be entitled to in the whole proceeds of sale.

*It is always embarrassing for this court to attempt to adjust costs and counsel fees, which more appropriately belong to the Circuit Court. It seems to us, however, that in this case there should be some system upon the subject, and that the costs and fees of all the attorneys properly chargeable for successful services should be paid out of the common fund, so as to make the successful litigants pay their proper proportion.

VIII. The only remaining question is that in reference to the taxes claimed by the state.

1. The original act of incorporation of 1853 exempted the company from taxation for thirty-six years. 2. The act of 1856, which created the statutory lien to secure the bonds of that date, prohibited the old company from conveying to any person whatever any lien or incumbrance which should come in conflict with said lien. 3. The act of 1866 incorporating the new company required that it should pay the bonds of 1856, and exempted its property from taxation without limit as to time. 4. The act of 1869, purporting to postpone the lien of 1856, contained a provision that the act should not take effect until the new company consented to an amendment of its charter so that its property should be subject to taxation in conformity with the constitution. 5. This act has been declared unconstitutional, but before it was so declared the company, upon the faith of its provisions, had formally accepted it as an amendment of the charter, and that its property should be subject to taxation after January 1st, 1870, at which time the reconstruction of the road was to be finished.

The referee in his first report held that the state had no right to postpone the lien of 1856, and, therefore, no right to exact the payment of taxes, which was the condition upon which the postponement was made. The postponement being beyond the power of the legislature, the exaction of taxes is beyond its right. The Circuit judge concurred with the referee; but on appeal the Supreme Court, after discussing only the question of fact as to whether the road was really finished January 1st, 1870, held as follows: "It is evident that this arrangement [with another railroad running into Savannah] put in exercise the franchise of the defendant *corporation to carry passengers and freight, for hire, to its full extent; that is, from the city of Charleston to the city of Savannah. Whether the defendant corporation chose to build and own or lease their right of approach to Savannah, is immaterial to the question of completion within the meaning of the act of 1869. Under such circumstances, the exemption claimed by the defendant corporation cannot be sustained by any reasonable construction of the act of 1869. That portion of the decree that sustains the imposition of the taxes should be affirmed."

When the case went back, the referee and Circuit judge both interpreted the opinion as being a judgment against the state as to the taxes, and upon exceptions the point comes again before this court. What is the proper construction of the judgment of the Supreme Court? It is contended on one side that the Circuit decree is in express terms "affirmed," and on the other, it is insisted as confidently that the intention was to reverse the Circuit decree. The then chief justice, to whom it was assigned to write the opinion of the court, though generally so accurate, overlooked the character of the Circuit decree which did not sustain the imposition of the taxes, but the contrary. The reasoning, which was confined to the subject of the completion of the road, seems to indicate one view, and the conclusion another, and, inasmuch as it is impossible to say with judicial certainty what was adjudged, we will consider the question as undecided.

The act of 1853 incorporating the old company, exempted its property from taxation for thirty-six years, and expressly exempted it from the forty-first section of the act of 1841. Under this charter the bonds of 1856 were issued. If the same company had remained in possession of the property and there had been no further legislation, there can be no doubt that both the company and its mortgage creditors could have insisted on the exemption as a contract. Whether that exemption was a privilege or a franchise it was such a vested right as a subsequent legislature could not repeal. "It has been held that the legislature has the power to bind the state in relinquishing its power to tax a corporation. It has been *held that such a provision in the charter of a corporation constitutes a contract which the state may not subsequently impair. These doctrines have been reiterated and reaffirmed so recently as the year 1871 in an opinion delivered by Mr. Justice Davis, in the case of the Wilmington Railroad v. Bird. They must be considered as settled in this court." Humphrey v. Pegues, 16 Wall. 249 [21 L. Ed. 326]. Assuming this to be settled, we think nothing has occurred sufficient to change those original rights so far as the bonds of 1856 are concerned.

But it is said that the old company to whom the exemption was given has passed away and its property gone into other hands; that the purchasers formed themselves into a new company, chartered in 1866, and that this was practically a forfeiture of the charter and ended the exemption. We do not think that a statutory exemption from taxation, under which as a contract rights have vested, is a mere personal privilege which ends with the ownership of the first taker, if the property, although in other hands, is continued in the same use on account of which the exemption was granted. Besides, in this case, the new company took the place of the old. "The company hereby formed shall assume and be liable for the payment of the six per cent. interest-bearing bonds, whenever the guarantee of the state has been indorsed, and the lien of the state is in every respect preserved and hereby reaffirmed." The charter of the new company also contained a provision exempting the property from taxation indefinitely.

It is insisted, however, that there has been still another act, that of 1869, which gave to the new company the right to contract a new debt for $500,000, and in order to make it the first lien, pushed back the six per cent bonds already issued, and in consideration of this great boon required the company to give up their exemption from taxation, which they did in form, and in consequence of that relinquishment their property has been legally subject to taxation since 1870. It does not seem to us that this view is sound, for several reasons. In the first place, it is more than doubtful whether the company, that is to say, the stockholders, had the power to give up the exemption without the consent of those who held bonds under the act of 1856, and which they had received on the faith of the provisions of that act. It would seem a remarkable instance of vested rights doubly violated, if the security afforded to the six per cent bonds by the exemption from taxation of the property mortgaged could be given up upon the consideration of a still greater wrong, the postponement of the lien itself. But, without pursuing that, the conclusive answer is that the act of 1869, which required the relinquishment, having been declared to be unconstitutional, the scheme of postponement failed. The part of the act which gave a benefit to the company as it appeared, and which induced the relinquishment under a mistake, turned out to be a nullity, and the matter remains as if the act of 1869 had never been passed. The consideration of the relinquishment having failed, the state cannot insist upon its enforcement, but must leave the matter as it stood before the act, which failed of its purpose.

It is urged, however, that the consideration of the act has not failed entirely, for the reason that it is still enforced as to some parties, and for particular purposes. No part of the act, so far as regards the provision for postponement of the bonds of 1856, has been enforced from any inherent force which it has as a legal enactment; but only from the conduct of parties in particular cases. So far as the state is concerned, the whole provision which undertook to postpone the sixes was, and is, absolutely void. If the act of 1869 was, as declared, unconstitutional, so far as it undertook, with the consent of the company, to postpone the six per cent bondholders in regard to their lien on the property, why was it not also unconstitutional so far as it undertook, with the like consent, to repeal the exemption from taxes? The bondholders had as certainly a vested right in that exemption from taxation as they had in the property itself under their lien. It was not tangible property, but it concerned the value of tangible property. It added largely to their security. The holders of these bonds purchased them upon the assurance that the property covered by the statutory lien would not be reduced in value by the imposition of taxes on it. For this they had the plighted faith of the state, and they are entitled to have it *in that condition against either an attempted relinquishment of the new company, or an effort to repeal it by the legislature.

Upon this question, the case of Furman v. Nichol, 8 Wall. 44 [19 L. Ed. 370], is in point. The exemption in the charter was not personal, but attached to the bonds, just as if the original charter under which they issued were printed on the back of each bond. The state cannot be sued, and on that account should be only the more prompt to do justice, and scrupulous to keep faith. We cannot see that the state has any claim for taxes on the property of the company as against bonds issued under the act of 1856, which are unaffected by estoppel.

The judgment of this court is, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be modified so as to conform to the conclusions herein announced.

Before Kershaw, J., Abbeville, January, 1881.

Hon. THOMAS B. FRASER, of the Third Circuit, sat in the place of Mr. Justice McGOWAN, who had been of counsel in the cause.

The complaint of the above-named plaintiff respectfully shows to this court:

I. That at the time hereinafter mentioned the plaintiff was lawfully possessed of the property described in Exhibit "A" herewith attached, and which the plaintiff prays may be taken as a part of this complaint, of the value of about nine hundred dollars, then and ever since his property.

II. That on the 7th day of January, 1879, at Ninety-Six in the county and state aforesaid, the defendant wrongfully took said goods and chattels from the possession of this plaintiff, and still unjustly detains the same to the damage of this plaintiff five thousand dollars.

Wherefore the plaintiff demands judgment against Julius F. C. DuPre, as sheriff, of the county and state aforesaid, the aforesaid defendant, for the recovery of possession of said goods and chattels, or for the sum of nine hundred dollars, the value thereof, in case a delivery cannot be had; together with five thousand dollars, his damages and for his cost.

J. A. Richardson and Eugene B. Gary, Plaintiff's Attorneys.

The answer was as follows:

The defendant J. F. C. DuPre, by McGowan & Parker, his attorneys, answering the complaint above, alleges:

1st. This defendant denies each and every allegation of the first and second paragraphs of the complaint.

2d. For a further defence.

This defendant alleges that he did as sheriff, on 7th day of January, 1879, by virtue of a warrant of attachment to him directed, in the case of Clayton & Webb, plaintiffs against Wm. E. Walker, defendant, seize and attach in the possession and under the control of said defendant, the goods and chattels mentioned in the complaint, amounting in value to the sum of six hundred and forty-five  $\frac{90}{100}$  dollars as aforesaid, as the property of said Wm. E. Walker, the debtor, under the instructions \*received from the plaintiffs and their attorneys, the ownership the plaintiff in this case being denied, and he insists that the said plaintiff is not entitled to the recovery of the goods and chattels or damages.

Wherefore the defendant demands judgment against the plaintiff for his costs.

McGowan & Parker.

Defendant's Attorneys.

Plaintiff proved the bill of sale made by William E. Walker to him on December 10, 1878, and the subsequent seizure of the property by the defendant, as sheriff, under warrant of attachment issued at the suit of Clayton & Webb against said Walker. He also proved that his attorney at the time of the seizure had stated to the sheriff that plaintiff would proceed against him for damages, and the plaintiff also proved the value of the goods and the amount of damages sustained by him. Defendant by several witnesses proved declarations of Walker that Paris was only his clerk, and had no interest in any of the goods at Ninety-Six; that Walker purchased goods from several parties and ordered them shipped to Spartanburg, from which point he reshipped them to several parties at different places, some of them to Paris at Ninety-Six; that when arrested for selling liquors to Paris without a license, he testified before the U. S. Commissioner that he had not sold to Paris, but only shipped to him.

In the bill of sale, it is stated that Walker owned a two-thirds interest in the business at Ninety-Six, and Paris one-third; that Paris purchased Walker's interest at and for the price of $607 to be paid "at once." There was also evidence that Paris was a man of no means.

The presiding judge charged the jury as follows:

That this was a question of fact for the consideration of the jury. That the question was as to the ownership of the goods seized by the sheriff, as the property of William E. Walker, under attachment at the suit of Clayton & Webb, in the possession of R. J. Paris, plaintiff; and was the sale made, as alleged, by Walker to Paris on 10th Dec., 1878, before the *attachment of his interest in the stock of goods at Ninety-Six, in good faith, or was it sham and pretensive? that the jury were to take into consideration all the facts of the case as appeared from the evidence, and if they came to the conclusion that the goods were the property of R. J. Paris, plaintiff, then their verdict should be for plaintiff; otherwise then for defendant.

His Honor also states in his report of the case as follows:

The plaintiff's attorney excepted to the admission of all the testimony tending to show the pecuniary condition of Walker at the time of the alleged sale. Also, to the admissibility of the testimony of the plaintiff herein, as to what he testified in the case of Kennesaw Mills Co. v. William E. Walker, supplementary proceedings. Also, to the admissibility of parol testimony as to what W. E. Walker testified on his preliminary examination before United States Commissioner. Also, to the testimony of W. Y. Holland and others taken by commission as to the declaration of W. E. Walker, and generally to the proof of all those circumstances tending to show that William E. Walker had probably transferred the property in question to the plaintiff in order to defeat the claims of his creditors.

I overruled these objections on the ground that these circumstances bore upon the question submitted to the jury as to whether the alleged sale was real or only pretensive.

J. B. Kershaw, Presiding Judge.

April 22, 1881.

Verdict was for defendant, and plaintiff appealed upon the following exceptions:

Take notice that the plaintiff Reuben J. Paris excepts to the rulings of the presiding judge, and will appeal to the Supreme Court from the verdict and judgment herein rendered, at the January term, 1881, of the Court of Common Pleas for Abbeville county, and move to reverse the same, and for a new trial, on the following grounds:

1. Because the presiding judge erred in ruling that the defendant could prove fraud when neither fraud nor facts tending to show fraud were alleged in defendant's answer.

*2. Because the presiding judge erred in allowing evidence of facts tending to show fraud when the answer of defendant contained only a general denial of plaintiff's title and right of possession of the personal property in dispute, and an allegation that defendant seized said goods, as sheriff, by virtue of a warrant of attachment against William E. Walker.

3. Because the presiding judge erred in allowing the declarations of William E. Walker, not made in the presence of the plaintiff Reuben J. Paris, to be offered in evidence.

4. Because the presiding judge erred in allowing the defendant to offer any evidence except such as tended to prove the allegations of the answer.

5. Because the verdict and judgment are in all respects contrary to the law and evidence.

Eugene B. Gary and Orville T. Calhoun,
Plaintiff's Attorneys.

Mr. Eugene B. Gary, for appellant.
Messrs. Parker & McGowan, contra.

May 12, 1882. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice FRASER. This was an action for the delivery of certain goods and chattels and for damages for the wrongful taking and detention of the same, the plaintiff alleging lawful possession in himself, and the defendant, after denying each and every allegation of the complaint, setting up a levy under an attachment and an execution in favor of Clayton & Webb v. Wm. E. Walker, under whom plaintiff claimed. Under the instructions of the presiding judge as to the law the jury found a verdict for the defendant, and from the judgment entered upon this verdict an appeal has been taken to this court. Several questions were raised on the Circuit, and have been discussed in the argument before this court, which do not arise on the exceptions and cannot be considered.

The 1st, 2d, and 4th exceptions are substantially the same: that, neither fraud nor facts tending to show fraud in the plaintiff's title from Wm. E. Walker having been alleged by defendant, it was not competent to introduce evidence to show it. The complaint in this case alleges title in the usual way, that the plaintiff was "lawfully possessed" of the property in dispute; and the general denial puts in issue every fact which goes to make up that title—the execution, the consideration, and good faith of the transfer of the property to him. A defence which admits the plaintiff's claim and seeks to avoid it must be set up in the answer distinctly and with due particularity, but this is not necessary where the defence denies in toto the plaintiff's claim.

The plaintiff in opening his case was bound only to show that the property was taken from his possession by the defendant, its value, and damages, if any. The burden of proof was then on the defendant, but as soon as he showed that he had seized the property by virtue of process against W. E. Walker, at the suit of a creditor, and that W. E. Walker had purchased and been the owner of it, the burden was again thrown on the plaintiff to show a valid transfer to himself. At this point, upon whomsoever may have been the burden of proof as to bona-fide consideration, it was a mere question of evidence as to the validity of the transfer from Walker to plaintiff, R. J. Paris. See Lyles v. Bolles, 8 S. C. 263. This court, therefore, holds that the evidence in the case, which tended to show that the transfer of the property from Walker to plaintiff was fraudulent, was properly admitted.

The 3d exception is as follows: "Because the presiding judge erred in allowing the declarations of Wm. E. Walker not made in the presence of plaintiff Reuben J. Paris to be offered in evidence."

In this case there was evidence "that Wm. E. Walker arrived at Ninety-Six on the railroad train about 12 o'clock December 10, 1878, that said Walker and Paris went to the house of Richardson (an attorney-at-law) after supper at night to get him to prepare a bill of sale from Walker to Paris of his interest in the goods; that no money passed on the occasion, and that Walker left Ninety-Six on a freight train, as plaintiff testified, about 8 o'clock p. m." The deed of assignment bears this date and recites payment in full of $607 at and before the *delivery of the deed. It is also in proof that certain barrels of whiskey, in which it seems these parties were dealing, had been shipped to Walker at Spartanburg, and, without being taken from the depot, were reshipped to Ninety-Six to Paris, and that many of the barrels and packages seized by the defendant had the mark "Walker" erased and Paris put on them. Plaintiff claims that they were partners.

Where a consideration between the assignor and assignee, with a view to perpetuate a fraud on creditors by means of the assignment (which fraud has not then been perfected), is previously established, the declarations of the assignor will be evidence against the assignee to the fullest extent, though made after the assignment. Cuyler v. McCartney, 33 Barb. 165. There was at least sufficient evidence of collusion between Walker and Paris to allow these statements, whether before or after the date of the assignment, to go to the jury.

The only statement of Walker after the assignment was one made before C. P. Wafford, referee in another cause, and seems to have been in presence of Paris, and if it were not so, is of such a character as would not have prejudiced the plaintiff; and for this reason its admission would be no ground for a new trial.

The 5th exception is too general to require any judgment of this court upon it.

The necessity for a return of nulla bona on an execution before proceeding against personal property fraudulently disposed of by a debtor has not been presented by the exceptions in this case. It seems, however, to have been the practice in this state in such case to levy and sell as though no such sale had been made. Motte v. Aiken, 2 Speers, 115; De Millen v. McAlliley, 2 McM. 499; Ford v. Aiken, 4 Rich. 133.

It is therefore ordered and adjudged that the exceptions be overruled, the judgment of the Circuit Court affirmed, and the appeal dismissed.

Before Wallace, J., Laurens, May, 1880.

Hons. J. H. HUDSON and T. B. FRASER sat in the place of the CHIEF JUSTICE, and Mr. Justice MCGOWAN, who had been of counsel in the cause.

This action was commenced in 1872 by W. F. A. Dickerson and Lucy W., his wife, and the minor children of the latter, against William T. Smith and John R. Smith, executors, and Joel F. Smith, James Smith, Mary Smith, Basil H. Smith and Charles L. Smith.

The opinion makes a statement of the case.

The testimony of the two adult plaintiffs and of Basil H. Smith, in behalf of the plaintiffs was taken before the clerk and read at the trial. The witnesses W. F. A. Dickerson, B. H. Smith and C. P. Sullivan, produced by plaintiffs, were sworn in open court before the presiding judge, as also were the witnesses for the defendant, W. F., Joel F., John R. and Charles L. Smith, and others. The substance of their testimony is stated in the opinion. It related principally to the issue, whether the settlement of 1866 was real or pretensive. The circuit decree was as follows:

To the complaint in this action the defendants demur upon the grounds of improper joinder of parties and improper joinder of actions. The controversy relates to the estate of John Smith, deceased, in which all the defendants claim an interest, and the complaint seeks, together with other things, to impeach an alleged settlement of the estate, to which all of the defendants were parties. The code, in providing who shall be parties, declares in section 141, "Any person may be made a defendant who has or claims an interest in the controversy adverse to the plaintiff, or who is a necessary party to a complete determination or settlement of the questions involved therein." The defendants therefore, all legatees under the will of John Smith, are properly before the Court, and being before the Court, all questions between the parties arising out of the main subject of controversy are properly cognizable in the same action as, for instance, where an executor is also appointed by the will a trustee, whether he accepted the trust, and if so whether he has discharged any part of his liabilities as executor, by receiving or applying any of the funds of the estate as trustee, or whether he should be prevented from receiving any part of such funds as trustee, &c.

Besides, the defendants have answered the whole complaint. The defendants can demur to the whole complaint or answer the whole complaint, or demur to part and answer part, but not answer and demur to the whole complaint or answer and demur to the same parts of the complaint. The demurrer therefore is overruled.

*291

*It appears that John Smith died in March, 1861, leaving his last will and testament in full force and effect, and leaving his widow Mary and seven children surviving him. His will provided that his whole estate should be sold, and the proceeds divided into eight equal parts, one of which he gave to the widow, and one to each of his several children, all the legatees except Charles and Basil, and his only daughter, the plaintiff in this action, to account for certain advancements made to them by the testator in his lifetime; and the defendants W. T. Smith and John R. Smith were appointed executors upon condition of giving bond and lawful security for the faithful performance of their duties. Of the share of Lucy, the will gives to W. T. Smith $30,000 in trust for Lucy during her natural life, and at her death over to her issue.

The executors named in the will executed the required bond, qualified as executors, and entered upon the administration of the estate. According to the directions of the will they proceeded to sell the real and personal property of the estate, and sold during the year 1861, and the year 1864, the whole estate, except the stocks and notes held by the testator at his death. All the lands and negroes, except some town lots at Laurens and Abbeville, were sold in the year 1861, on a credit of one and two years, as the will directed. The lands and negroes then sold were purchased by members of the family, except the Kinman lands, which were purchased by Waddy T. Irby, who, in the life time of testator and after the execution of the will, had intermarried with the plaintiff Lucy, and who subsequently fell in battle during the late war.

The purchasers, including Waddy T. Irby, executed notes to the executors for the purchase money. Lucy herself made no purchases. The executors proceeded to collect funds due the estate upon personal notes and from dividends upon stock, and to pay out upon liabilities and advance to distributees, until during the year 1863, they found themselves in possession of a large amount of Confederate currency. There is no allegation or proof that any part of this money *was improperly received. The executors allege that of this money W. T. Smith invested $13,400 in Confederate bonds as trustee for Lucy, and produce bonds in Court with the words "Bonded for Lucy Irby, February 20th, 1863," indorsed upon each bond. During the year large amounts were advanced to the other legatees in Confederate currency.

The aggregate of these advancements, added to the amount alleged to have been invested for Lucy, make a larger sum than the executors had in their hands in the year 1863, according to their returns to the Ordinary. It is argued, therefore, by plaintiff's attorney, that the investment for Lucy could not have been made as alleged. While an investment of their own funds in Confederate bonds for Lucy's benefit might not, under the circumstances be sustained, yet payments to legatees who were sui juris at their request or with their consent, was certainly legitimate, although made with the private funds of the executors, and if advances were kept within the amount of the respective shares of the legatees, the executors would be entitled to be credited therefor. The executors had in their hands during the year 1863, funds of the estate to an amount largely in excess of the sum alleged to have been invested for Lucy's benefit. They are entitled to the presumption that they invested these funds of the estate for Lucy, until the contrary appears, and a breach of trust will not be presumed where fidelity is consistent with the facts that appear. I therefore find, as matter of fact that the funds invested that year for Lucy, were funds of the estate of John Smith.

In January, 1864, at the request of some of the legatees, the remaining unsold real property of the estate, consisting of town lots at Laurens and Abbeville, was sold. The purchaser of the Abbeville town lots paid his bid in Confederate bonds. $14,900 of these bonds were appropriated by W. T. Smith, as he testified, for the trust estate of Lucy, and the bonds were produced in Court, indorsed as the other bonds previously referred to. W. T. Smith also produces two receipts which were signed by his cestui que trust Lucy.

*For the purposes of this decree it will be necessary to copy one only, to wit: "Received of W. T. Smith, my trustee, 115.72, it being a portion of interest due on trust funds in my hands, with commissions added. Feb. 18, 1864. Lucy Irby."

In August, 1866, by agreement all the legatees met and made a settlement of the estate among themselves, which settlement was subsequently affirmed by all of the parties before the Ordinary and made of record. It is alleged in the complaint that this was sham and not intended to be binding upon the parties, and as to this point much testimony has been submitted. I am satisfied from the testimony that this settlement was intended to be final and conclusive as to all the matters embraced in it. The whole estate, except the stocks, had been sold, and most of it purchased by several of the legatees. Many of the notes held by the testator in his life time were produced at this settlement, and the liabilities of each legatee on account of advances made by the testator in his lifetime, and by the executors afterwards, and an account of the purchases at the sale of the estate were ascertained. The executors still held the stocks and a number of the notes. The stocks were then divided according to their full value, by agreement; each legatee receiving in stocks such an amount which, added to what each had previously received, made all equal.

As previously stated, W. T. Irby, then the husband of Lucy, had, at the sale in 1861, bid off the Kinman land, and had, for the amount of this bid and for some other property of the estate bought by him, executed his note to the executors, with his mother as surety. Waddy Irby had died during the war, and by an arrangement between his mother and the executors, his note was cancelled and given up and the land given up to the executors. At the settlement above referred to this land was assigned to C. L. Smith, one of the legatees.

liability of the estate. The testator in his lifetime had signed a note as surety to one Dullas, a resident of Philadelphia, upon which action was about to be brought and the chief burden of the payment of which would probably fall upon the estate of testator, and upon which judgment was subsequently recovered for about $125,000. The settlement above referred to was hastened and had, with the understanding among the legatees, and for the avowed purpose of throwing difficulties in the way of the collection of the liability, that a compromise of it might be more easily effected.

At the time of said settlement, a number of personal notes were left in the hands of executors, the proceeds of which were to be applied to the Dullas claim, and to the other liabilities of the estate, and the balance if any, to be divided among the legatees. The Dullas claim has been compromised for a comparatively small sum and extinguished by the executors. For the notes left in the hands of the executors they have not accounted.

At what is called the settlement, $1,700 face value in Ga. R. R. stock was added to the $28,300 previously invested for Lucy, making the $30,000 full value, provided by the will as a trust fund for the benefit of Lucy. Lucy was also charged with the amount of the purchases of her husband, W. T. Irby, at the sale, except the Kinman land, and charged also with advances made to her by the testator in his life time, and after the execution of the will. The defendants' attorneys allege that these charges were made with the consent of Lucy, and I find as matter of fact that she did consent.

The foregoing statement I find to be the facts in this case.

The first question of law arising on the facts, relates to the investment in Confederate States bonds by W. T. Smith for Lucy. W. T. Smith was appointed by the will trustee for Lucy, and one of the executors. He qualified as executor and there is no question that he accepted the office of trustee. It is not alleged or proved that the Confederate States currency came to his hands improperly, for there is nothing to show that existing, and secure investments were called in, but, on the contrary, it is to be collected from the evidence in the case that these funds were realized from personal notes due the testator, and sale notes past due, which it was the duty of executors to collect, and for which they would have been responsible if lost through their negligence; and if it was their duty to collect these demands, it is a historical fact that the only currency in which they could be paid was Confederate States currency.

It has been repeatedly held by the Supreme Court of this State, that it is not a breach of trust for a fiduciary to invest Confederate States currency that he has received in Confederate States bonds. (West v. Cauthen, 9 S. C. 45.) If such investment is not in itself a breach of trust, does the fact that it was made for Lucy at the time it was made it so? This question must be considered from the point of view of the trustees at the time, and in connection with the circumstances existing at the time. How much wiser we often are after the event. Several of the legatees had bought largely at the sales and given their notes. They naturally expected these purchases to be set off against their distributive shares of the estate. Large sums in Confederate States currency were being paid by the executors to the distributees at their request, which, of course, would be set off also. Lucy had bought nothing, therefore had received no Confederate States currency. The will required that $30,000 be invested for her, and this was the only investment they were required by the will to make. (Story's Eq. § 90, cited in Lay v. Lay, 10 S. C. 215.)

The Confederate currency was as good as any assets they had, for all the notes they had could have been paid in that currency. They were executing the will. The circumstances of the estate justified the appropriation of that amount to that object, and the cestui que trust subsequently received part of the interest on the investment. It will be observed that there was no change of investment by the trustee, but when in funds as executors of an estate out of which a trust fund was to be raised, he invested funds of *the estate for the benefit of the trust estate, and thereby and then changed his relations to the funds so invested, ceasing as to that investment his functions as executor and becoming trustee. And the cestui que trust being sui juris, having acquiesced in the investment by receiving interest, and by lapse of time, can no more charge him with the loss of the investment on the ground that the investment was made before the settlement of the estate, than other distributees could charge him for advances made to them in Confederate States currency, before the final settlement of the estate.

I therefore find as a matter of law that W. T. Smith is not responsible for the loss of the funds invested in Confederate States bonds for the trust estate of the plaintiff Lucy. (See West v. Cauthen, supra.)

I have already found as matter of fact that the settlement of 1866 was intended by the parties to be final and conclusive as to all the matters covered by it. It follows that it is binding upon the plaintiff, unless it can be impeached for fraud. It is competent also to show a mistake in the calculation. The allegation that the settlement was sham, and that the plaintiff Lucy was imposed upon by false representations to that effect, is not sustained by the proof. The plaintiff herself acted under it and disposed of a part of the property assigned to her then, as if she knew that her title to it was absolute. It will be remembered that the shares of the distributees were then made equal, or nearly so, by adding to what each legatee had received such an amount in stocks as would produce that result. Except the assignment of the Kinman land, under the circumstances previously stated, to C. L. Smith, only stocks were divided at that settlement. And these were estimated at their face value because, as was testified by several of the parties at the hearing, they were utterly ignorant at the time of their value.

So none of the parties were in a condition to withhold any knowledge or practice any concealment in regard to these securities, or knowingly exercise any influence hurtful to others or advantageous to themselves. (Hill Trust, 161 *et seq.) They all stood upon the same plane, one with as much knowledge as another. There was, therefore, no room or ground for the inference of fraud from the relations of the parties. If the division subsequently turned out more disastrously for some than for others, it was a misfortune, and does not affect the character of the transaction. That must be determined by the circumstances and facts that attend the transaction itself. When Lucy agreed to the settlement, it may be observed that she was dealing not only with the executors as such, but with all the parties in interest, and it certainly was competent for her to bind herself to all the settlement embraced in the absence of fraud, and no fraud is shown.

Although the settlement was spoken of and called a final settlement, in point of fact it was not so, for a large number of notes, assets of the estate, were left in the hands of the executors to be administered. The statute of limitations does not begin to run in favor of executors from each transaction, although that transaction may be considered as final to all matters embraced in it, but only from a settlement or accounting embracing all matters relating to the trust. This settlement, by the admission of all parties, contemplated a future and further accounting by the executors, which has not been had, and the statute, therefore, has not yet begun to run in favor of these executors. The settlement, then, is yet open for the correction of error of calculation.

It is therefore ordered and adjudged that neither the executors nor W. T. Smith are liable for losses on account of the investment of Confederate States currency in Confederate States bonds, for the benefit of the plaintiff, Lucy Dickerson. That the settlement in 1866 between all the parties was a valid and binding settlement, and only open for errors of calculation. That the executors do account for the remainder of the estate of John Smith, unaccounted for, before the Master of Laurens County. That the parties have leave to apply at the foot of this decree for such orders as may be necessary to complete the settlement of the estate.

*298

Mr. Justice HUDSON. On the first day of January, A. D. 1856, John Smith, late of the County of Laurens, State of South Carolina, duly executed his last will and testament, wherein he bequeathed to his wife, Mary, in lieu of dower, the one-eighth part of the proceeds of his estate (which was directed to be sold by his executors on a credit of one and two years), and to each of his seven children the one-eighth part of the proceeds of the estate when sold as directed. All the children were required by the testator to account for certain specific sums of money advanced to them previously by him, except Basil H. Smith and Lucy W. Smith, who are excused by the testator from accounting for any advancements previously made to them by him. In the copy of the will contained in the brief the testator is silent as to his son, Charles L. Smith, whose name is not mentioned, nor is any disposition made of the one-eighth which was evidently intended for him—clearly a casus omissus.

Of the share of Lucy the testator thus disposes: "The remaining one-eighth part of my estate, it is my will be disposed of as follows, to wit: I give to my son, Wm. T. Smith, thirty thousand dollars thereof to be held by him as trustee for the sole and separate use of my daughter, Lucy W. Smith, during her natural life, neither the principal sum nor the income thereof to be subject to the debts or contracts of any husband she may hereafter have, and after her death the same to go to such children as she may have, if any, discharged of all trusts. But should my said daughter die leaving no issue surviving her then the said funds to be distributed among her next of kin *as in cases of intestacy. The remaining portion of said one-eighth part of my estate I give to my said daughter, Lucy W. Smith, absolutely, she not to account for advancements heretofore made by me."

Wm. T. Smith and John R. Smith were nominated as executors of the will, and were required by the testator to give well secured bonds for the faithful discharge of their duties.

In March, A. D. 1861, the testator died, leaving this will of full force, and leaving an estate estimated to be worth five hundred thousand ($500,000.00) dollars. He left surviving him his widow, Mary Smith, and seven children, Wm. T., John R., Joel F., and James, children of his first wife; and Lucy W., Basil H. and Charles L., children by his surviving widow. The executors nominated in the will had the same duly admitted to probate, and took upon themselves the administration, by qualifying and giving bond, as required by the testator.

In 1861 they made several sales of property, real and personal, one on April 11, one on April 16, one on November 19; and again in January, 1864, two separate sales, mostly of real estate in the towns of Laurens and Abbeville. At these sales the four elder brothers, sons of the first marriage, purchased largely of land, negroes, and other personalty; the widow bought a part of the realty, but Basil H. and Charles L., who were minors, and Lucy W., who had been married to Waddy T. Irby, purchased nothing. W. T. Irby, her husband, however, did buy freely of the personalty, and also purchased the Kinman tract of land for $17,000, for all of which he gave his notes to the executors. The result of all the sales was that the bulk of the real and personal estate sold was bought by the executors and their two full brothers, Joel F. Smith, and James Smith, the widow getting but a small part, and her three children nothing by purchase. Besides the land and negroes, the estate consisted of various choses-in-action, and a large amount of stock of railway companies and banks.

The war closed before there was any settlement of the estate, and indeed it was not in a condition to be settled. All the property had not been sold, the choses-in-action remained *uncollected, and the debts of the estate were not all paid. Such was the condition of things when in 1866 it became known to the executors that one Mr. Dullas of Philadelphia held a bond against Augustus M. Smith of Abbeville for the purchase money of negro slaves for about one hundred thousand ($100,000) dollars, upon which John Smith, the testator, was a surety. This information was communicated to the family, and very naturally created uneasiness and alarm. The condition of the estate of the principal debtor, and the circumstances of the co-sureties were such as to excite a fear that the burden of this claim, if enforced, would fall heavily upon the estate of John Smith, and probably prove disastrous.

The validity of such debts was at that time seriously questioned, and compromises were being very generally made in consequence of their doubtful character. Eminent lawyers were consulted by the executors as to the best course to be pursued. All united in counseling the executors to hasten the settlement of the estate, with a view of enabling them to obtain of Mr. Dullas as liberal terms in settling this debt as possible. Impressed with this view of expediency and policy, they hastened to take the necessary steps to carry it into effect. Although the estate was in no condition to be partitioned and settled, yet family meetings and consultations were speedily had, at which the executors advocated the urgent necessity of dividing the estate, because of the danger impending from the large claim of Dullas.

Accordingly, the legatees held their first meeting at the house of W. T. Smith for the purpose of carrying out this scheme of a settlement, but Lucy W., who was then a young widow, her husband having been killed in battle, not being present, the meeting was adjourned to be held at a future day at the residence of the testator's widow, and Lucy was sent for. Pursuant to adjournment all parties met at Mrs. Mary Smith's on August 21st, 1866, and after a full explanation by the executors of the nature of the crisis, a family settlement and partition of the estate was effected, and receipts for their respective shares were passed by the parties to the executors. A notice was then published in a newspaper of the county to the effect that the executors would, by permission of the Ordinary, settle the estate of the testator before that officer on September 25th then next ensuing, and calling upon creditors to present their demands on or before that day.

On the day appointed all parties in interest met at the office of the Ordinary for the County of Laurens, and there, with slight and unimportant alteration, had the partition and settlement of the previous meeting confirmed by a decree of that officer, and new receipts passed. This was accomplished on September 27th, that being the day on which the adjustment of the accounts, begun on the 25th, was brought to a close, but by some discrepancy which the Ordinary himself cannot explain, his decree bore date November 2d, 1867.

In order to give the settlement thus effected the appearance at least of being full and final, the legatees signed and delivered to the executors a paper purporting to be a transfer and assignment to the said executors of a large number of uncollected choses-in-action belonging to the estate, but which were not embraced in the division and settlement. In this transfer to the executors they pretend to make the said executors their agents to collect these assets, and with the proceeds to pay the debts outstanding against the estate, and to divide the surplus among the legatees.

In the discharge of this duty, they proceeded to institute suit upon some of these choses-in-action, and to collect others without suit, and, in so doing, they styled themselves executors, and suits were instituted against them as such—notably the suit of Mr. Dullas, in which he recovered judgment against them as executors for the sum of one hundred and twenty-five thousand ($125,- 000.00) dollars. In the year 1870, they compromised this judgment debt by paying as the share of John Smith's liability thereon, the sum of five thousand dollars, a like sum being paid by each of the other obligors.

This large and only debt having been paid, the plaintiff, Lucy W., (who had removed to Georgia and intermarried with F. A. Dickerson), applied to the executors to have a final and bona fide settlement, alleging that the only obstacles to a settlement, to wit: the Dullas debt, had been removed by the *compromise effected. Failing to induce the executors to consent to a settlement, she, her husband, and her children, in March, 1872, began this suit, the object of which is to compel the executors to account, to have the true amount of her one-eighth part of the estate ascertained and paid over to her, and the trust portion thereof delivered into the hands of a trustee other than W. F. Smith. In her complaint she alludes to the settlement of August 21, 1866, at Mrs. Mary Smith's, which was afterwards confirmed in the office of the Ordinary, Sept. 27, 1866, as one made at the instance of the executors, and elder legatees only as a temporary expedient to enable them to deal more advantageously with Mr. Dullas, whose claim was frightfully large. Plaintiffs charge that the said settlement was therefore merely pretensive, and so understood by all; that it is fraught with gross errors, that the accounts and partitions were stated and arranged by the executors and elder brothers without any explanation to herself and younger brothers, with the express understanding and promise that a final and correct settlement should be made so soon as the Dullas debt could be arranged. Under such representations and promises, she signed the receipt without understanding or deeming it necessary to understand the statement of the accounts and partitions, the result of which is, that she has received of her fictitious share the merest pittance.

The executors and their co-defendants demur to the complaint for multifariousness, in that several causes of action are joined improperly, and because, as to some causes of actions, the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute such.

The defendants answer to so much of the complaint as demands an accounting, and interpose as a bar thereto the settlement of Sept. 27, 1866, under the decree of the Ordinary, which they allege was well understood, was full, fair, correct and bona fide, made and intended as a finality; that the executors were thereby discharged from further liability by the Ordinary, and the plaintiffs are consequently estopped by the decree in the suit to which Mrs. Dickerson was a party. They also interpose the plea of the statute of limitations as a bar to the action. In behalf of W. T. Smith, as trustee of Lucy

*W. Dickerson, the special defense is set up, that during the war he invested of her trust estate twenty-eight thousand three hundred ($28,300.00) dollars, in Confederate States bonds, and seventeen hundred dollars in Georgia Railroad and Banking Co. stock.

In 1881, at the February Term of the Court of Common Pleas for the County of Laurens, this cause was heard by Judge W. H. Wallace. A great deal of testimony, oral and written, was submitted, and the brief brought up to this court is necessarily voluminous, because the questions upon which the issues turn are really more of fact than of law. The presiding Judge overruled the demurrers to the complaint, as we think very properly, because there is no misjoinder of causes of action in violation of the provisions of the statute, nor can it be correctly alleged that, as to any branch of the case, there is a failure to state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action.

Proceeding then to determine the cause upon the issues raised by the complaint and answer, the presiding Judge finds as matters of fact: 1st. That W. T. Smith, as trustee for Lucy W. Dickerson, did, in the years 1863 and 1864, invest of the funds of the estate of John Smith twenty-eight thousand and three hundred ($28,300.00) dollars in bonds of the Confederate States, and seventeen hundred ($1,700) dollars, in stock of the Ga. R. R. and Banking Co. 2. That the settlement of Sept. 27, 1866, confirmed by a decree of the Ordinary was intended to be final and conclusive as to all matters embraced in it. 3. That it was, however, only a partial settlement, and left undivided a large number of choses in action of the estate in the hands of the executors, to be collected and applied to the payment of the Dullas claim, and other liabilities of the estate. Wherefore the fiduciary relation of the executors to the legatees and creditors was not terminated by this settlement, which he finds "was hastened, and had with the understanding among the legatees, and with the avowed purpose of throwing difficulties in the way of the collection of the liabilities (the Dullas debt), that a compromise of it might be more easily effected." 4. That at the said settlement Lucy W.

*was charged with the purchases made by her husband, W. T. Irby, at the sale, except the Kinman land; and also with all advancements made to her by her father in his lifetime: but that this was done with her consent. As matters of law he concludes, First, That the investments made by W. T. Smith in Confederate Bonds were properly made. Second, That when made, there was nothing in the course of the administration to prevent W. T. Smith from receiving this fund from the executors for his cestui que trust, and that the said Smith, as trustee, is not chargeable with the loss of the investment.

Third, That the settlement of Sept. 27, 1866, being intended to be final pro tanto, cannot be impeached except for fraud, but may be corrected for errors in calculation. That the attempt to impeach it for fraud having failed, it must stand, except as to errors in calculation. Fourth, That the settlement, however, was not of such a character as to give currency to the statute of limitations pleaded by the executors as a bar to an accounting, because it was not an act showing an intention on their part to divest themselves of the trust which their office imposed. A large part of the estate still remained in their hands, for which they have not accounted, but for which they are liable to account. Judgment is accordingly entered against the executors for this further accounting alone, and the investments by W. T. Smith are sustained.

From this judgment both plaintiffs and defendants have appealed to this court, the defendants from the decree of the Judge on the question of the bar of the statute of limitations, and the plaintiffs from so much of the decree as determines questions of law and of fact against them.

It is with hesitation and reluctance that this court will reverse findings of fact by the court below. The Circuit Judge possesses a fairer opportunity to weigh testimony, especially that taken in open court, than is or can be enjoyed by this court. The testimony, however, in this case comes to us so fully reported, and is of such a character as to enable us to weigh it satisfactorily. The case has been fully and ably argued on both sides on the questions of fact as well as of law *and we have carefully reviewed and considered the whole case as presented, feeling a lively sense of the interesting nature of the questions involved, and the grave consequences of the issues to the parties litigant.

We concur with the Circuit Judge in holding that the statute of limitations is not a bar to this action. We do not perceive in the proceedings in the Ordinary's office, Sept. 27, 1866, as explained by the testimony of the witnesses, and by the subsequent conduct of the executors, an intention on their part to divest themselves of their trust. It was at most only a partial settlement and partition of the estate, and left in the hands of the executors a large amount of assets for future administration. The whole record of the proceedings, when examined, reveals this fact, and the testimony of witnesses confirms it. Neither the language of the decree (if it can be properly so called) of the Ordinary, nor the terms of the written instrument in which the legatees feign to re-transfer to the executors the uncollected assets, but which forms no part of that record, can prevail over the real facts of the case, so as to give currency to the statute of limitations as if it were a final laying aside of their trust by the executors. It in fact was not such an act, was not intended to be such an act, nor could it have been such in the condition in which the estate then was, and necessarily the trust must have for a season continued.

It is only when a fiduciary really lays aside his trust, or does some act manifesting clearly his intention to do so, that the statute begins to run against the trustee of an express trust. "It commences to run when it appears that the administrator has done some act brought to the notice of the parties affected by it, equivalent to an abandonment of such office, although such act may be in itself wrongful." Such is the language of the court in Renwick v. Smith, 11 S. C. 305, and this is in harmony with Miller v. Alexander, 1 Hill Eq. 25, Long v. Cason, 4 Rich. Eq. 60, Sollee v. Croft, 7 Rich. Eq. 34. Beyond this wholesome rule we are not prepared to so extend the rule as to apply the statute to acts of intermediate administration. If each separate act of an executor constituted an event in his office from which the statute, as to that special transaction would take currency, manifold would be the risks and hazards encountered by distributees, legatees and cestui que trusts generally. This plea of the defendants must fail, and the liability of the executors to account for their entire administration is unaffected by it.

We cannot concur, however, with the circuit judge in the view he has taken of the settlement of September 27, 1866. The testimony upon this issue is very conflicting and irreconcilable. Mrs. Dickerson, her husband, W. F. A. Dickerson, and her brother Basil H. Smith most positively state—especially the sister and brother—that it was not designed to be correct or binding; that it was merely pretensive and a sham, intended only as an expedient to enable the executors to obtain liberal terms of Dullas. They say that the scheme originated with the executors under legal advice, and was by them and their full brothers advocated and urged upon the younger children by the second wife, to whom they represented that a future second settlement would be had so soon as the Dullas debt could be arranged; and that all matters would then be fairly and equally adjusted, without regard to the then temporary statement of the accounts. Though advised against signing any papers by her counsel, Mrs. Dickerson says that she, relying upon the solemn assurances of the executors and their brothers, that it would not bind her, yielded to their importunities, and without examination into the correctness of the statement of the accounts, believing that she would be fairly dealt with, signed the receipts. Her brother, Basil H., corroborates her fully; but the executors and their full brothers, and also Charles L. Smith strongly deny their version of the case, and asseverate that the settlement was bona fide and binding, and so intended. We must therefore look to the record and the surrounding facts and circumstances to ascertain, if possible, which of this array of opposing and highly respectable witnesses are most strongly corroborated.

In the first place, the entire estate real and personal at that time (except perhaps some unsold fragment) had been, under direction of the testator, converted into choses-in-action; and the stocks of banks and railway companies left by testator composed, with these choses-in-action, the whole estate or assets in the hands of the executors. We cannot think that these intelligent executors would so stultify themselves, nor that learned counsel would advise them to do so imprudent an act, as to eagerly parcel and partition out to the legatees the only means possessed by them to pay debts, to wit, personal assets, which the legatees in turn could easily place beyond the reach of creditors, and thus greatly accelerate the ruin of the executors. Such a proposition bears incredibility on its face; whilst it is consistent with the prevailing conduct of people in that day and time, when debts for slaves were rarely paid except by compromise, that these executors should have urged upon their co-legatees just some such a fictitious settlement as Mrs. Dickerson says this was intended to be; and furthermore that it should have been made of record in court, with a view to impress a creditor with an enlarged idea of the difficulties lying in his way of collection, and thus to induce him to compromise. We are now dealing solely with the fact; of the morals of the act we will speak hereafter.

Again, we are loth to believe that these brothers and trustees would wilfully and deliberately so settle with an only sister, then a widow with two infants, as to deprive her of her whole patrimony; and that to effect so great a wrong, they would commit so gross an error as to charge her with her husband's purchases, and with those advancements which her father declared in his will she should not account for. Were the trustee who would do such a thing a stranger in blood to his cestui que trust, it would not be tolerated in a court of justice; but when the trustees, as in this case, are brothers of age and experience, and the cestui que trust is an only sister, just past her majority, and the widowed mother of two infants, charity to our fellowmen constrains us to think that such a settlement was not designed to be permanent and binding, but only pretensive and temporary. That the partial division of September 27, 1866, was intended merely as a stroke of policy, and to be temporary and subsequently corrected after the debt of Dullas was arranged, can be reconciled to an in-

of an estate from a security debt. It is palliated by views of supposed business shrewdness and tact. But that a settlement so ruinous to a weak and helpless sister was designed by her trustees, who are her brothers, to be binding, is almost incredible.

When we come to consider the crisis of the estate, the material of which it was composed, the motive for the appearance, but not reality of a settlement; the time, place, and circumstances under which it was made; the haste that attended it, the form in which the accounts are stated and the papers drawn; the gross error and wrong apparent in ascertaining the share of Lucy W., and the subsequent course of conduct of all the parties, we are constrained to the conclusion that, at the time the parties did not intend that this partial distribution and settlement should be binding; and that their real intention was to use the exhibit or record of it as an expedient to accelerate the settlement of a heavy debt.

This, however, say the counsel for defendants, stamps the transaction with immorality, and fraud towards creditors, and that Lucy W., who knew of the motive, is particeps criminis, and is now estopped on that ground from disturbing the partition. We do not regard her as in pari delicto. She was not a trustee for creditors, had no duty to perform towards them as did the executors. They are the custodians of the estate, and trustees both for creditors and legatees. She did not stand on the same plane with her trustees. The scheme was of their own conception, and into it she was by them urged as the only means to save herself and others from ruin. That faith, confidence and trust which they inspired in her, they cannot now be allowed to reward by pleading this settlement in bar of a fair, full and correct accounting.

Such being our view of the facts touching the partial distribution of September 27, 1866, we are brought to an examination of its correctness and fairness, so far as the plaintiff Lucy W. is concerned. It is very evident that it cannot stand the test of scrutiny, and in the interest of the remaindermen, her children, as well as of herself, must be reopened. She is charged with over forty-one thousand ($41,000) dollars of notes and accounts of her former husband, for which she is not liable, but we are told by witnesses that this amount really includes advancements with interest made by the testator, and for which she was not to account, which amounted to over thirteen thousand ($13,000) dollars; and this testimony is verified by a statement which appears to have been made first in the figures before the Ordinary. Whether she consented to this or not, does not affect the case provided the accounts were made up, as we have concluded, with the understanding that in a subsequent accounting all errors should be corrected, and a fair distribution made; and this we think equity and good conscience require to be done. But Mrs. Dickerson states that she was not informed as to how the account against her was made up, but left the whole matter to the executors, confiding in their assurances that the statement should not be binding. In this she is powerfully corroborated by the testimony and facts and circumstances above noted.

It remains only to consider the defence of Wm. T. Smith to Lucy W.'s claim to an account of the trust fund alleged to be in his hands. He says that he invested twenty-eight thousand and three hundred dollars ($28,300) of this in Confederate States bonds, about $13,400 in July, 1863, and $14,900 in January, 1864, and seventeen hundred ($1700) dollars in Ga. R. R. & Banking Co. stock; and the circuit Judge has found the fact so to be, and has sanctioned the investment. Could we agree with the circuit Judge in his finding of fact, we would hesitate to sanction the investment in Confederate bonds ($14,900) made in January, 1864.

On January 4, 1864, the executors sold for cash in Confederate currency, real estate in the town of Laurens, to the amount of twenty-eight thousand and four hundred dollars ($28,400.00) all of which, except to the amount of four thousand and three hundred dollars ($4300) was purchased by themselves. On the 11th day of the same month they sold real estate in the town of Abbeville for the sum of fourteen thousand and six hundred ($14,600) dollars cash in Confederate currency. This was in direct violation of the direction of the testator, who enjoined upon them to sell on a credit of one and two years, the *purchase money to be secured by bond with ample security. To make such sales, at such a time and for cash in a currency vastly depreciated and rapidly becoming worthless, was in violation of the letter of this authority, and against every dictate of prudence. The case appears still more unfavorable to them in becoming the purchasers at their own rash sale at Laurens, and selling to their full brother Joel F. Smith the property at Abbeville, and then claiming to set apart to the trust estate of their only sister, a widow with children, fourteen thousand and nine hundred dollars ($14,900) of this almost worthless paper at par value. This Court has gone as far as equity and justice will countenance in sustaining investments in Confederate funds by fiduciaries, but we are not aware of any case that goes to the extent of sustaining a transaction similar to this.

But we are constrained to reverse the Court below in finding as a fact that W. T. Smith as trustee made any investment of trust funds in Confederate bonds. That he and his co-executor may have intended to set apart Confederate bonds for this trust estate, and that the matter was talked of is perhaps true; but that this was ever done in a legal manner and in due form, we have not been able to discover satisfactory proof from the evidence in the brief. In fact, that evidence upon which most reliance is to be placed, satisfies us that the trustee is mistaken in saying that he made the investment. If it be true, as he says, that he regarded the settlement of Aug. 21, 1866, confirmed by the judgment of Sept. 27, 1866, as bona fide and correct, and final and binding as to all matters embraced in it, then truly was it a matter of vital importance that his double duty as executor and as trustee of Lucy should have been rigidly and faithfully discharged on so serious an occasion. If he had invested in good faith the trust estate almost entirely in these bonds, then was the time to have made the fact clearly known and plainly to appear. If he on the contrary held no such investment in hand, then his plain and sacred duty was to have stepped forward and protected her interest and not to have permitted that which had no value to have been set down to the account of her trust estate, as we will see was done.

Take either horn of the dilemma, and it will be seen that he utterly failed to discharge his duty both to himself and to her. Her share, trust and absolute, of the estate was made up in that family settlement as follows, viz.:

Lucy W. Irby, notes and accounts of
W. T. Irby, .....	$41,012.94
417 Shares Commercial Bank, at
$25 per share, .....	10,425.00
6 Shares S. W. R. R. Bank, at $125
per share, .....	750.00
101 Shares G. & C. R. R. Stock, at
$20 per share, .....	2,020.00
4 Shares Newberry Bank, at $25
per share, .....	100.00
August 21, 1866, .....	$54,307.94

Below this statement appears her receipt for all the above except thirty thousand dollars, to wit,—$24,307.94, showing that the balance of the aforesaid assets must be looked to out of which to find her trust estate. As was said above, the confirmation in the Ordinary's office changed the amount but slightly, but the above is the first and only detailed statement of the mode in which Lucy's share of the estate is ascertained. It is silent on the subject of Confederate bonds. They are entirely ignored, and the above assets are made to foot up her entire one-eighth of the estate. It is furthermore a noteworthy fact, although it appears in testimony that the Kinman land was taken from her, and allotted to Charles L., yet she stands charged here with so large an amount of notes and accounts of her husband, W. T. Irby, that she is either charged with the note for that land, or else Irby must have bought enormously of the personal property. It is further to be noted that in neither the settlement at Mrs. Mary Smith's, nor at the office of the Ordinary, nor at any other period of the administration, do we find, or hear, of any receipt given by W. T. Smith as trustee to the executors for this trust estate of Lucy, nor any part thereof, whilst receipts are given by every other legatee.

From a review of all the evidence we are forced to the conclusion that Wm. T. Smith, as trustee, not only did not invest funds in Confederate bonds as claimed, but that the executors have not as yet turned over and delivered to him any part of the said trust estate except the seventeen hundred dollars in Ga. R. R. shares; and to the trustee of Lucy W. these executors are still liable to account.

*In reaching this conclusion we are influenced also by the fact that at the time the first investment in Confederate bonds is claimed to have been made, to wit, in 1863, the accounts of the executors do not show in their hands funds sufficient to make the investment, and we also give due weight to the fact that at no period when these investments are claimed to have been made was the estate in a condition to enable the executors to consent to this legacy to Lucy, or to pay over to her trustee the trust portion thereof; and so they seem to have thought, as is evidenced by the fact that no receipt has been passed nor settlement made betwixt these executors and Lucy's trustee; and W. T. Smith as trustee seems to have acted prudently in not giving a receipt.

We must not be understood, in what we have said regarding the sales of the lots in the towns of Laurens and Abbeville, as declaring those sales illegal and void, as that question is not before us; but we only intend to say that if the fact were that so late as 1864, the executors converted real estate into Confederate bonds as an investment for a trust estate, we would not readily sustain such conduct; but we have concluded that the investment was not in fact made by Lucy's trustee.

Wherefore it is the judgment of this Court that, in the interest of, and on behalf of the legatee Lucy W. Dickerson, and of her children as remaindermen, the respondents, John R. Smith and Wm. T. Smith, as executors of the last will and testament of John Smith, deceased, do account for the one-eighth part of the estate of said testator which came into their hands, or which should have come into their hands, in which said accounting reference must be had to the real facts and circumstances attending said administration and surrounding said estate, so that substantial justice may be done consistent with the principles herein announced, due effect being given only to the bona-fide dealings heretofore had betwixt said executors and legatee.

It is further adjudged that in view of the attitude of Wm. T. Smith towards the said Lucy and her children as revealed in the progress of this litigation, some other fit and suitable person, upon the application of Lucy, be appointed by *the Court below to take charge of the said trust estate. Also should the one-eighth part of the estate of John Smith, when ascertained, be but thirty thousand dollars or less, then the whole must be regarded as trust property, and delivered to the trustee to be appointed by the Court below, she to receive only the excess of thirty thousand dollars, if such there should be, as her absolute estate.

It is further adjudged that the decree of the Circuit Judge be reversed in all respects wherein it is at variance with the judgment of this Court, and the principles herein announced; and lastly that the cause be remanded to the Circuit Court for the county of Laurens, for the purpose of carrying into effect this judgment in accordance with the facts as found, and the principles of law herein laid down.

The rights of the mortgagees against a decree in the Court of Probate granting dower on such petition, are not affected by an application subsequently made by them in that Court for leave to become parties and refused upon the ground that the cause had ended, nor by their failure to appeal from such refusal or from the decree for dower.

Before Wallace, J., Kershaw, June, 1879.

Action by George W. Witte and Armin F. Witte as Witte Bros. against T. H. Clarke, Sallie L. Clarke, T. W. Lang, Harriet M. Lang, L. McCandless, T. L. Boykin and several judgment creditors of T. H. Clarke, commenced March 6th, 1877. By supplemental complaint filed in September, 1877, Mrs. Louisa G. Clarke was made a party defendant. The nature of the action and the facts are fully stated in the opinion of this Court.

The Circuit decree was filed December 2, 1879. Omitting its statement of undisputed facts, it was as follows:

The supplemental complaint raises a question as to the validity of the judgment of the Probate Court adjudging that Louisa Clarke is entitled to dower in Green Hill plantation, and demands that she be required to establish her right to dower in this Court. This is asking in effect that the judgment of the Probate Court be treated as a nullity. This can only be done when it appears that the Court is entirely without jurisdiction of the subject matter in relation to which the judgment is pronounced. Jurisdiction in the allotment of dower is conferred by the constitution on the Probate Court. Errors of law by that Court, in a proceeding within its jurisdiction, can only be corrected by appeal in the manner provided by law. The right of appeal from the Probate Court may be exercised by any one "interested in any final order, sentence or decree," of that Court. Any person desiring to exercise his right to have revised a proceeding in the Probate Court by the Circuit Court, must pursue the remedy established by law. There was no appeal in this case and the judgment is final and conclusive, and is proof of every fact necessary to support it. There is no proof of fraud or of secrecy, nor want of proper parties.

The next question relates to the validity of the assignments by Sallie L. Clarke to Thomas W. Lang and Leslie McCandless. Burwell Boykin died in 1861, leaving his last will and testament, by which, among other things, he bequeathed to his daughter, Sallie L., the sum of four thousand dollars, which was to take effect upon her attaining the age of twenty-one years, or marrying, but which she was not to enjoy until it was secured to her free from the debts, liability, contracts and disposition of any husband she might have.

The manifest intent of the testator was to create a separate estate for the benefit of his daughter that could not be taken by the creditors of her husband, or in any way be alienated by him. This much was expressly provided for. Nothing was said in the will as to the power of Sallie L. to control or dispose of the bequest. At the time the will was executed, a married woman had no power to alienate, dispose of or pledge, for her husband's debts, her separate estate. This rule has been changed by the constitution of this State adopted in 1868. We must suppose that Burwell Boykin, if he intended that his daughter should have power to alienate her separate estate, would have expressly bestowed the power upon her, as without such bestowal under the law as it stood in 1861 she could not do so. The state of the law at the time, taken in connection with the omission by the testator to provide for any control of her separate estate by his daughter, forces the conclusion that he did not intend that she should control it. If she had remained unmarried until she attained the age of twenty-one years, then while sole she would have had the power to dispose of her beneficial interest and thus defeat the trust; but the moment she married, disability intervened.

The power of married women over their property rights is enlarged by the constitution of 1868, and the law enacted in pursuance of it. This trust, however, is unaffected by the change in the civil status of married women. When a contract is made it is presumed to be made with reference to the existing law applicable to its terms, and a subsequent change of the law does not affect the law of that contract in existence at the time it was entered into; so, in analogy to this rule, a trust created must be presumed to have been created with reference to the law as it existed at the time, and a subsequent change of the law leaves the trust unaffected by the change. I conclude, therefore, that the assignments of the mortgage by Mrs. Sallie L. Clarke to Lang and McCandless are void and of no effect. This debt of the separate estate of Sallie L. Clarke does not bear interest, the funds being in the possession of her husband.

Miss Harriett M. Lang, holding a mortgage of both Jumping Gully Creek plantation and Green Hill plantation, must first exhaust the proceeds of the sale of Jumping Gully Creek plantation and for any balance go upon the Green Hill plantation, after prior liens upon Green Hill plantation are extinguished.

It is ordered, adjudged and decreed, that the order enjoining Mrs. Louisa Clarke from proceeding to enforce her judgment of the Probate Court for dower in Green Hill plantation be set aside and vacated. That the assignment by Mrs. Sallie L. Clarke to Thomas W. Lang and Leslie McCandless are null, void and of no effect. That Green Hill plantation be sold and the proceeds of the sale be applied first to the costs and expenses of the proceedings in dower by Mrs. Louisa Clarke in the Probate Court. Next to the payment of the judgment in dower by that Court in favor of Mrs. Louisa Clarke. Next to the payment of four thousand dollars, without interest, to T. L. Boykin for the use of Mrs. Sallie L. Clarke. Next to the payment of the balance, if any, on the debt to Miss Harriet M. Lang, secured by mortgage bearing date 25th March, 1870, *the proceeds of the sale of Jumping Gully Creek plantation being first applied thereto. Next to the mortgage debt of the plaintiffs herein. And next to the debt of Miss Harriet M. Lang, secured by mortgage bearing date 17th March, 1876. That Jumping Gully Creek plantation be sold and the proceeds be applied to the debt to Miss Harriet M. Lang, secured by mortgage bearing date the 25th March, 1870. That T. H. Clarke be barred and foreclosed of all equity of redemption in Jumping Gully Creek plantation and Green Hill plantation. That the parties or any of them have leave to apply at the foot of this decree for orders fixing the time and terms of sales ordered herein.

The exceptions to this decree are given in the opinion.

Messrs. Buist & Buist for plaintiffs.

Messrs. Leitner & Dunlap and W. G. DeSaussure for T. W. Lang.

Mr. J. T. Hay for Miss Lang.

Mr. J. H. Rion for T. L. Boykin and Mrs. S. L. Clarke.

Mr. L. F. Youmans, Attorney-General, for Mrs. Louisa G. Clarke.

April 26th, 1882. The opinion of the Court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McIVER. This action was commenced by the plaintiffs for a foreclosure of a mortgage on certain real estate, known as Green Hill plantation, executed by the defendant T. H. Clarke, and the other defendants, except Mrs. L. G. Clarke, were made parties, as claiming to hold liens by mortgage and judgment on the same real estate. After the action was commenced, and after the filing of the notice of the pendency of the action, the defendant Mrs. L. G. Clarke filed *her petition in the Court of Probate, claiming dower in said plantation as the widow of Dr. H. H. Clarke, who, she alleged, died seized of the same. No persons were made parties to this proceeding except the mortgagor, T. H. Clarke, and his wife, Mrs. S. L. Clarke, who, it is alleged, had been put in possession of Green Hill as mortgagee. They interposed no defence, and the proceeding resulted in a judgment, rendered April 20, 1877, for a large sum of money, assessed in lieu of dower, which, by a decree of the Judge of Probate, was declared to be a prior lien on Green Hill.

The plaintiffs and the defendant Miss H. M. Lang, on discovering the existence of this judgment, gave notice of a motion, on the 22d of August, 1877, to be made to the Judge of Probate, to be made parties to that proceeding, and to set aside said judgment. This motion was refused by the Judge of Probate upon the ground, amongst others, that the proceeding for dower was no longer pending, but had passed into a final judgment. Thereupon the plaintiffs, on the 14th of September, 1877, obtained an order from one of the Circuit Judges, at chambers, for leave to file a supplemental complaint, making Mrs. L. G. Clarke a defendant herein, and enjoining her from further proceeding under her judgment for dower, which order, though resisted, was not appealed from by Mrs. L. G. Clarke. The supplemental complaint was duly filed, in which the plaintiffs—after setting out the facts above stated, and charging that the claim for dower was unfounded; that the proceedings in the Court of Probate were so secretly and privately conducted that the plaintiffs and the other mortgage creditors of T. H. Clarke were not informed thereof until long after the judgment for dower had been rendered; that they were so conducted with a view to prevent the plaintiffs and the other creditors from taking any steps to resist the same and that the judgment for dower, so obtained, is a fraud upon the rights of the creditors of T. H. Clarke—demanded judgment that Mrs. L. G. Clarke be required to establish her claim of dower, if any she has, under this action; that plaintiffs and the other creditors of T. H. Clarke be permitted to contest said claim; that Mrs. L. G. Clarke be perpet*ually enjoined from enforcing the judgment obtained by her in the Court of Probate; and for such other and further relief as may be necessary.

Mrs. L. G. Clarke, answering both the original and supplemental complaint, insist upon her right to bring her action in the Court of Probate for dower; that she was not compelled to make any persons parties thereto, except those who were in possession of the land out of which she claimed dower; that the proceedings were openly and fairly conducted, and denying the allegations to the contrary; that she was entitled to dower in the premises, her deceased husband having died seized thereof, and denying plaintiffs' allegations to the contrary—prayed judgment that the temporary injunction be dissolved and that she might be permitted to enforce her judgment for dower. The defendants T. H. Clarke and T. L. Boykin answered, submitting their rights to the judgment of the Court, and the defendants T. W. Lang, S. L. Clarke, H. M. Lang and L. McCandless also answered, setting up their several claims as mortgagees, which will hereinafter be more particularly stated. The remaining defendants, so far as appears from the "Case" submitted here, do not seem to have answered, and no notice is taken of their claims in any of the proceedings below.

An order was passed directing a referee to take the testimony and report the same to the Court, from whose report it appears that the following claims were presented and offered in evidence, which are stated here in the order of their dates, and for convenient reference numbered consecutively, rather than in the order in which they appear in the report of the Referee, viz.: (No. 1.) A mortgage of T. H. Clarke to T. L. Boykin, executor of Burwell Boykin on Green Hill, dated December 19th, 1869, to secure the payment of four thousand dollars, bequeathed to Mrs. S. L. Clarke by the will of her father, Burwell Boykin. (No. 2.) A mortgage of T. H. Clarke to Miss H. M. Lang on Green Hill and Jumping Gully plantations, dated March 25th, 1870. (No. 3.) A mortgage of T. H. Clarke to the plaintiffs on Green Hill, dated January 9th, 1875. (No. 4.) A mortgage of

T. H. Clarke to Miss H. *M. Lang, on Green Hill dated March 31st, 1875. (No. 5.) A mortgage of T. H. Clarke to Miss H. M. Lang, on Jumping Gully, dated March 17th, 1876. It also appeared in evidence that T. H. Clarke turned over the possession of Green Hill plantation to Mrs. S. L. Clarke, "to be rented by her during the year 1877, to enable her to repay herself out of the rents and profits thereof, for the arrearages of interest due her on the four thousand dollars before mentioned," which, as we have seen, was secured by mortgage No. 1.

The defendants T. W. Lang and L. McCandless both claimed to be assignees of mortgage No. 1, and there was a contest between them, in the Court below, as to who had priority, but as the Circuit Judge held that neither of the assignments were valid, he did not determine anything as to the question of priority, and therefore it will be unnecessary to detail the testimony as to this point. So also it will be unnecessary to advert to the testimony as to whether Dr. H. H. Clarke was ever seized of Green Hill plantation, inasmuch as the Judge below held that this was concluded by the judgment in the Court of Probate.

The Circuit Judge, in making a statement of the various incumbrances, seems to have fallen into an error, induced probably by a mistake in the allegations of the complaint, as to the liens held by the defendant, Miss H. M. Lang; for he says that mortgage No. 5 was on Green Hill, whereas the testimony, as stated in the Referee's report, shows that this mortgage was on the Jumping Gully plantation. So that this defendant, instead of holding only one mortgage on Jumping Gully, in fact held two—one dated March 25, 1870, which covered both Green Hill and Jumping Gully, and the other, dated the 17th of March, 1876, covering Jumping Gully alone.

By the Circuit decree it was adjudged that the order enjoining Mrs. L. G. Clarke from proceeding to enforce her judgment obtained in the Court of Probate be set aside; that the assignments by Mrs. S. L. Clarke to T. W. Lang and L. McCandless were null and void; that Green Hill plantation be sold, and the proceeds be applied, first, to the costs and ex*penses of the proceeding for dower in the Court of Probate; next to the payment of the judgment in dower; next to the payment of four thousand dollars, without interest, to T. L. Boykin, for the use of Mrs. S. L. Clarke; next to the payment of the balance, if any, on the debt to Miss H. M. Lang, secured by the mortgage of March 25, 1870, the proceeds of the sale of Jumping Gully being first applied thereto; *next to the mortgage debt of the plaintiffs, and next to the debt to Miss H. M. Lang, secured by the mortgage of March 17, 1876; and that Jumping Gully be sold, and the proceeds applied to the debt to Miss H. M. Lang, secured by the mortgage dated March 25, 1870.

From this judgment the plaintiffs and the defendants T. W. Lang and Miss H. M. Lang appeal upon the following grounds: 1. Because his Honor erred in holding that said plaintiffs and defendants are estopped by the judgment for dower obtained in the Court of Probate. 2. Because the Circuit decree was not filed within the time required by law. 3. Because the evidence showed that Dr. H. H. Clarke was never seized of Green Hill plantation. 4. Because the claim for dower was barred by the statute of limitations. 5. Because his Honor should have ordered all the costs of this case to be paid out of the proceeds of the sale of Green Hill, before the payment of any of the liens thereon, either for dower or otherwise.

The plaintiffs and the defendant Miss H. M. Lang also appeal upon the further ground that the defendant Mrs. S. L. Clarke should have been required to account for the rents and profits of Green Hill while the same was in her possession as mortgagee.

The defendant T. W. Lang also appeals: 1st. Because his assignment was adjudged to be null and void. 2d. Because the claim for four thousand dollars secured by mortgage No. 1, was held not to be an interest-bearing demand.

The defendant, Miss H. M. Lang, also appeals: Because the Circuit Judge erred in holding that the proceeds of the sale of Jumping Gully must be applied to the first mortgage held by her.

*The defendant, McCandless appeals: 1st. Because his assignment was held to be null and void. 2d. Because the debt secured by the mortgage which he claimed as assignee was held not to be an interest-bearing demand. 3d. Because the Circuit Judge should have adjudged that his assignment was entitled to preference over that of the defendant, T. W. Lang.

Some of the questions presented by these grounds of appeal were not considered or passed upon by the Circuit Judge, inasmuch as from the view which he took of the case they could not arise, and these questions are therefore not properly before us for review. The question whether Dr. H. H. Clarke was seized of Green Hill during coverture, and if so whether his widow's claim for dower is barred by the statute of limitations; and the question as to which of the two rival assignments of mortgage No. 1 is entitled to priority must be remanded to the Circuit Court.

We proceed to confine our inquiries to such questions as, in our judgment, are properly before us for decision, leaving all other matters for the consideration of the Circuit Court. These questions are: 1st. As to the effect of the judgment obtained by Mrs. L. G. Clarke, in the Court of Probate. 2d. Whether Mrs. S. L. Clarke should have been required to account for the rents and profits of Green Hill during the time she was in possession. 3d. Whether the assignments made by her were null and void. 4th. Whether the debt secured by mortgage No. 1 was an interest-bearing demand. 5th. Whether the proceeds of the sale of Jumping Gully, should be first applied to the debt secured by mortgage No. 2. 6th. Whether the costs of this action should be paid out of the proceeds of the sale of Green Hill before any of the alleged liens. 7th. Whether the failure to file the decree within the time required by law, invalidated the judgment of the Circuit Court.

1. As to the judgment for dower. It is very true that the Court of Probate has jurisdiction in cases of dower, but its jurisdiction is not exclusive, for the Court of Common Pleas has concurrent jurisdiction in such cases. This is the necessary result of the principles announced in the case of Walker v. Russell, 10 S. C. 82. Now, it is a well established principle "that *where two tribunals have concurrent jurisdiction, the one which first obtains possession of the subject matter must adjudicate, and neither party can be forced into another jurisdiction." Jordan v. Moses, 10 S. C. 433. In this case, the Court of Common Pleas had obtained jurisdiction over the subject matter in controversy (Green Hill plantation), before any proceedings were instituted in the Court of Probate by Mrs. L. G. Clarke for the purpose of obtaining dower in said land, and the plaintiffs and such of the defendants as held liens thereon could not be forced into the Court of Probate for the purpose of having their claims adjudicated.

The fact that the plaintiffs and one of the defendants, from abundant caution, attempted to become parties to the proceedings in the Court of Probate, cannot affect the matter, because their application was refused upon the ground that there was then no proceeding pending in the Court of Probate, it having terminated by a final judgment on April 20, 1877, and their application not having been made until some time in the month of August following. Nor can these parties be prejudiced by failing to appeal from the judgment rendered by the Court of Probate, or from the refusal to admit them as parties to the proceedings in that Court after such proceedings had terminated. Not being parties they could not appeal, for, although the language of the Code, § 57, is "any person interested in any final order, sentence or decree of any Probate court, and considering himself injured thereby, may appeal therefrom," yet this language must be regarded as referring only to persons who are parties to the proceedings in the Court of Probate, for no one can properly be said to be interested in any final order or decree made in a proceeding to which he is not a party, nor can he consider himself injured thereby; for nothing can be better established than the doctrine that judgments bind only parties and their privies. Freem. Judg. § 154.

After the Court of Common Pleas had assumed jurisdiction of the subject matter and had been called upon to adjust and determine the priorities of the liens claimed by the several parties upon the land in question, and after the filing of the notice of the pendency of the action, of which all persons were *bound to take notice, the Court of Probate certainly could not assume jurisdiction and determine that the lien claimed by Mrs. L. G. Clarke was prior and superior to all other liens, especially where the other lien holders were not made parties. Such a course would almost inevitably lead to a conflict of jurisdiction and produce inextricable confusion. One tribunal might decide one way and the other render an opposite judgment. When the action of the plaintiffs was commenced to which all persons whom the records showed held liens on the subject matter sought to be affected were made parties, and after notice of the pendency of the action was filed, any other person who claimed to hold any incumbrance or lien on the same subject matter, was not at liberty to go into another tribunal for the purpose of having such lien enforced, but, to do so, must go into the same tribunal, and thereby have the whole matter adjudicated by that tribunal. We think therefore that the Court of Probate, had no jurisdiction to render the judgment relied upon in this case, and that the Circuit Judge erred in holding that the plaintiffs and the defendants holding mortgages on Green Hill were concluded thereby.

2. As to the accountability of Mrs. S. L. Clarke, for the rents and profits of Green Hill, during the time she was in possession. She was originally the real owner of the mortgage on this plantation, and the testimony is that she was put in possession by the mortgagor for the purpose of having the rents and profits applied to the interest which had accrued upon the debt secured by her mortgage. This being the case, nothing would seem to be clearer than that she should account for the rents and profits, and, if she continued to be the owner of the mortgage, that the amount due by her on such accounting should operate as a credit on the debt secured by the mortgage. But, if she had assigned the mortgage to a third person before she was put in possession of the mortgaged premises, while she would be individually liable for rents and profits, we do not see how such liability could operate as a credit on the mortgage debt, after it had been assigned to a third person.

3. The next inquiry is as to the validity of the assignments made by Mrs. S. L. Clarke, to T. W. Lang, and to McCandless. *It seems that the money secured by the mortgage of which she executed the assignments in question, was a legacy to her under the will of her father, Burwell Boykin, who died in 1861, the ninth and tenth clauses of which are as follows: "Sec. 9. In lieu of the interest in my estate which I have herein devised to my sons, I give and bequeath to each of my daughters, living at the time of my death, the sum of four thousand dollars. * * The bequest in this section to each of my said daughters is to take effect and be delivered, as each of them arrives at the age of twenty-one years, or be married. Sec. 10. I direct that my executors before delivering or consenting to the possession of any property bequeathed in this will to my daughters, shall cause the same to be secured to them, and each of them respectively free from the debts, liabilities, contracts, disposition and control of any husband, present or future, that each may have."

The defendant, Mrs. S. L. Clarke, who was one of the daughters of the testator, intermarried with her co-defendant T. H. Clarke, in 1866, before she attained the age of twenty-one years, and on December 19, 1869, T. L. Boykin, the executor of Burwell Boykin, at her request and by her consent, turned over this legacy of four thousand dollars to the said T. H. Clarke, taking from him (as stated by the referee) "his accountable receipt to Thomas L. Boykin, executor, to hold said four thousand dollars subject to the bequest of said sum in said will," together with a mortgage on Green Hill "to secure payment of said sum, according to the terms of said bequest," or as stated by the circuit judge, "a receipt for the same by which he promised to repay the same when required to do so by any court of competent jurisdiction," together with a mortgage on Green Hill, which mortgage was upon conditions "that the said T. H. Clarke should hold the said sum of four thousand dollars, subject to the terms of the bequest in said last will and testament of Burwell Boykin, and shall account for the same when duly required to do so by any one having competent authority, and to pay the same when so required by any court of competent authority."

being then a married woman, executed an assignment of this mortgage to the defendant T. W. Lang to indemnify him against any loss on account of a note due by himself and T. H. Clarke jointly, and on March 17, 1876, she executed another assignment of this same mortgage to the defendant McCandless to secure a debt due to him by her husband T. H. Clarke, and the original mortgage was delivered to McCandless by the executor, T. L. Boykin.

It will be observed that the bequest to Mrs. S. L. Clarke was to her absolutely without any limitation over in favor of any one, the only restriction being that it should not be made liable for the debts of her husband. Before the adoption of the present constitution this could only be effected by the interposition of a trustee, but now no trustee is necessary for that purpose, as the provisions of the constitution effectually protect the wife's separate property from the marital rights of her husband. It will also be observed that the bequest is not to the executor, or to a trustee for the use of the daughters, but is directly to them, and the executor is only charged with the duty of seeing that the bequest is secured from liability for the husband's debts before delivering or paying over the legacy to any one of the daughters. Hence, when provision for that purpose was made, the executor not only had the right, but it was his duty to pay over the legacy provided the legatee had married or attained the age of twenty-one years. The will does not prescribe how such provision shall be made, and therefore, when it is made in any effectual manner, it would be the right and the duty of the executor to pay over the legacy. Now, as we have said, the provisions of the present constitution are amply sufficient to secure the wife's separate property from liability for the husband's debts, and hence, after its adoption there was nothing to prevent the executor from paying over this legacy to Mrs. S. L. Clarke, or to anyone whom she might direct.

When the executor at the instance of Mrs. S. L. Clarke turned over this money to her husband, the practical result was the same as if he had paid her the money, and she had then loaned it to her husband, taking his bond and mortgage *to secure the repayment thereof. This she had a perfect right to do, as the constitution, art. XIV. sec. 8, invests her with the same power to dispose of her separate property that a single woman has. She therefore could dispose of this money as she pleased, and if she desired to lend it to her husband, she had a perfect right to do so, and to take from him a mortgage to secure its repayment. This being the case, it follows necessarily that she could assign this mortgage to whomsoever and for whatsoever purpose she might desire, even to secure a debt due by her husband. These views are fully sustained by the recent cases of Pelzer v. Rodgers & Co. and Campbell & Co., 15 S. C.

581 [40 Am. Rep. 705], and Clinkscales v. Hall, 15 S. C. 602, where the whole subject of the rights and powers of married women, under the present constitution and laws, has been so fully and satisfactorily discussed as to render any further discussion unnecessary.

It is said, however, that while this may be true where the marriage takes place, or the property is acquired by the wife after the adoption of the constitution of 1868, it is not applicable to the present case where the marriage was contracted and the property was acquired prior to 1868. We think, however, that this matter is conclusively settled by the case of Witsell v. Charleston, 7 S. C. 88, and that the fact that the property was acquired, or that the woman was married before the adoption of the present Constitution would not affect the question, unless the rights of other persons had vested before the constitution was adopted. Here, as we have seen, this was not the case, and hence the case last cited is conclusive authority to show that Mrs. S. L. Clarke had the power to dispose of the legacy bequeathed to her by her father's will in any way that she deemed proper, and that she could make a valid assignment of the mortgage in question for the purpose of securing a debt due by her husband.

The question as to which of the two assignments has priority was not considered by the Circuit Court, for the reason hereinbefore indicated, and we have before us for review no findings of fact or law in relation thereto. That question must therefore be referred to the Circuit Court.

4. Our next inquiry is whether the debt secured by mortgage No. 1 is an interest-bearing demand. Regarding this as practically a loan by the wife to the husband of a definite sum of money, we can see no reason why it should not bear interest like any other loan of money.

5. The circuit judge in making his decree that the proceeds of the sale of the Jumping Gully plantation should first be applied to the payment of the debt secured by mortgage No. 2 proceeds upon what seems to be an error of fact. He evidently supposed that the defendant Miss H. M. Lang, held but one mortgage on Jumping Gully, whereas we understand from the testimony that she in fact held two mortgages on that plantation. While, therefore, the rule upon which the circuit judge based his decree is correct—that where one person has a lien upon two parcels of property, and another has a lien upon only one of these parcels equity will require the former first to exhaust the parcel upon which the latter has no lien—yet this rule is subject to the qualification that if its enforcement would operate to the prejudice of the creditor who holds the two liens, it will not apply. 1 Story Eq. § 633 and notes. If therefore it is true that the defendant Miss H. M.

Lang holds two mortgages on the Jumping Gully plantation, it might operate to her prejudice to apply the rule above stated, and if so, there would be error in this respect in the judgment below. Inasmuch, however, as the whole case must go back, we prefer to refer this inquiry to the Circuit Court, without adjudging anything now, either of fact or law, in respect thereto.

6. The next question is as to the costs. Under the views hereinbefore presented it would follow necessarily that there was error in the judgment below in directing that the judgment dower should first be paid out of the proceeds of the sale of Green Hill, before the costs of this action are provided for. What provision shall be made in relation to the costs must be left to the Circuit Court to determine after hearing the whole case.

7. The only remaining question is disposed of by the decision in the case of Koon v. Munro, 11 S. C. 140.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the *Circuit Court be reversed, except so much thereof as directs a sale of Green Hill and Jumping Gully plantations, and that the case be remanded to that court for the purpose of carrying into effect the principles herein announced, with the privilege to Mrs. L. G. Clarke to set up her claim for dower under the proceedings in this action.

Before Thomson, J., Spartanburg, October, 1879.

In this case Hon. T. B. FRASER, Judge of the Third Circuit, sat in the place of the CHIEF JUSTICE, who had been of counsel.

*Action by Joseph Walker against William H. Walker and Mary E. Walker, commenced May 25, 1875. The circuit decree, after a statement of the facts (which sufficiently appear in the opinion of this court) was as follows:

The Court will not take up the exceptions in succession, but will state in connection the views of facts and law which govern the case.

As a fact, the jury (from the papers before me), did not find upon the matters submitted to the Referee by the second order. Without mentioning any sum the jury found that defendant, M. E. Walker, had tendered to plaintiff the sum due to Joseph Walker & Co. The second order of reference relates to the sums or amounts of the accounts due the plaintiff after the dissolution of the firm of Joseph Walker & Co. This, however, became a case for equitable relief—a case of foreclosure; in which the verdict of a jury would inform the conscience of the judge, but would not bind or fetter conclusively his own judgment. Kirkpatrick v. Atkinson, 11 Rich. Eq., 27.

The order of the Judge—from which it seems there is no appeal—is distinct and clear, that the Referee take into consideration the amounts of the accounts of Joseph Walker and of Walker & Fleming. The Referee did as he was commanded, and the first exception strikes rather at the order than the report. The deed has been declared a mortgage, and the question (amongst others) is for what sums of money it shall stand as security. It does not appear it was intended to secure any liquidated sum. At least, as between the parties to this proceeding it bore that character at the first. The testimony of Mary E. Walker strengthens this view. She declares she held a bond for titles from the plaintiff. This, connected with the other testimony, was an admission of indebtedness to, and title in him. The plaintiff is in the position of one seeking to foreclose, but she is also in the position of one seeking to redeem. She claims the deed is a mortgage; it is allowed. She claims having made a tender—a limited tender is found by the jury.

There can be no question but that as against a mortgagor seeking to redeem, the mortgagee is entitled to be paid all demands. To entitle her to equitable relief, she must do equity. *—"When the mortgagee had, subsequently to the date of the mortgage, advanced to the mortgagor other sums than those mentioned in the mortgage, or the mortgagor became indebted to the mortgagee, it was held that the mortgagee might withhold the cancelling of the mortgage until all the claims he had against the mortgagor were paid." Walling v. Aiken, McM. Eq., 2.

Independent of the general equity there is evidence that it was a contract of the parties that the mortgage should be regarded as a security for advances made. Such was the intent of the plaintiff, as he swears, and giving his reasons therefor. The character of a security for advances appears to have attached to it for supplies furnished by Joseph Walker & Co., and the parties dealt with it under such belief. Was there any change or notice given to Joseph Walker or Walker & Fleming that the mortgage should no longer stand as security for advances? Had the circumstances of the parties altered, and was security no longer needed? The evidence answers in the negative. The parties continued to deal with each other in the later transactions, as they had done when the deed was recognized as a security between them. Surely the party wishing to change the condition of affairs should have given notice to the other of such intent.

That the wife to a certain extent had the management of the land is apparent, from her letter to plaintiff, wishing to purchase a mule. So the caution she gave to sell her husband only certain articles, necessary, according to her view, is evidence that she regarded his purchases of supplies as a liability on her part. The wife may give control of her separate property to her husband, so that it may become liable for his debts. Reeder & Davis v. Flinn, 6 S. C., 240. Or, as the Referee seems to have done, the purchase of supplies, whether made by the husband or wife, may be regarded as of joint character, and with the consent of both defendants.

It is ordered, adjudged and decreed that the defendant Mary E. Walker's exceptions be overruled, and the report of the Referee confirmed, and made the judgment of this Court. And that the plaintiff have leave to enter his judgment of fore*closure for the several sums of money reported as due him by Mr. Nicholls, the Referee.

From this decree Mary E. Walker appealed on the following exceptions:

1. In sustaining any or all the exceptions of plaintiff to the first report of the Referee.
2. In overruling any or all of the exceptions of the defendant, Mary E. Walker, to the second report of the Referee.
3. In holding that the order of Judge Mackey allowed testimony to be taken of debts due others than the firm of Joseph Walker & Co.
4. In holding that the Referee erred in finding that the whole amount intended to be secured by the mortgage was $339.75.
5. In finding that any debts after January 1st, 1873, were intended to be secured by the mortgage.
6. In not sustaining defendant's exception to Referee's report to wit: That said report was indefinite and uncertain, inasmuch as it does not report the amount due separately by each of the defendants.
7. In overruling the appellant's exceptions to Referee's report, to wit: That the Referee erred in construing the order of reference as permitting him to report the amount intended to be secured by the mortgage to any other person than the plaintiff.

8. In not sustaining appellant's fifth exception to Referee's Report, to wit: That the Referee erred in not reporting that the charges against Mary E. Walker were unauthorized except for the articles for which she gave orders, and that for those orders payment has been made.

9. In confirming the report of the Referee.

10. In holding that in this proceeding appellant stands as one seeking to redeem a mortgage, and for that purpose is bound to pay other debts than those due plaintiff or Joseph Walker & Co.

11. In holding that appellant contracted to pay other debts than those due Joseph Walker & Co.

12. In holding that appellant contracted that any other debts except the debts due Joseph Walker & Co., should be secured by the mortgage.

*13. In holding that appellant gave her husband, the co-defendant, control of her separate property, so as to become liable for his debts.

14. In holding that the purchase of articles, charged in the account, whether made by appellant or her husband, could be regarded as of joint character, and with the consent of both defendants.

15. In refusing to hold that nothing whatever was secured by the mortgage to plaintiff.

16. In refusing to hold that all of appellant's debt to plaintiff was paid.

17. In not decreeing that the plaintiff should pay the costs of the proceedings, or at least all costs up to the time the case was referred to the Referee.

18. In giving judgment against appellant in favor of Joseph Walker.

19. In giving judgment against appellant in favor of Walker & Fleming.

20. In giving judgment against appellant in favor of Joseph Walker & Co.

21. In ordering foreclosure of mortgage of the land in favor of all or either of said alleged creditors.

22. In decreeing that the plaintiff have leave to enter his judgment of foreclosure for the several sums of money reported as due him by Mr. Nicholls, as Referee.

23. In not specifying the terms upon which said judgment of foreclosure was to be entered.

24. In refusing to dismiss the complaint.

Mr. J. S. R. Thomson, for appellant.

Messrs. Bobo & Carlisle, S. J. Simpson, contra.

May 12, 1882. The opinion of the Court was delivered by

Mr. Justice FRASER. On examining the admitted facts and the evidence contained in the "Case" before this Court, it appears that this appellant, Mary E. Walker, was seized of the tract of land described in the complaint in this case; that by proper conveyances the land was conveyed to A. W. Cummings as security for a debt due to him; that when this debt was paid, except the sum of $49.00, by consent of Mary E. Walker, Cummings conveyed the land to Joseph Walker & Co., a firm consisting of Joseph Walker, the plaintiff, and J. G. Goodlett (the consideration being stated in the deed at $149.00), who took title to the land as security for $49.00 advanced to Cummings, and for $100.00, either to be advanced or then due by W. H. Walker, the co-defendant. Some time after this Joseph Walker and James G. Goodlett gave to Mary E. Walker a written agreement to reconvey the land to her on the payment of $350.00 on January 1st, 1873; this $350.00 was the amount of a credit extended to Mary E. Walker and her husband, W. H. Walker, on the security of the title to this land; that this written agreement was delivered up to Joseph Walker & Co. by W. H. Walker, and there is no evidence of any consent to its delivery by Mary E. Walker; the firm of Joseph Walker & Co. was dissolved on March 19th, 1873; on April 1st, 1873, James G. Goodlett assigned all his interest in the land to Joseph Walker, having previously sold to him his interest in the firm of Joseph Walker & Co.; about May 1, 1873, C. E. Fleming bought what had been the interest of James G. Goodlett, and the business was carried on under the name and style of Walker & Fleming; large sums of money being due, as appears by the books, by Mary E. and W. H. Walker to the successive firms of Joseph Walker & Co., Joseph Walker and Walker & Fleming, Joseph Walker commenced this action to recover possession of this land from the defendants, who had always remained in possession of it; W. H. Walker, the husband, has never answered the complaint; Mary E. Walker answered the complaint, alleging that the title was held by plaintiff only as a mortgage to secure a debt, and that on December 31st, 1874, she had tendered the whole amount due, $293.00.

The plea of tender not having been followed up by an averment that appellant has always been and still is ready to pay it, or by a production of the money in court, cannot avail the appellant as a defence, even if the whole sum due had in fact been tendered as alleged. 2 Green Evid. § 600.

*The case came on to be heard before his Honor Judge T. J. Mackey, and on the trial of certain issues of fact referred to them, the jury rendered a verdict: 1. That the deed under which plaintiff claimed "was intended to operate as a mortgage." 2. That Mary E. Walker did tender to plaintiff the whole amount of debt due by her to Joseph Walker & Co., intended to be secured by the mortgage."

After this verdict was rendered, Judge Mackey made an order appointing a Referee "to take testimony and report" what amount is due Joseph Walker & Co. from the defendant, Mary E. Walker, at the time of the tender and subsequent thereto; and that he do further take testimony upon any special matter involving said accounts; that the Referee do report also the accounts due from W. H. Walker, and also what amounts were intended to be secured by the mortgage, and that the said report, as well as evidence taken, be made subject to the findings of fact already made by the jury.

There are only two facts settled by the verdict of the jury: 1. That the deed was intended as a mortgage. 2. That the whole amount due by Mary E. Walker had been tendered which was intended to be secured to Joseph Walker & Co. The verdict did not fix the amount due to Joseph Walker & Co. intended to be so secured, and did not settle the question whether there were any other amounts intended to be so secured. When the reference was held under this order the Referee ruled out all testimony as to accounts due to Joseph Walker after Goodlett had retired from the firm, and reported that the amount due Joseph Walker & Co. at the date of the dissolution, and intended to be secured by the mortgage, was $339.00.

To this report the plaintiff excepted, and upon the hearing before his Honor Judge Pressley, the report was recommitted to the Referee "to take testimony and report the same as to amount of the account due to plaintiff after the dissolution of the firm, made by M. E. Walker and W. H. Walker, or either of them, and whether the same was intended to be secured by the mortgage, and if so how much thereof. It is further ordered that the Referee make separate statements of the amounts of the accounts made with Joseph Walker & Co., Joseph *Walker, successor to Joseph Walker & Co., and with Walker & Fleming, successors to Joseph Walker, by the defendants, or either of them." It will be seen that this order brings back the investigation to an inquiry as to the matters contemplated by the original order of Judge Mackey, as expressed in the words "and also what amounts were intended to be secured by the mortgage."

A reference was held under this order, and the Referee made a second report of the amounts due, after allowing all proper credits, as follows: To Joseph Walker & Co., $339.75; to Joseph Walker, $304.66; to Walker & Fleming, $287.88. The Referee also reported that these two latter amounts were intended to be secured by mortgage. The verdict of the jury had settled it as a fact that the amount due Joseph Walker & Co. was intended to be so secured, but did not fix the amount.

In the verdict of the jury the word "intended" is used as expressing such mutual intention as to make the deed a mortgage, and to make that mortgage a security for certain debts therein named, and it is but fair to hold that the word is used by the Referee in the same sense, expressing such mutual intention as is necessary for a contract, when he says that the amounts due Joseph Walker and Walker & Fleming were intended to be secured by the mortgage.

This report came before his Honor Judge Thomson on exceptions. The exceptions were overruled, and the report confirmed and made the judgment of the Court, * * * and it was ordered "that the plaintiff have leave to enter judgment of foreclosure for the several sums of money reported as due him, by Mr. Nicholls, the Referee. From this judgment Mary E. Walker has appealed to this Court on various grounds.

The 1st, 3d and 7th exceptions raise questions as to the scope of the first order of reference, made by Judge Mackey. Whatever may have been the relevancy or value of the facts when ascertained, it was certainly within the scope of the words used in that order—"also what amounts were intended to be secured by the mortgage." The Referee should have taken the testimony and reported the amounts due to Joseph Walker and to Walker & Fleming, if, as reported by the Referee to the *Court, these amounts were intended to be secured by the mortgage. These exceptions, therefore, must be overruled.

The 4th exception is that the Referee erred in finding that the whole amount intended to be secured by the mortgage is $339.75. There is some misapprehension of the fact in this, as such does not seem to be the Referee's report.

The 5th, 8th, 11th, 12th, 13th, 14th, 15th, 16th exceptions raise the main issues in this case. The Referee has found as a fact, and in his report the Circuit Judge has concurred, that all these accounts, including the amounts due Joseph Walker & Co., Joseph Walker and Walker & Fleming, were intended to be secured by this mortgage. These exceptions raise the issues: 1st, Whether in fact it was intended by these parties, viz., Mary E. Walker, and the successive firm of Joseph Walker & Co., Joseph Walker, and Walker & Fleming, that these amounts should be secured by the mortgage; and 2d, Whether the fact, if established, authorizes in this case a judgment of foreclosure and sale of the land for the payment of these debts.

By the tender, the appellant admits the liability of the land for at least $293.00 to Joseph Walker & Co. It is true that as to the accounts due to Joseph Walker and Walker & Fleming there is no written agreement. The appellant cannot complain of the want of written evidence, because it is by parol testimony that she can show that a deed absolute on its face is only a mortgage. If it can be shown to be a mortgage, then certainly the whole condition of the mortgage can be shown in the same way by parol evidence.

It is contended, however, that while this is true as to the original condition of the mortgage, it is not true as to conditions superadded by the parties afterwards. It is very distinctly laid down that while as to third parties a mortgage cannot be extended to cover new debts, yet this may be done by parol amongst the parties themselves, even when the mortgage is one created in the usual way by deed. See Jones Mort. § 357, where it is said that while such an agreement cannot be set up against a mortgagor at law, it can be in equity. The form in which the question comes up is now of no consequence.

*In this case there was no distinct agreement in words between the parties. The evidence of an implied contract is very strong. The husband is said to be insolvent and unreliable; no credit could be obtained originally until this security was given; most of the articles were for family use or other necessities. Soon after the dissolution of the firm of Walker & Co., Joseph Walker received a letter from the appellant requesting him to pay for a horse, and inquiring for fertilizers and groceries. This was April 25th, 1873, and within four days we find these very articles charged in the account amounting to over $200, and this account ran on for several years charged against Mary E. and William H. Walker, husband and wife, payments made on it, and not one word of complaint that any of the articles were purchased by W. H. Walker; and the parties commenced their dealings on this security only. This court thinks that the inference is a fair one that it was the intention of these parties, a mutual intention, such as constitutes an agreement, that these debts should be secured by the mortgage. If any other two parties had lived together and in common as these two, Mary E. Walker and her husband W. H. Walker, and had dealt in this way, we do not think there would be any reasonable objection to an inference that there was an implied contract. The husband is not entitled, as a matter of course, to be held out as the agent of the wife, but when she interferes in the business, as she has done in this case, and in fact allows him to act for her, she is as much bound as any one else who constitutes an agent. This court holds therefore that there was an implied contract to extend this security to cover the debts of Joseph Walker and Walker &

Fleming, and that such implied agreement is valid and binding on the parties.

There is no valid objection to this agreement made with successive firms which assumed in this matter the obligations and acquired the rights of Joseph Walker & Co. Lawrence v. Tucker, 23 How. (U. S.) 27 [16 L. Ed. 474]. The rights of the creditors in this case depend on this agreement and not on any right, as in Walling v. Aiken, McM. Eq. 1, of a mortgagee to demand in a suit to redeem any amounts outside of the mortgage debt which may be due him. This right can exist only between *parties one of whom can plead discount. Joseph Walker stands in this case in the place of Joseph Walker & Co. as to the title and in the absence of any agreement, there could be no set off between Mary E. Walker in this suit and the other two firms.

The 2nd, 9th, 18th, 19th, 20th, 21st, 22nd, and 24th exceptions are too general and do not bring the mind of the court to any point in which its judgment is sought.

The 6th exception is not well taken because the referee had no testimony before him on which he could have made a statement of the amounts purchased by the defendants separately, and it would not have been important if he could have done so.

As to the 10th exception, the Court holds that it is not important to consider the question raised if the judgment of the Circuit Court is sustained on other grounds, but the views of the Court have been indicated on the point raised by it.

As to the 17th exception, it is a matter of discretion in equity cases in the Circuit Judge as to who shall pay the costs, and as to this there has been no order. This court cannot direct the Circuit Judge to make an order for costs in such cases.

Exception 23d. A judgment of foreclosure is usually attended with an order of sale and for the payment of the proceeds, but these are merely administrative orders and can be made at any time hereafter.

It is therefore ordered and adjudged that the exceptions be overruled, the judgment of the Circuit Court affirmed, and the appeal dismissed.

UNION BANK v. WANDO MINING AND MANUFACTURING CO.

[1. Corporations 253.]

Under the charter of a corporation, its stockholders were liable to the extent of the par value of their shares for all its debts that were to be paid within one year from the time the debt was contracted, and that were sued against the corporation within a year after maturity. Held, that a judgment against the corporation did not prevent the stockholders when subsequently sued under this provision of the charter, from interposing a defence to their liability on the original debt.

[2. Corporations 237, 577, 579.]

After a sale of the property and good will of the corporation to a new *company, and the election of the officers of the old corporation to the same offices in the new, the officers discounted notes of the old corporation in a bank for the purpose of raising money to pay its indebtedness. Held, that they then had no power to contract debts that would impose an individual liability on the stockholders under this charter.

[3. Banks and Banking 116.]

And the president of this bank having been a director of the old corporation and present at the meeting that authorized the sale, the bank was chargeable with notice of these facts.

[4. Bills and Notes 139.]

Other notes were executed by the old corporation during its existence and at maturity successively renewed, and the judgments obtained against the company were based upon these renewal notes, the suits having been brought more than a year after the maturity of the first notes given for the original consideration, but within a year after the maturity of the last renewals. Held, that it was incumbent upon the suing creditors in this action to show that the renewal notes were given in payment, without which there was no individual liability on the part of the stockholders.

[5. Appeal and Error 1022.]

A finding of fact by the master, reversed by the Circuit Judge, approved.

[6. Corporations 264.]

But even if these renewal notes were intended to be payment, the officers had no power thus to extend indefinitely the liability of the stockholders, and, no suit having been brought against the corporation upon the original debts within a year after maturity, there was no right of action under this charter against the stockholders.

[The charter of a mining and manufacturing corporation made the stockholders liable for debts of the corporation payable in one year from the time when they should be contracted, if sued against the corporation within a year. Notes were given by the corporation, and paid as they matured by giving new notes. Held, that the year began to run from the maturity of the original notes, not from the maturity of the substituted notes.]

Before Thomson, J., Charleston, June, 1880.
Hon. W. H. WALLACE, of the Seventh Circuit, sat in the place of Mr. Justice McIVER, who had an interest in the cause.

This was an action commenced in November, 1878, by the Union Bank of South Carolina, in behalf of itself and other creditors, against the Wando Mining and Manufacturing Company and all its stockholders. Judgment creditors of the defendant company were afterwards called in, and they appeared and presented their claims. The purpose of the action was to recover these debts from the individual stockholders by virtue of the liability imposed upon them in the section of the charter quoted in the opinion of this Court, executions against the company itself having been returned nulla bona.

The facts are stated in the opinion. The notes, other than those of the Union Bank, were renewals made payable, some in the words "within one year after date," and others "six months after date," and were all traced back to antecedent notes which were payable, some "one year after date" and others "two years after date." They were all promissory notes. The notes, when taken up by the company, were all kept and showed indorsements in words, "received interest to date on within, also renewal note for same amount," "received interest on within and new note for principal," "received note in settlement of this note same amount," "received note in renewal," etc. The case was referred to W. D. Porter, Master in Equity, whose report, omitting its statement of facts and some other minor matters, was as follows:

The main question that underlies this whole case is whether the notes sued upon or the original debt for which they were given is the indebtedness for which the shareholder is responsible.

It is conceded in argument that the notes of plaintiff, as well as those sued by Lord & Inglesby, have been traced back to their original debt or considerations, and that no action has been brought within one year from the time such original debt became due. The suing creditors claim that the last note sued on constitutes in each case the debt of the company, and that suit was brought within one year after it became due. Defendants claim that the maturity of the first note in each case was the time the debt became due, and that suit was not brought within one year from such maturity in any of the cases. In all of the cases notes have been renewed and brought down to time of suit; as one note matured another was given in place of it, paying only the interest.

The Constitution of 1868 provides, in Art. 12, Sec. 5, Title Corporations, that all general and special Acts passed pursuant to this section shall make provision therein for fixing the personal liability of stockholders under proper limitations. The Act to incorporate the Wando Company provides for a limited several liability, sometimes called an individual liability. Not only is this liability confined to debts of a certain class, and to an amount equal to the shares of capital stock held by each member, but it does not attach until judgment has been obtained against the corporation and nulla bona returned on the execution. It is therefore not primary, but secondary; it is contingent upon the failure of corporate property out of which to raise the money. In this respect, the stockholder is in the nature of a surety or collateral obligor. The liability is only for such debts as are to be paid within one year from the time they were contracted, and upon which debts suit has been brought within one year from the time they became due. And the liability is not fixed until, according to the sheriff's return, there is no corporate property that can be levied on. The statutory provisions are the measure of the individual liability of the shareholders. And inasmuch as the liability is restricted, and individual liability is repugnant to the law of corporations, it must be construed with reasonable strictness.

It is true that the fundamental law of the State provides for a personal liability of the stockholders. The character and extent of that liability it leaves to the Legislature. Sometimes it is greater, sometimes less. But the Constitution does not abolish corporations. It recognizes them by the title "corporations" in the Constitution. It recognizes a corporate liability, and a personal liability. It does not confound them, but keeps them separate and distinct. The latter is superadded in a limited degree to the former in certain contingencies, and upon certain conditions; and when this cumulative liability is to be enforced, the contingencies must have arisen, and the conditions have been performed.

There are certainly three classes of persons to be considered in these transactions: 1st, The corporation, an artificial person with a defined legal existence; 2d, The shareholder, a natural person with a limited several liability; 3d, The creditor: the rights and responsibilities of each must be kept in view.

It is settled law in England and in this country that a promissory note is only an evidence of indebtedness: unless paid, it is no extinguishment of the indebtedness. It fixes the amount of the debt and the time of payment; and if not paid at maturity, the holder may, upon bringing the note into Court, resort to and bring action upon the original cause of indebtedness. It is equally well settled as a general rule, that a renewal of a note is no extinguishment of the old debt, and no creation of a new debt. It is only an

cess is well known. When the old note is about to fall due, a new note is put in bank and discounted, with the understanding that the proceeds of the discount are to be applied to the old note. Mr. Hacker, in his testimony, says that he believed such to be the understanding and such the process in the Union Bank with the Wando Company. Simple renewal is simple extension of time and prolongation of credit. Really the debt is not paid—it stands as before.

If something else, say, for example, the note of a third person, be accepted in payment, this has been held to extinguish the old debt on the principle of accord and satisfaction. Or where a surety gives his note for the debt of the principal which is accepted by some distinct act, it operates as an accord and satisfaction. It is the change of security which operates this effect, but it is not payment; it is accord and satisfaction. This was the case in Peters v. Barnhill, 1 Hill 234, which was strongly relied on. In that case it was not the note of the principal debtor, but the note of the surety, a third person, that was held to extinguish the debt. In these transactions there was no change of security, no intervention of the obligation of third persons; the renewals were pure and simple, and I can find no case where such renewals have been held to extinguish the debt. A promise that they should so operate would be nudum pactum, it would be without consideration, and not binding in law.

But it is urged that Mr. Inglesby, one of the attorneys of the Company, and also of a large number of the creditors, in his testimony affirms and insists that the new notes were given and accepted in payment. And it is further urged that this may be done under the law of South Carolina, although not under the law of New York. According to the law of South Carolina an agreement, even though in writing, to be binding, must be upon sufficient consideration. A note "for value received" is prima facie evidence of consideration, but it may be inquired into.

Where would be the considerations for these renewals? During the long series of them for years, the debt still remains the same. There may be consideration for the extension *of time in the payment of interest, but none whatever for the satisfaction of the debt. The argument of plaintiffs is that the old debt was extinguished whenever a new note was made. That is as much as to say that a debt may be paid by an unfulfilled promise. Promise is not payment. With special care and diligence the Company kept all the notes surrendered, and linked them together by writing "renewal" upon them, so that the chain is perfect. They are traced back to the original cause of indebtedness with entire accuracy.

The cases in our reports that speak of a note being taken in satisfaction of a debt use such expressions as these: "Express agreement," Costello v. Cave, 2 Hill, 528 [27 Am. Dec. 404]; "Special engagement," Chastain v. Johnson, 2 Bail., 574; "Stipulation," Bryce v. Bowers, 11 Rich. Eq., 47; and these are accompanied by some act, or by the intervention of some third person or new security. Now where is the evidence of any such "express agreement," "special engagement," or "stipulation?" There must be more parties than one to such a contract. The proper parties would be the bank, which was represented by its president, the Wando Company, which was represented by its president, and the holders of the note, who were represented by their attorneys.

The president of the bank, Mr. Mowry, has not been examined, nor has Mr. Gibbon, the president of the company. They say nothing. And even if Mr. Mowry should testify to such a special agreement, his authority to extinguish a debt by a promise might well be questioned by his board. An authority to renew in the usual way would not imply an authority to renew in such an unusual way. There is no evidence whatever of what the board of the bank, or the board of the Wando Company thought or assented to, in relation to the effect of the renewals. The proof, therefore, of an express, special agreement is not sufficient. Mr. Inglesby's testimony is, without doubt, an honest and strong expression of his understanding in relation to the renewals and their legal effect, but is not such evidence as is required to establish an express contract between all the parties concerned.

But supposing there was such express agreement between *the parties named, could such an agreement, by which a renewal note was to extinguish the preceding debt and create a new debt, bind the individual stockholders upon their limited several liability? The stockholders are to be considered in two lights, first in reference to their corporate liability, and then in reference to their separate individual liability. In relation to the former the directors are their agents, and may bind them within the legitimate range of corporate business affairs. But these shareholders have also private rights and responsibilities which affect their private property as distinguished from their corporate property. Just as a judgment against the corporation cannot bind them except for such debts as they are liable for, so no contracts or agreements of the directors, by which their several liability is affected can bind them without their consent. The statute provides that they shall not be liable for any debt contracted by the Company which is not to be paid within one year from the time the debt is contracted; and therefore, no action of the corporation or the creditor, or both, by which the indebtedness of the corporation is renewed or extended can affect the stockholders. They are not agents of his for any such purpose. He is an integer of the corporation only for corporate purposes. Not only the words of the statute, but its policy also, interpose for his protection.

Manifestly the object of the Legislature was to prevent that very accumulation of indebtedness which is the bane of individuals as well as corporations, and which is now sought to be thrown upon the individual shareholder. The several debts represented by these notes have been rolled along for a series of years, and instead of being paid within the year of their contracting, have been kept alive and perpetuated by the process of bank renewals. It is not intimated, for it is not believed, that there was any sinister or dishonest purpose in this matter. The commercial panic, the great depreciation of real and other property, the over-extension of their business operations, and the fearful rates of interest and commissions that had to be paid for credit and money, are sufficient to account for the result. But a faithful pursuit of the policy indicated by the act

*would have gone far to relieve creditors or stockholders from the heavy burden which must fall upon one or other of them.

The debt for which stockholders may be made liable is a debt that is to be paid in one year, and which if not paid is to be sued within one year. Payment is something that discharges the debt, not something that keeps it alive and perpetuates it. But if this process of keeping alive and extending be carried on by the corporation and the creditor, it cannot affect the stockholder whose statutory liability is restricted to one year from the contracting of the debt, and who cannot be held liable unless it be put in suit in one year from its maturity.

But it is argued that the stockholders knew and assented and are therefore bound. The stockholders undoubtedly knew that much more than the capital was invested in plant, and that there was a large amount of bills payable. This they knew from the annual reports, and they only met once a year. But what proof is there, or what fact from which they could infer, that there was an arrangement by which their liability, instead of being restricted to debts contracted within a year was extended to debts contracted in a series of years. No such arrangement or contract could be made to bind them without their express assent. The 4th Section of the charter was notice to the creditor. It was enough to put him on inquiry. He and the corporation cannot enlarge or extend the statutory liability of the stockholders by inference and without his express agreement.

The sale of the mines, works, and material on hand, and of the good will of the company's business, was equivalent to a cessation of the company's business. It was not a dissolution, because there was some other property to be sold, and there were debts to be paid. But it was an announcement that the company had ceased to do the business for which it was incorporated. The corporation, its officers and stockholders, were certainly bound by this action. The resolution to sell was unanimously adopted, 2,039 shares, upon a vote by shares, voting for it. To say by unanimous vote, we will do no more new business is to say as plainly as language can speak, we will *create no new debt. The power of the officers to borrow money and make notes, was an implied power, not a power expressly granted. The resolution of 25th June, 1877, and subsequent sale, which took place in July, 1877, was certainly a revocation of the power to bind the company and the stockholders by new debts. It put the company in liquidation, and withdrew the implied power to borrow moneys or create new obligations. The notes upon which the judgments of the Union Bank are founded, all bear date subsequently to the sale; they are dated in February and March, 1878. They are renewals of old notes. The attorneys of the bank contend that they are new contracts, and new debts contracted as of their respective dates. This view has been discussed elsewhere.

It is also said that the bank is not affected by this action of the company and stockholders. Look at the situation of the parties. Mr. Mowry, the President of the bank, was a director in the company, and Mr. Gibbon, the endorser of the notes, sat at both boards. Messrs. Mowry and Gibbon were both present at the passage of the resolution of 25th June, 1877. It is well known as the usage of banks to intrust ordinary renewals to the president, and here the president and a director sat on the company board. The knowledge of Mowry was official, for it related to the business of the bank, and the bank is bound by the legal effect of his knowledge. The legal effect of the sale was, that although the officers of the company might renew bills payable, in the sense of extending an old debt, they could not renew them in the sense of creating a new debt. Morse, Banks, 74.

The main question here under consideration, arose in Parrott v. Colby, 6 Hun, 55, and it was held that the acceptance of a note did not merge or extinguish the original indebtedness, but only operated to extend the time of payment, and that as plaintiff had not brought his action within one year from the time the original debt became due, the defendant was not liable: and also that the personal liability of a stockholder in such cases cannot be renewed or extended by any renewal or extension of the indebtedness, which the creditor may make with the corporation. This decision, which was well consid*ered and well reasoned, was affirmed on opinion below by the Court of Appeals, 71 N. Y., 597. The same doctrines are affirmed by the same Court of Appeals, in the case of the Jagger Iron Company v. Walker, 76 N. Y., 521, with additional force of reasoning. A certified copy of the decision in this case was produced. The reasoning in these cases impresses me as sound and incontrovertible, and I am of opinion that the law of South Carolina is in accord with them.

My conclusion is that judgment should be for defendant stockholders.

The case came up for trial on exceptions to this report, and in April, 1881, his Honor filed the following decree:

The Master, in his report, says:

"The main question that underlies this whole case is, whether the notes sued upon or the original debt for which they were given, is the indebtedness for which the shareholder is responsible. The suing creditor claims that the last note sued on constitutes, in each case, the debt of the company, and that suit was brought within one year after it became due. Defendants claim that the maturity of the first note in each case was the time the debt became due, and that suit was not brought within one year from such maturity in any of the cases. In all of the cases notes have been renewed, and brought down to time of the suit; as one note matured, another was given in place of it, paying only the interest." These extracts from the full and elaborate report of the Master, present the "main question" in the case.

Though the right of a creditor of the Wando Mining and Manufacturing Company to resort to a shareholder for payment of the Company's debt, may not, in strictness, be called a statutory right, still, it is certain, that outside of the statute no such right exists. The Act of Assembly, then, must be our guide in declaring the remedy to be pursued, the circumstances under which the remedy can be enforced, and its extent.

It is needless to rehearse the manifold rules for the construction of statutes, through the application of which the meaning of the Legislature is to be ascertained. There are no better *rules than that words shall receive the meaning they have in common use, and that what is plainly expressed needs no interpretation. Our first step is an examination of the act, and to understand what a creditor would learn from its reading. He would read, that a shareholder was liable for all the debts contracted by the company, to the extent of the par value of his shares, with the condition that the debt was to be paid within one year from the time of contracting it; and that suit must be brought within one year from the time after the debt became due. But he would find no explanation of what is meant by the words, "contracting a debt."

The meaning of these words may, in some degree, be ascertained from the transaction itself, or, rather, from the character of the instruments used in the transaction. These are promissory notes, which, by the indorsement of the payees, may be converted into bills of exchange. They are negotiable papers in the fullest sense. In a word, they are complete contracts in and of themselves. There is no need for the expression of any consideration in them. Though the words, "value received," may be found in them, and it might be necessary, as descriptive of the note, to use the words in a declaration (before the Code), no consideration need be expressed in the note, nor proved in suit upon it. The character of the instrument implies consideration received. It is clear, that any purchaser of a note, before maturity, has the right to require payment, without inquiry into the consideration. Surely, in assumpsit, the indorser or bearer could recover upon the instrument alone, without reference for proof to aught but the note; and, even in debt, between the payee and maker, no consideration must be stated in the declaration.

Thus: supposing the case to be one of renewal only, one complete contract is given up for another, though of the same character; and, if it be asked, as a fact, what is the consideration? it may be answered, the surrender of one note is a good consideration for the giving up of the other. Any disadvantage to one party, or advantage to the other, is sufficient as a consideration. Upon the note surrendered, no action can ever be maintained. It has done its duty, and is gone forever. *A note taken up by the maker, though not paid, can never afterwards be negotiated. It is functus officio. Beck v. Robley, 1 H. Black. 89.

Does it not, then, lie upon the party alleging that which is called a renewal or a continuation of the first contract, to show that the new note or contract, complete in itself by law, is, in fact, by the act of the parties dependent upon some former contract, and must take effect in connection with it?

A very material inquiry is, what was the intent of the parties in the renewals made, or in the giving of the new notes? Upon this subject we have the testimony of Mr. Inglesby. As stated by the Master, he "in his testimony affirms and insists that the new notes were given and accepted in payment." Under the circumstances of the case, however, the Master thinks this express agreement is not sufficiently proved; and in the absence of those who also probably knew the facts, but were not produced as witnesses, declines to regard the intent established. If the money had been actually paid when the new notes were given, and immediately thereafter lent to the payees upon the new notes this would certainly be a new loan. What further would be required in this transaction to complete a loan? the payment of the discount.

According to the testimony the interest was paid. What was then the contract between the parties regarded only as a renewal? The debtor stipulated beforehand, or an agreement to the effect existed, that the money was again to be lent to him, or that he was to give a new note for the old note upon payment of the premium, or discount. Less than this, the parties could not do to accomplish even an ordinary renewal. Thus the acts necessary to constitute a new debt are the same as those required for a renewal. What, then, constitutes the difference between a renewal and a new loan? Only the intent of the parties. There can be no question as to the intent of the attorney for the creditors; and it is not difficult to believe that the company would be willing for the use of the money to regard the transaction in the character of new loan or contract.

It appears from the testimony and the report of the Master *that eminent counsel had for others loaned large sums of money to the company, and were undoubtedly anxious about the security of the funds. Can it be for a moment supposed with the charter before them, showing the necessity of the debt being contracted within the year to bind the stockholder, that the necessary precautions to place the transaction in the character of a new debt would be omitted.

It is manifest from the testimony of one of the firm, that he regarded no transaction had occurred which would impair the stockholders' liability; and numerous transactions called settlements, payments, or renewals, had been effected through him. Without giving to any opinion of the attorney the force of a contract between the creditor and debtor, it is certain that on one side, that of the creditor, there was no idea that the transaction was a mere substitute or renewal.

The entries upon the notes surrendered often declare settlement, interest paid, and new note given for principal. These entries were open and known to all parties, and were contemporaneous with the new notes given. One of the most important facts disclosed by such entries is the manner in which the settlements were made. The old note is declared to be settled by the amount being included or embodied in the new note. The old security is declared to be settled (extinguished), and a new note given for the amount.

Can there be a more distinct declaration of the end of one contract and the beginning of a new, or of what the intent of the parties was? The correct view of extinguishment or payment depends upon the agreement of the parties. Even the parting with an old note by the creditor and the acceptance of a new, or the delivery of a note if negotiable without indorsement, may, in the absence of other proof, furnish a presumption of the intention of the parties. But adding the testimony of witnesses, the entries made and the conduct of the parties, the evidence preponderates of the intent of the parties in favor of a new contract, and the extinguishment of the former, which in substance is payment.

Upon acceptance of the charter, the shareholders were bound by all its provisions. We look therein in vain for any power *vesting in the shareholders the right to assent to or dissent from the contracting of debts by the company. The shareholders are in no way required to be parties to the contracts or debts. The act, too, is wholly silent as to the mode of contracting the debt or when it must be contracted to render the shareholders liable. Nor is anything said about a debt continued or renewed. "Debt contracted" are the words of the act and not when was the debt incurred or commenced. The reasonable meaning of the act attaching liability to the shareholder seems to be completed when a contract is made by the company binding it for the payment of a debt.

It is ordered, adjudged and decreed—That so much of the report of the Master as determines that the shareholders of the stock in the Wando Mining and Manufacturing Company are not liable for the par value of their shares to the plaintiff on the ground that the debt was not contracted within the time required by the charter, be reversed, and that the plaintiff recover against the shareholders or stockholders the debt for which suit is brought, as provided by the charter, and have leave to enter or docket judgment accordingly. Also ordered—That the exceptions of the different parties to the Master's report, except as sustained in the decree, be overruled, and that said report, in all its parts, except as reversed in this decree, be confirmed, and its findings of fact and conclusions of law made the judgment of the Court. Ordered—That plaintiff be allowed costs.

The defendants appealed upon the following exceptions:

1. Because his Honor erred in ruling, that the debts set up in this case were incurred within the period required by the charter of the Company, in order to fix the liability of the shareholders.

2. Because his Honor erred in overruling the finding of the Master, as matter of fact, that the notes in question were renewals of other notes running over a period of more than two years, and that his Honor erred in not holding, with the Master, as conclusion of law, that each of such renewals was simply a renewal of the evidence of the debt, and not the creation of a new debt.

*3. Because his Honor erred in overruling so much of the Master's report as finds, that by the term, "debt," used in the statute, for which the shareholder may be made responsible, is meant, the original debt contracted by the Company, the subsequent renewals operating as the repetition of the evidence of the debt.

4. Because no one of the notes sued upon comes within the terms of the charter, by which the individual liability of the stockholder is created, not being a debt contracted by the Company, which is to be paid within one year from the time the debt was contracted; and, because none of the suits, in evidence, was brought within one year after the debt became due. And his Honor erred in not so ruling.

5. Because, in no event, can the shareholders be made liable for any contract made by the President of the Company after the corporation had disposed of its lands, factory, and machinery, and had ceased to do business, especially to persons who had notice of this; and that his Honor erred in omitting so to rule.

6. Because, in so far as the charter imposes a liability upon shareholders in the corporation, it is in derogation of the common law, and must be strictly construed.

7. Because the decree of his Honor creates a liability upon persons, for debts contracted by the Company, long anterior to the transfer of shares to them, for which debts, neither they nor the Company, during their connection therewith, received any consideration.

8. Because the decree finds as matter of fact, and holds, as conclusion of law, that the transfer of stock, held as collateral security, constituted such transferees stockholders in the Company, individually liable under its charter.

9. That the Master, having found as matter of fact, that the notes sued by the plaintiff were renewals of other notes, he should also have found that they were usurious. And, in no event could the plaintiff be entitled to interest and costs; and the said notes were not within the scope of the powers of the officers of the corporation, and not chargeable upon the stockholders. And, that his Honor, the presiding Judge, should have so ruled.

*10. That his Honor, the presiding Judge, was in error in holding, that a note, payable within twelve months after date, or, within one year after date, is a debt creating an obligation, for which, under the charter, a stockholder is individually liable.

11. Because the testimony shows, that the notes in question, being renewals of previous notes, and could be traced to the original debt with entire accuracy. That many of the notes were either originally, or during their currency, were payable at a period longer than one year after date.

That these matters of fact should have been found by his Honor, and he should, thereupon have found his conclusion of law, that no such note could be converted by renewal into an obligation of which a stockholder would be held individually liable.

Messrs. A. D. Cohn, Buist & Buist, J. N. Nathans, J. & J. Hamphill, McCrady & Son, Simonton & Barker, for appellants.

Messrs. Hayne & Ficken, contra.

Mr. James Conner, same side.

First. Whether one security operates as payment and satisfaction of another is always a question of intention. The intention is the controlling element, and this may be shown by facts and circumstances as well as by positive proof. 2 Dan. Neg. Instr., §§ 1221, 1259, 1260; 2 Spears, 436; 5 Rich., Eq. 166; 3 S. C. 109; 11 S. C. 527; 13 S. C. 253; 15 S. C. 72, 518, 613.

Second. Each of the notes sued upon was intended to be, and was actually accepted in payment of the note which preceded it. The intention was payment or satisfaction, and not substitution. Hence each of the notes sued upon represents a "debt contracted" by the Company, at the time when it was given and accepted in place of the preceding note. The Company and the creditors intended to create a new liability, which might be enforced, irrespective of the time when the "original indebtedness" was contracted.

*The notes in question may be divided into two classes: 1st. The five notes sued upon by the Union Bank. 2d. The thirty-eight notes sued upon by the other creditors.

(a) As to the Notes of the Union Bank: The stockholders are liable for at least three of these, even if the theory insisted on by appellants be correct, that they are "renewals," pure and simple, of loans or debts "originally contracted," at dates anterior to the dates when these particular notes were discounted, for the so-called "original indebtedness" was "contracted," and "became due" less than one year before suit was brought for the collection of the notes sued upon. But respondents maintain that the stockholders are liable for all of the notes held by the Bank, on the ground that a new loan or debt was contracted when each of said notes was discounted. The correct doctrine being that when a "renewal note," as it is called, is discounted, and the drawer is credited with the net proceeds (as was done by the Bank here) and debited with the amount of the old note, which is cancelled and given up to him, a new loan is created, and the debt on the old note is completely extinguished. Thomp. Liab. Stock, §§ 101, 298; Ang. & Am. Corp., § 620; 10 Serg. & R., 63; 15 Serg. & R., 163; 4 J. J., Marsh, 1; 1 McC., 358; 1 Strobb., 467.

(b) As to the Notes Included in the Second Class: The testimony shows that these notes were intended to be, and were actually accepted in payment or satisfaction of the preceding notes for which they were exchanged; and such being the intention of the parties, each new note operated as payment or satisfaction of the preceding note and the debt evidenced by the former note was thereby as completely extinguished and discharged as if it had been paid in money.

Third. The proposition advanced by the appellants that "no contract or agreement of the Directors of the Company by which the stockholders' several liability is affected can bind them without their consent" is wholly untenable. The consent of the stockholders to a contract or agreement of the Directors on behalf of the Company is not necessary. The stockholders are bound in their individual capacity for all debts contracted by the Company which are in their nature debts for which *they are liable under the charter. Their liability arises from the nature of the contract. The moment the Company contracts a debt of the sort for which the stockholders are severally liable, the creditor of the Company becomes eo instanti a creditor of the stockholders. The debt of the company becomes their debt at the instant of its creation. The contract made by the stockholder was entered into when he became a stockholder. His becoming a stockholder was a voluntary act. His liability arose from that act. It is a mistake to call it a statute liability. 1 Comst. 47; 2 Otto, 509; 13 S. C. 220.

Fourth. Appellant's 5th and 9th exceptions affect only the notes held by the Union Bank. The stockholders contend that they are not liable for these notes, first, because they were contracted by the President of the Company "after the corporation had disposed of its lands, factory and machinery, and had ceased to do business;" and secondly, because the notes were "usurious." Neither defence, we submit, is tenable in this action.

(1) The President and Directors had express authority under the By-Laws of the Company "to manage its affairs and exercise the power and franchises of the Company as they might deem advisable, provided their action in the premises be not inconsistent with the Charter." This authority was unrevoked when the notes in question were discounted by the Bank. The resolution of June 25th, 1877, merely "authorized" the President and Directors to accept an offer of $75,000 for the factory, etc.; but it was left to the Board to wind up the Company's business and settle its affairs "in such manner as they might deem advisable."

(2) The money borrowed from the Bank was honestly applied by the President and Directors to the payment of overdue liabilities of the Company, and by such retention and enjoyment of the proceeds of the notes, the Company has rendered the act of the President in borrowing the money, as binding as if he had been expressly authorized to discount the notes. It will be presumed that he rightfully exercised the power he assumed to exercise, and the Company and the stockholders are estopped from denying it. 101 U. S. 351, 181.

for inquiry, is the *nature of the debts, upon which the judgments are founded—do they fall within the class of debts for which the stockholders are individually liable under the charter? There can be but one answer to this question, for the notes are all payable "sixty days after date," and suits for their collection were brought against the company within three months after they became due. We submit that the stockholders as well as the Company are estopped by the judgments already recovered against the Company from averring, in this action, that the notes upon which said judgments have been recovered are either "usurious," or that they were "not within the scope of the powers of the officers of the Company," for the judgments against the Company bind the stockholders, and were conclusive as well of the amount due upon the notes, as of their validity. Freem. Judg. § 177; Thomp. Liab. Stock. § 329; 8 Abb. Pr. R. 52; 91 U. S. 56.

May 22, 1882. The opinion of the Court was delivered by

Mr. Justice WALLACE. The exceptions to the circuit decree are numerous. To consider them in detail would unnecessarily extend this opinion. The issues made by the pleadings depend upon a few decisive questions, in the discussion of which all the material points made in the exceptions will be embraced.

The Wando Mining and Manufacturing Company accepted a charter, and organized and proceeded to do business under it which contained the following provision, to wit:

"Section 4. That every shareholder of said company shall be individually liable for the debts contracted during the time he or she shall be a shareholder in said company to the extent of the par value of his or her shares in the same: provided, that no person holding stock as an executor, administrator, guardian or trustee, and no person holding such stock as collateral security shall be personally subject to any liability as stockholder of such company, but the person pledging such stock shall be considered as holding the same, and shall be liable as a stockholder accordingly, and the estate and funds in the hands of such executor, guardian or trustee shall be liable in like manner, and to the same extent as the testator or intestate or ward or person interested in such trust fund would have been, if he had been living and competent to act and hold the said stock in his own name. And provided further, that no stockholder shall be personally liable for the payment of any debt contracted by the said company, which is not to be paid within one year from the time the debt is contracted, nor unless a suit for the collection of such debt shall be brought against said company within one year after the debt shall become due, and no suits shall be brought against any stockholder in said company for any debt so contracted unless the same shall be commenced within two years from the time he shall have ceased to be a stockholder in said company, nor until an execution against the company shall have been returned unsatisfied in whole or in part."

After a prosperous business career of several years, the company became embarrassed, and on June 25, 1877, by a unanimous vote of the stockholders passed the following resolution, to wit:

"Resolved, That the President and directors of the company be authorized to sell the mines and works on Ashley River, the material now on hand and the good will of the business of the present company to a new company that may be formed to carry on the business, for the sum of $75,000, the new company assuming through its officers the expense of collecting in the assets of the old company."

The sale contemplated by this resolution was effected on the same day and upon the terms set out in the resolution. Mr. George E. Gibbon, the President of the old company, and Mr. Francis B. Hacker, its Secretary and Treasurer, being immediately elected President, Secretary and Treasurer of the new company respectively. The amount realized from the sale was applied to the reduction of the indebtedness of the company. Subsequently, by authority of the shareholders, the Board of Directors sold the company's wharf. Out of all its available assets, the company was not able to pay its debts, and suits were brought against it by its creditors, and judgments obtained which in the aggregate amount to a large sum. Executions upon these judgments having been returned unsatisfied, this *action is brought to establish the individual liability of the stockholders upon the unsatisfied demands against the company. The issues arise mainly under the section of the charter above quoted, the creditors claiming that suits were brought upon their demands within one year from the maturity of the debts, and that their debts were contracted to be paid within one year from the time they were made, and that therefore the individual stockholders became liable upon the return of the executions unsatisfied. All of this is denied by the defendants.

Before proceeding to the examination of this controversy, it will be convenient to consider the issue made upon the notes held by the Union Bank, and upon which judgments have been obtained against the company. There can be no doubt of the rights of the stockholders in this action to set up any available defense that goes to the question of their liability upon the note upon which judgment has been obtained against the company. The defendants in this action were not as individuals parties to the action in which judgment was recovered. That suit was against the corporation which in law is a distinct person from the individual members which compose it. The ground of the liability of the company may not prevail against the stockholders. For it is only when a judgment is obtained against the company upon debts of a certain description, and upon which suits have been brought within a specified time, that the stockholders are liable. In this action it is therefore necessary to establish that the conditions of the liability of the stockholders exist. To do this necessarily involves an inquiry in this action into the grounds of the stockholders' liability. Of course, then, it is competent for these defendants to interpose any defence that goes to the question of their liability upon the notes upon which the judgments were obtained. In Abbotts' Digest of the Law of Corporations, 2 vol., p. 299, pp. 22, 23, the following language occurs: "In New York the liability of the individual members of a joint stock company, after judgment and execution against the company unsatisfied is that of partners, and consists in the original demand against the company, not in the judgment against it. Therefore a

Now as to the notes held by the plaintiff in this action, the defendants allege that they are not liable thereon, because they were made by Geo. E. Gibbon and F. B. Hacker, after the company had ceased to do business, and Gibbon and Hacker had no longer authority to bind them by new obligations. The notes referred to were drawn by Gibbon and Hacker as President and Secretary and Treasurer of the Wando Mining and Manufacturing Company, at sixty days, and dated in February and March, 1878, and endorsed by Gibbon to the bank. The money raised upon them was applied to past due notes of the company. It is conceded in the argument that the President of the company, as such, was authorized to contract debts for the company, and that his contracts would bind the stockholders if the debts were within the description of such as could be set up against them. This power manifestly had its source in his relation as agent ex-officio to the company, and of course was limited by the scope of his agency. He was agent to carry out the objects of the company. These objects were the manufacture and sale of fertilizers. Any transaction of his in relation to these objects or that was necessary or incidental in their prosecution was within the scope of his agency and binding upon the company.

In June, 1877, many months before the notes now held by plaintiff were drawn, the company had sold all of its property that was used in the manufacture of fertilizers, and thus had deprived itself of the present means of carrying on its former business; had sold the good will of the business to another company, and thus bound itself in law not to further continue the business; had appointed the new company its agents to collect its assets. Thus there was no longer any business for the officers to conduct. By the force of these transactions, the reason and foundation of official agency was dissolved. With the disappearance of the reason upon which alone it rested, the power of agency was destroyed. As if in recognition of this result these same officers assumed, before the execution of the *notes under consideration, the same official relations to the new company, that they had sustained to the old, with the same powers of agency, and for the same reasons, and in reference to the same subject matter, and to conduct the same business.

By the force of these facts the former president and secretary of the company were deprived of all power to create new obligations as between the stockholders and all persons having notice of the facts. The outstanding indebtedness was a matter for the attention of the company, its former officers being deprived of such means as the company had for its payment by the withdrawal of the assets from their hands. Mr. Mowry was president of the Union Bank, and a director of the Wando Mining and Manufacturing Company, during all the time of the occurrences which had the effect to deprive the president and secretary of the company of all powers of agency, and was present at the meetings of the company at which they took place, and was president of the bank at the times when these notes were discounted. His knowledge was therefore official, and the bank is bound by the legal effect of his knowledge. These notes of the plaintiff therefore are not obligations upon the individual shareholders of the Wando Mining and Manufacturing Company.

The next question relates to notes that were made by agents of the company before the sale of its property. Actions have been brought upon all the notes against the company, and judgments obtained. It is conceded that all these notes can be and have been traced back through successive notes to their original debt, and that no action has been brought upon any such original debt within one year, after such debt became due. This statement discloses the grounds of controversy between the parties. The suing creditors of the company claim that the notes upon which they have obtained judgments constitute in each case the debt of the company, the former notes in each case having been paid successively by subsequent notes, and that therefore each new note represented a new debt; and that the notes sued upon were new debts that were to be paid within a year, and were sued upon within a year after maturity. Defendants claim that the maturity of the first notes given for *the original consideration was the time the debt, for which they were liable, became due; and that suit was not brought within one year from maturity on any of those notes; that when one note was taken up and another given, it was not payment, but renewal only; that the debt thus having longer than a year to run the conditions of personal liability of stockholders do not exist.

Under the common law no individual liability attached to members of a corporation for the payment of its debts. The liability of the shareholders of this company is created by the charter, and only exists upon the conditions therein stated. If a person who proposed to become a creditor of the company desired to increase the safety of his debt by securing the personal liability of the shareholders, he could do so by making a contract that his debt should be paid within a year. Upon such a debt the shareholders were personally liable. If not paid within the year then to preserve his right to resort to the stockholders, he must bring his action within a year from the maturity of his demand.

Are the suing creditors within these requirements? It appears that the notes they are now seeking to set up were given for previously existing notes, and they for others that existed before them, the original debt in each instance being more than two years old before suit brought, no suit being brought within a year from the maturity of the original debt. Whether the suing creditors, then, are within the requirements of the charter depends upon the question whether these last notes were payments of the previous notes or not. A debt is a legal obligation to pay money. This contract can only be discharged by the payment of money, or by a new contract in relation to the same subject matter by which it is agreed that something else than money will be given and received in discharge of the contract. See Costello v. Cave, 2 Hill, 528 [27 Am. Dec. 404]; Chastain v. Johnson, 2 Bail. 574; Bryce v. Bowers, 11 Rich. Eq. 47. The burden of proving this new contract is upon him who affirms it. Johnson v. Clarke, 15 S. C. 72. It is not proved by the mere fact that one note is given for another. There must be additional proof of an agreement between the parties *that one note shall be given and accepted in satisfaction of the other.

The only direct testimony upon that point in this case is that given by Mr. Inglesby, who testifies that his understanding was that the new notes were received in payment of the old. But other parties to these transactions do not testify to such an understanding upon their part, and the writing upon the notes that were taken up and preserved by the company does not indicate that such was the understanding of the officers of the company. We on the whole agree with the Master, before whom the testimony was taken, that "The proof, therefore, of an express special agreement is not sufficient. Mr. Inglesby's testimony is without doubt an honest and strong expression of his understanding in relation to the renewals and their legal effect, but is not such evidence as is required to establish an express contract between all the parties concerned."

Suppose for the sake of the argument that there had been an express agreement between the officers of the company and its creditors that each new note should be given and accepted in full satisfaction and payment of the preceding note. The charter provides that the shareholders shall not be liable upon a debt of the company unless it is contracted to be paid within a year, and if not paid, sued within a year from maturity. Upon the supposition that a new note is accepted as payment of the old at maturity, and at the maturity of the second note another is received in payment of it, and so on indefinitely, would each new note create a new obligation against the company, and binding upon the shareholders under the charter?

There is no actual, only technical payment. Only an agreement between the officers of the company and its creditors that something shall be considered payment, which as matter of fact is not payment. The intent of the statute manifestly is to limit the liability of stockholders to debts, to be paid within a year. By this supposed understanding between the creditors and officers of the company, it is attempted to extend the liability of shareholders for an indefinite length of time. A construction of a statute that thus plainly defeats its intent cannot be sound.

*Nor would the fact that this was done by the agents of the company give it any binding force against the stockholders. For that they are not authorized as agents of the shareholders to do that is plain from the charter, of which all persons dealing with them as agents must take notice. We must therefore conclude that the debts of the company which it is sought to establish against the shareholders are not obligations upon which they are liable.

This conclusion renders the consideration of the special defences of particular shareholders unnecessary. The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed, and that the complaint be dismissed.

AGNEW v. ADAMS.

[1. Homestead ⚡7.]

As against debts contracted prior to the Constitution of 1868, an assignment of homestead is a nullity.

[4. Homestead ⚡203.]

Where executions having no lien upon a homestead are levied upon a tract of land, of which the homestead is a part, and the whole is sold, the homestead will pass under such sale, if there then be in the Sheriff's office, an execution having lien upon such homestead, although it was not levied, was unknown to the purchaser, and no special orders had been given by its owner for its enforcement, McGowan, A. Before Pressley, J., Richland, July, 1881.

It is agreed that the testimony given on the former trial, as stated in the brief for the Supreme Court, subject to the objections and exceptions therein taken, shall be the evidence on the new trial. Plaintiff to be at liberty to introduce the records in the cases in which judgments obtained against defendant were introduced on the former trial, and to be at liberty to offer in evidence record in case D. Crawford & Sons, John Agnew, Sr., & Son, and John Agnew, Jr., plaintiffs v. Robert Adams, Amie A. Weston, James P. Adams, and Jesse E. Dent, Sheriff. Defendants to have leave to object to it. The defendant to have permission to produce the original return and assignment of homestead of the appraisers referred to as lost at f. 34, the execution of which is admitted. No further oral testimony to be introduced.

Accordingly the evidence at the former trial was introduced at this. The plaintiff then offered in evidence under the aforesaid agreement between counsel from the Common Pleas of Richland County, the record in the case of D. Crawford & Sons, John Agnew & Son, and John Agnew, Jr., plaintiffs v. Robert Adams, Amie A. Weston, James P. Adams and Jesse E. Dent, Sheriff of Richland County, defendants, stating to the Court that the said record would show that the res litigata, as well as the res judicata, the point in issue as well as the point decided therein, was the validity of the judgment of Amie A. Weston v. Robert Adams, and that it was therein decided, ordered, adjudged and decreed that the said judgment was valid, the same being done in a proper suit between proper parties, brought for the express purpose of testing its existence and validity and binding upon Robert Adams. The defendants' attorneys objected on divers grounds. His honor ruled this record inadmissible, to which ruling plaintiff duly excepted.

The plaintiff next introduced in evidence the record in the case of F. W. McMaster,

Administrator v. John P. Adams *and Robert Adams. The cause of action therein arose prior to the adoption of the Constitution of 1868, being a bond for the payment of money, dated December 1, 1853, judgment regularly obtained in open court, dated May 11, 1874, for $4727.25, the penalty of the bond being for $4700 and $27.25 being the costs and disbursements. This was the only judgment of this plaintiff against Robert Adams. The execution therein was of active energy at the time of the sale by the sheriff, and the levy thereunder on the lands in dispute in this suit was regularly made and endorsed thereon before or about the time the homestead was assigned, which levy was never renewed. Defendant's attorneys objected to this judgment and executions being received in evidence: Because, by agreement of counsel, none other than the judgments and executions offered and received on the former trial were to be offered in this, and that the record showed this was altogether a different case. His Honor overruled this objection unless the defendant could show another judgment of McMaster v. Robert Adams.

The defendant introduced in evidence the original assignment, of which a copy is contained in his answer, which had never had any plan annexed to it, so far as could be ascertained by inspection.

The presiding Judge charged the jury that, under the decision of the Supreme Court, the judgments of James P. Adams and Amie A. Weston, and the executions based thereon did not bind the homestead, and, therefore, as there was no valid sale of the land under them, were out of the case and not to be considered by the jury; to which plaintiff duly excepted. He also charged the jury that: "A question is raised as to the assignment not having been recorded according to law. I will now give you and all parties a chance to decide it flatly. A marriage settlement is declared by law to be totally void unless recorded within a certain time; yet the Courts have decided that it is good between the parties though not recorded. The Courts, in other words, have decided that recording is not necessary between the parties, provided they have actual notice. I charge you that this assignment did not *lose its validity by reason of any defect in the recording; and I further charge you that a defect in the recording, not attributable to the debtor, would not invalidate it. I go further and charge you that, where the parties to a proceeding in Court do everything which is required of them, no neglect by a public officer can deprive them of their legal rights. In this case the homestead was assigned after a levy and advertisement under these executions, and Colonel Wallace, according to the testimony, forbade the sale of the homestead. I charge you that this was actual notice. I also charge you that if necessary, the assignment has been sufficiently recorded." To which plaintiff then and there excepted.

His Honor refused to charge the jury, as requested by plaintiff, "That no matter what may have been the relative rank of F. W. McMaster, administrator, judgment and execution, or what may be the proper distribution of the proceeds of the sale or the rights between F. W. McMaster, administrator, and the plaintiff-purchaser, the plaintiff as purchaser took title from the Sheriff, valid against the defendant judgment debtor, and must recover against the judgment debtor if the jury find as a fact that the cause of action in McMaster's case arose prior to the Constitution of 1868 and the executions and levies were as stated in the brief for the Supreme Court." He however charged that the preceding request would be "allowed if McMaster had not abandoned his claim or waived his right, and if the Sheriff proceeded under his execution." To which charge and refusal the plaintiff duly excepted.

His Honor refused to charge the jury, as requested by plaintiff: "That if the Sheriff had in his office, at the time of sale, the F. W. McMaster, administrator, judgment and execution, and the same constituted a lien on the defendant's homestead, the sale will be referred to them and the plaintiff be entitled to the land in controversy under the Sheriff's deed." He however charged that the preceding request would be allowed unless the jury believed, from the circumstances, that McMaster had abandoned his claim and waived his right. To which charge and refusal plaintiff duly excepted.

*His Honor charged the jury "that if McMaster gave orders not to sell, or in any manner abandon his claim under his judgment after the homestead was assigned, and if the jury believed that, after said claim had been withdrawn, the sale was made, as testified by sheriff, only under the judgments of Mrs. Weston and J. P. Adams, then such sale would not give the purchaser a valid title to the homestead. In such case the sale could not be referred to the judgment of McMaster if his claim had been withdrawn or abandoned. That a creditor whose judgment was not a lien on homestead could not, by including it in a sale of land which was bound by his judgment, thereby sacrifice the rights of a creditor whose judgment was a lien on the homestead." To this plaintiff duly excepted.

His Honor charged the jury "that a senior judgment creditor affected by homestead assignment has no right to have a sale made except by co-operation or assent of the junior judgment creditor who has a lien on the homestead." To which plaintiff duly excepted.

Verdict was for defendant. Plaintiff moved for a new trial and that being refused, appeal to this Court on the exceptions above noted.

Messrs. Bachman & Youmans, for appellant.

Messrs. Bacon & Moore, contra.

May 30, 1882. The opinion of the Court was delivered by Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. This is a contest over a tract of land lying in Richland County, containing some 200 acres, claimed by the plaintiff appellant as a purchaser at sheriff's sale, and resisted by the defendant respondent on the ground of homestead.

It appears that in 1874 the real estate of respondent, situate in said county, embracing 902 acres, was levied upon by the Sheriff by virtue of sundry fi-fas then in his office. The respondent claimed a homestead, and the Sheriff caused to be assigned to him the 200 acres now in dispute. Upon the interposition of this claim of homestead the sale was postponed in fact, it seems that an injunction was obtained restraining the *sale. Some time after this, to wit, on February 10th, 1878, two of the judgment creditors assigned their judgments to John Agnew, Jr., who, claiming that these judgments were founded on debts contracted before the adoption of the Constitution of 1868, and therefore under a recent decision not subject to the Homestead provision therein, ordered the Sheriff to proceed to execute. The Sheriff thereupon readvertised and sold, the appellant being the purchaser at the bid of $225. At this sale the attorney of respondent gave notice of the assignment of homestead as above, and forbade the sale.

This action was then commenced by the appellant, to wit, on September 30, 1878. At the trial a verdict was rendered for the appellant, but upon appeal to this Court, the judgment was reversed and the case remanded. (15 S. C. 36.) This reversal was upon the ground that the Sheriff had no authority to sell the homestead under the two judgments by virtue of which he had acted, because as to the first, to wit, the Amie Weston judgment, it was a nullity, having been rendered by the Clerk of the Court after the Act of 1873; and as to the other, the James P. Adams judgment, the debt was contracted after the adoption of the Constitution of 1868—the Court holding that neither of these judgments had liens upon the land. The Court also held that there was no fatal defect in the assignment of the homestead; that the act had been substantially complied with, and as to the two judgments of appellant the assignment was sufficient.

Upon the second trial, from which this appeal comes, the same testimony was offered as upon the first, with the addition, on the part of the plaintiff, of the introduction of a judgment and fi-fa in favor of F. W. McMaster for $4,727.25, dated May 11, 1874. This judgment was junior to the judgments under which the Sheriff acted, but it was founded on a debt admitted to have been contracted before the homestead provisions. This judgment raises the important question involved in the appeal, to wit: Did it legalize the sale by the Sheriff of defendant's homestead? The appellant's attorney requested the Judge to charge that it did, "provided the jury found as a fact that the cause of action therein arose prior to the Con*stitution of 1868, and the executions and levies were as stated in the [former] brief for the Supreme Court." His Honor Judge Pressley charged as requested, "provided McMaster had not abandoned his claim, or waived his right, and had proceeded under his execution."

The request of appellant was no doubt founded upon Bull v. Rowe, 13 S. C. 360. In that case this Court held, after a full and exhaustive examination of the law of homestead in this State, that the Constitution of 1868 upon this subject must be read as if no part applied to debts contracted before its adoption; that a debtor could not claim a homestead as to such debts by virtue of such constitutional provision, or by any subsequent acts passed thereunder. Previous to Bull v. Rowe, it had been decided in this State that an assignment of homestead, where it had been returned for record, was invalid as to old debts. Choice v. Charles, 7 S. C. 171; Ryan v. Pettigrew, 7 S. C. 146. But Bull v. Rowe went still further, and held that the whole proceeding was void, and that no homestead as such per se could be allowed in such cases, because there was no constitutional provision or act (under the principle held in Gunn v. Barry, 15 Wall. 610 [21 L. Ed. 212]; Cochran v. Darcy, 5 S. C. 125; Ex parte Hewett, 5 S. C. 409), which exempted any species of property from levy and sale as to such debts—quoting from Thompson, § 230, as follows: "It is scarcely necessary to say as a general rule, that a dedication of homestead in whatever form, does not have the effect of withdrawing it from liability on account of any pre-existing debt, lien, conveyances, or charges which otherwise would have bound the land;" also § 29: "Every debt created by contract prior to the passage of any homestead or exemption law is privileged from the operation of such law. To this rule, as the writer understands it, the Court can now admit no exception."

In the case of Newton v. Summing, 59 Ga. 399, it is said: "Those whose claims outrank the constitution may stay out of the Ordinary's Court, and nothing there done will be in their way." Under this principle, there can be no such thing as a homestead per se assigned against a debt pre-existing the Constitution of 1868, by virtue of any constitutional provision or act of the General Assembly passed thereunder proprio vigore.

The next question is, was the land in dispute sold by the Sheriff under the McMaster judgment? Under Bull v. Rowe and the other cases cited, the assignment of the homestead in 1874 was a nullity as to McMaster's judgment, it being founded on a pre-existing debt. But the question now is, has that judgment been enforced, and was the land sold thereunder by the Sheriff at the sale in 1878? The land was advertised for sale in 1878 under but two executions—the Amie Weston and James P. Adams executions. The deed of the Sheriff recites the Amie Weston execution alone, but the advertisement recites them both. At the time of the levy and the sale, the McMaster execution was in the office of the Sheriff with active energy. Now, with these facts above considered could the sale be legally referred to the McMaster execution? Such was the decision in the cases of Gist v. McJunkin et al. 1 McM. 342; Mc-

Knight v. Gordon, 13 Rich. Eq. 246 [94 Am. Dec. 164], and Vance v. Red, 2 Speers, 90.

In McKnight v. Gordon Chancellor Inglis said for the Court: "But there were in the Sheriff's hands at the time of the levy and sale sundry other executions against the mortgagor. The Sheriff's official acts in the levy and sale, and the deed made in pursuance thereof will not be made void by his referring them to a power and authority which he has not, if they can be supported by any power and authority which he in fact has. To such actual power and authority the law will refer them," citing Gist v. McJunkin, supra. In Vance v. Red, supra, the property was sold under a fi-fa which in fact had no lien; yet the sale was referred to an unsatisfied fi-fa in the hands of the Sheriff, although "Wait orders" had been indorsed thereon.

So that, the law in our State seems to be, that where the Sheriff has in his office an unsatisfied fi-fa having lien, his sale of such property will be valid, although the levy and advertisement originate as matter of fact from a fi-fa having no such lien. In Vance v.

Red the property had been sold by the debtor before the fi-fa under which it was levied had been entered in the Sheriff's office, and therefore free from lien, yet the sale was referred to an older fi-fa which did have lien, although "Wait orders" had been indorsed on said older fi-fa (See Greenwood v. Naylor, 1 McM. 414, and Snipes v. Sheriff of Charleston, 1 Bay. 295.) This principle, however, was not denied by the Circuit Judge; he conceded it to be the law, but charged that it did not apply in this case. "If McMaster had waived his rights, or had not proceeded under his fi-fa," and he left it to the jury inferentially, if not directly to determine whether this was so. The real question then is, Did the Judge err in attaching these qualifications to the general principle?

There is no doubt as to the proposition that a party may waive almost any right. He may not only waive a right, but he may affirm a nullity. He may do this not only expressly by words, but by conduct. As was said by McGowan, A. J., in Bull v. Rowe, supra: "The doctrine of estoppel applies to constitutional as well as other rights, and to proceedings absolutely void as well as those merely voidable. So that the first qualification which the Judge attached to the general rule, as an abstract proposition, was not erroneous. As applied to this case, however, we think it needed some explanation. "If estoppel by conduct is relied on, it must appear that it induced action, the disavowal of which would be inequitable, and which, therefore, the party who holds out the inducements is estopped from disavowing." Bigelow on Estoppel, 480; Bull v. Rowe, supra. There is no estoppel without fault to the injury of another. Ibid. These qualifications, we think, might and should have been attached to the proposition charged by the Judge, that the principle contended for by appellant would be allowed "if McMaster had not abandoned his claim or waived his right," especially as this condition was super-added to the request, and there was no evidence in the case of an express waiver by McMaster of his rights.

But the Judge further charged, in effect, that even though McMaster had not abandoned his claim or waived his rights, yet the sale by the Sheriff could not be referred to his fi-fa unless it appeared that the Sheriff had proceeded under it. *This, we think, was error. The cases cited above hold that where there is a valid fi-fa in the office having lien upon the property, whether the party plaintiff or the Sheriff has actually proceeded under it or not, the sale may be referred to it and such sale will be valid. Vance v. Red, supra.

We see nothing in the agreement as to the admission of testimony which excludes the introduction of the McMaster judgment. Nor do we find any error in excluding the record in the cases of Crawford & Sons, John Agnew & Son, and John Agnew, Jr., against Robert Adams and others. This record was intended to show that as between the parties to the said record, the judgment of Amie Weston against Robert Adams was valid. In the former appeal in this case, this Court had decided expressly that the Amie Weston judgment, as applicable to this action was invalid, and that the plaintiff could found no right thereon. If the purpose of its introduction on the second trial was to ground a right to plaintiff in conflict with the former opinion of this Court, it was properly excluded. If it was to establish an abstract proposition in no way affecting the question, it was irrelevant, and its exclusion was not error.

We do not understand the pertinency of the third exception, as to the recording of the assignment of the homestead and the plot. In the former opinion it was understood that the assignment had been returned for record, and had been recorded, but that the plot, though left in the Clerk's office, had not been recorded. Upon these facts, the Court held the assignment valid, at least as to the debts then before the Court subject to homestead exemption. We understand that Judge Pressley's ruling went to the extent that where a debtor is entitled to a homestead, the recording of the assignment is not absolutely necessary, as between the parties, provided they have actual notice. This case does not depend upon the question whether the assignment of the homestead was in form and according to the terms of the act, but whether the debtor was entitled to a homestead—not whether it was set off regularly, but whether he had the right to have it set off at all. Such being the fact, we do not regard the question raised in this exception as properly in the case, and therefore we express no opinion in reference to it. We have already said in the former opinion that there was no objection to the homestead on the ground of the want of formality in the assignment, or the failure to record the plot.

It is the judgment of this Court, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed, on account of error in the charge of the Judge in reference to the McMaster judgment and fi-fa, and that the case be remanded for a new trial.

Mr. Justice McGOWAN, dissenting. I concur with the majority of the court in the opinion which has just been pronounced except as to so much of it as holds that the sale by the supposed authority of the executors of Amie A. Weston, assignee, and James P. Adams, which were incorporated in the homestead, must be referred to the execution of F. W. McMaster, which appears to have been recovered on a cause of action older than the constitution, and which happened to be in the Sheriff's office at the time of the sale; although the homestead had been assigned under that execution and no instructions had been given by McMaster, the plaintiff, to proceed under it against the homestead, and even its existence at the time of the sale as an execution which could reach the homestead was unknown both to the Sheriff and Agnew, the purchaser.

In October, 1870, there were in the Sheriff's office of Richland County, several executions against Robert Adams, viz.: T. P. Weston, Guardian v. Robert Adams, February 3, 1874; Glenn A. Kaminer v. Robert Adams, February 6, 1874; James P. Adams v. Robert Adams, February 6, 1874; F. W. McMaster v. Robert Adams, February 11, 1874; and several others of the same date. These executions were all levied upon the property of Robert Adams, who claimed homestead, and in January, 1875, the Sheriff issued his warrant, naming all the executions except that of Weston, which had been assigned to Amie A. Weston, to lay off homestead for the defendant Adams, which was done by commissioners appointed for that purpose. At that time none of the creditors

*objected to homestead, but after the decision of this court declaring that the provisions of the constitution and laws which purported to allow homestead as to debts older than the constitution were void, it was claimed that two judgments against Robert Adams had been rendered on such contracts and as against them the assignment of homestead could not stand. These were the judgments of Amie A. Weston, assignee, and James P. Adams, which were purchased by John Agnew, Sr., who had them specially levied upon the homestead, and the advertisement of the Sheriff declared that it would be sold under these executions alone. Notwithstanding objection by Adams, the Sheriff sold according to his notice. The plaintiff Agnew, became the purchaser, took Sheriff's deed reciting that the sale was made under the execution of Amie A. Weston, assignee, and brought this action against Robert Adams for the homestead. He recovered a verdict, but upon appeal to this court it was set aside and a new trial granted on the ground that as to homestead the executions of Weston and Adams, under which it was sold, were inoperative and conferred no authority upon the Sheriff to sell, and therefore no title was conveyed to the purchaser.

At the new trial ordered it was discovered that among the cases under which the homestead was assigned and which were lying dormant in the Sheriff's office, there was one, that of F. W. McMaster as administrator, which had been recovered upon a cause of action older than the constitution, and it was then for the first time urged that although the deed from the Sheriff under the executions of Weston and Adams, by authority of which the homestead had been sold, were void for the reason that the Sheriff had no right to sell the homestead under these executions, yet that it must be held valid by referring the sale to McMaster's execution, although the plaintiff McMaster had not directed it to be levied upon the homestead, and as a matter of fact was not so levied, or at the time of sale even known to exist as an execution which could reach the homestead.

The Circuit Judge charged the jury, "That if McMaster gave orders not to sell or in any manner abandoned his action *under his judgment after the homestead was assigned, and if the jury believed that after said claim had been withdrawn, the sale was made as testified by the Sheriff, only under the judgments of Miss Weston and J. P. Adams, then such sale would not give the purchaser a valid title to the homestead. In such case the sale would not be referred to the judgment of McMaster, if his claim had been withdrawn or abandoned. That a creditor whose judgment was not a lien on the homestead, could not by including it in a sale of land which was bound by his judgment thereby sacrifice the rights of a creditor whose judgment was a lien on the homestead," etc. Under this charge the jury found for the defendant and the question is whether it was error. It is undoubtedly true that the Sheriff could derive no authority to levy and sell from executions which were either satisfied in fact, or as to the homestead were inoperative. Hunter v. Stevenson, 1 Hill. 415; Thrower v. Vaughan, 1 Rich. 18; Mouchat v. Brown, 3 Rich. 117.

As was said by Judge Butler in the case of Thrower v. Vaughan, "The doctrine as recognized in the case of Hunter v. Stevenson, seems to be this, that every execution unsatisfied on the face of it is prima facie authority to sell, but this, as Mr. Justice O'Neill remarks, may be rebutted by the defendant. He may show that before the sale the execution was paid and thereby the Sheriff's authority to sell was ended. Satisfaction in fact must be regarded as the termination of the authority of a Sheriff to act under legal process, so far as he may have acquired a right under it to convey title to another. No conveyance can be good which rests upon that which is null and void." Mr. Freeman also on the same subject says, "A void judgment is in legal effect no judgment. By it no rights are divested. From it no rights are obtained. Being worthless itself, all proceedings based upon it are equally worthless. It neither binds nor bars any one." It is plain therefore that, as decided in the former judgment in this case, the executions of Mrs. Weston and J. P. Adams being entirely inoperative as to the homestead, could give no authority to the Sheriff to levy and sell it to another. "No conveyance can be good which rests upon that which is null and void."

*But it is urged for the plaintiff that the sale, void under the inoperative executions, should as a matter of law be referred to the McMaster execution, which seems to have been reached upon a cause of action antedating the constitution, and at the time of the sale was lying in the Sheriff's office. It is true there is a class of cases in our reports which holds that the official sale of a sheriff under process which does not give him the power to sell, may, under certain circumstances, be sustained by referring it to any other authority in his office at the time, under which he might have proceeded. It does not seem to me, however, that the circumstances here bring this case necessarily within the rule. The doctrine has arisen out of the policy to sustain sheriff's sales. It proceeds on presumptions contrary to the fact, and in my judgment should not be extended beyond what is absolutely required by the decided cases.

It is not necessary to cite the cases upon the subject, commencing with that of Gist v. McJunkin, 1 McM. 349. It will be found upon examination that in all the cases in which the principle has been applied, one thing has always been considered indispensable, viz.: that the authority in the office to which the sale may be referred must be clear and beyond all doubt, a subsisting living authority, simply waiting to be enforced without further instructions. For obvious reasons the Court will not presume against the fact that the Sheriff acted under a particular authority, or refer his action to it, unless his right to do so was perfect and unmistakable.

The case under consideration is in this respect peculiar. It arises out of the sale of a homestead exemption, and I suppose it is as certainly the policy of the State to support homestead exemptions as to sustain Sheriff's sales. This is certainly the first case of the kind in this State; and it seems to me that from the very nature of the homestead exemption the Sheriff of his own head had no authority whatever to levy and sell a homestead already assigned without at least express directions from the plaintiff in execution against whom it was assigned. That officer is specially restrained by law from levying and selling the homestead upon pain of being indicted as for a misdemeanor. The amendment of the code then recently passed giving a lien to judgments, declared in terms that this section shall not be so construed as to make final judgments in any case a lien on the real property of a judgment debtor exempt from attachment, levy and sale under the constitution." The Court will not presume that the Sheriff did what it was not his plain duty to do.

We assume it to be true that the execution in the McMaster case as originally issued, contained the usual general authority to the Sheriff to make the money; but the Sheriff in the discharge of his duty had long before levied the execution, and in response the defendant Adams had applied for and had had assigned to him this very homestead under executions, including this one. That assignment was acquiesced in by the execution creditors and the defendant placed in possession of the homestead. Subsequent to that time the execution had remained dormant in the Sheriff's office, and so far as concerned the rights and duties of the Sheriff, a ministerial officer, was substantially functus officio.

It is true that latterly, after the second levy and sale of the homestead under the inoperative executions, this Court in the case of Bull v. Rowe, 13 S. C. 360, decided, that whilst the laws and the right to homestead were general, an exception existed in reference to debts which were contracted before the adoption of the Constitution, and as to these, the provisions of the Constitution and laws allowing homestead were void and might be so declared whenever the fact was made to appear in any proceeding, direct or collateral. But I do not understand that this decision of itself actually on the instant vacated every homestead which had been previously assigned against such debts. It set aside the homestead in the particular case then before the Court, and it also declared a general principle, which the parties in similar cases might avail themselves of. But that result did not follow the decision without some action on the part of those interested in such cases.

The principle declared might include the case of Mr. McMaster, and if so he had the right to take measures to enforce his execution without regard to the homestead, and if he chose to do so it was his right without a sacrifice of the property to receive upon his execution the full value of the homestead, as to which his was and is the only effective execution in existence. But as I understand it all this was for his own exclusive option and action. The homestead previously assigned stood against all the world but him, and prima facie against him until he proceeded against it. He might or might not avail himself of his right to set aside the homestead. Whether his case was within the exception established by the Supreme Court; and if so, whether he chose to avail himself of it, were matters of himself alone, and neither the Sheriff, nor the plaintiff Agnew, nor any other creditor of Robert Adams, could, to suit his own conscience or interest, determine that matter for him.

It was decided in the case of Monchat v. Brown, 3 Rich., 117, that even parol instructions to the Sheriff by the plaintiff in execution to "Wait orders" was binding upon the Sheriff, so that a sale under another execution which was in part paid, could not be referred to that execution so as to give life to the sale otherwise void. It does seem to me that the circumstances here, and especially the peculiar nature of a homestead exemption, make a much stronger case of suspension of the Sheriff's authority, than the mere verbal "Wait orders" in that case.

After the assignment of homestead, Mr. McMaster never gave the Sheriff orders to proceed under his execution, for the very good reason that at that time it was not known that it could be done, and the question presented is not whether McMaster was estopped from proceeding under his own execution, but whether any other person without his authority could come in collaterally and require the Sheriff to sell under his execution, or have the sale referred to that execution at a subsequent time, so as incidentally to infuse its latent virtue into the title of a purchaser who did not purchase with the least reference to it, but on the contrary under executions which could not possibly touch the homestead.

Under these circumstances I cannot think it was error in the Circuit Judge, when he charged the jury that if McMaster gave no orders to the Sheriff to proceed under his execution, or in any manner abandoned his action after the assignment of homestead, then such sale could not give the purchaser valid title to the homestead.

New trial granted.

A widow is not entitled to dower in lands of her husband, sold after marriage under the lien of a judgment obtained before marriage.

[2. Dower ¶79.]

Judgment was obtained against an unmarried man in 1860, and after his marriage other judgments were obtained. Land and personal property were levied upon under these judgments and sold on the same day, the personal property realizing a sum more than sufficient to pay the ante-nuptial judgment. The advertisement mentioned the land first, but there was no evidence to show which was in fact first sold. Held, that the widow of the debtor was entitled to her dower, the burden of proving that the land was first sold being on the purchaser. *McIver, A. [This case is also cited in Chapee & Co. v. Rainey, 21 S. C. 11, 20, and distinguished therefrom.]

Before Kershaw, J., Abbeville, January, 1881.

Hon. T. B. FRASER, of the Third Circuit, took the seat of Mr. Justice McGOWAN, who had been of counsel in the cause.

Petition by Nellie H. Jones against Jacob Miller for dower, filed in the Probate Court of Abbeville, June 17, 1879. The facts stated in the brief appear in the opinion of this Court. The Circuit decree, reversing the order of the Probate Judge, was as follows:

The demandant claims dower in lands in the possession of the defendants, who hold the same under a conveyance of the husband's title from the Sheriff of Abbeville County, made in pursuance of a sale under executions, founded on judgments against the husband, existing at the time of the marriage, and constituting liens on the lands prior thereto, but enforced by sale after the marriage.

The defendants claim that the right of dower arising subsequent to the lien of the judgments, is defeated by the Sheriff's sale and conveyance under the judgments.

*381

*It is said that we have no decision of this question in our own reports, and no statute affecting it, and that it must be determined according to the principles of the common law, and in this I concur.

Mr. Park, in his learned and authoritative treatise on the law of dower, says: "It is obvious that as the husband may, by alienating the lands at any time before marriage, or before the title of dower has attached, altogether intercept that title, and prevent its ever arising, he may, under the same circumstances, create derivative interests or charges which shall be good against the wife when her title to be endowed is complete by the death of her husband. Thus his leases, his statutes, or recognizances, are all binding on the wife, and she shall hold the lands assigned to her in dower, subject to them" (p. 236).

"The remedy by statutes merchant and staple and eligit, which are meant by the term 'statutes' in the above extract, was by judgment and execution, or extent, for satisfaction of debts acknowledged by record, by virtue whereof the lands were delivered to the creditor, by process directed to the Sheriff and appreciated by the jury. At common law, lands were not subject to execution, though goods and chattels might be seized and sold by a writ of fi-fa. Lands descended to the heir were liable for the specialty debts of the ancestor, and by statute 3 and 4 W. & M. c. 14, the heir was made answerable for lands descended, and all devises made to the prejudice of creditors were avoided. Then the statute 5 Geo. 2 c. 7 enacted that lands, negroes and other hereditaments and real estates of persons indebted should be liable for their debts in like manner as real estates are by the law of England liable by specialty, and subject to like remedies for seizing, selling, etc., as personal estates in the plantations are." D'Urphey v. Nelson, 4 McC. 129, note.

Since that act was passed, it has been the law of this State that there is no distinction between lands and personal chattels, but they are considered equally liable for the satisfaction of debts, and subject in the same manner to be seized and sold for that purpose, under the process of the courts.

*There can be no difference in principle between the effect of a judgment by statute given before marriage, and that of the more efficient judgment now allowed the creditor, upon the claim of dower. If the former was to have its full effect according to its exigency, in derogation of the claim of dower, so must the latter prevail according to its exigency. Hence a sale in satisfaction of such judgment would transfer the land to the purchaser, relieved of the claim of dower, because the right of dower attached to the land when the lien of the judgment had already covered it, one of the incidents of which was a right to sell the land under execution in satisfaction of the judgment debt. The rights of the creditor under his judgment had become vested before the right of dower attached. It could not displace those rights and consequently it attached to the lands in the condition they then were, affected by the lien of the judgments, subject to the rights of the judgment creditors, and liable to be sold for the satisfaction of their debts. The right of dower attached subject to all these incidents, and hence it was divested or defeated by the sale.

Though this question has never been brought directly before the courts of review in this State, it is well settled that the claim of dower is subordinate to that of a mortgage under a mortgage existing at the time of the marriage. She may come in and redeem the estate and then be endowed, but not till then. Crafts v. Crafts, 2 McC. 54. In many of the States the question has been made and decided in relation to judgments. 1 Scrib. Dower, 572; Brown v. Williams, 31 Me. 403; Freem. Judg. § 361.

It was said at bar that many of these decisions may be affected by the statute law existing in the States where they were made. While that may be true, yet those statutes, if they exist, in this particular are declaratory of the common law and consistent with it, as has been shown. It is not to be wondered at that the cases are uniform in this respect, not one appearing to the contrary, for if it were otherwise, it would result that a man might defeat the rights of his creditors, under the judgments of the court, by his voluntary act of marriage.

*It was contended by the counsel for demandant that although the general rule may be as stated, yet that there are peculiar circumstances here which will save the rights of demandant. There were some judgments and executions against the husband existing before the marriage, and some obtained after. Besides the lands levied on, there were forty-four slaves advertised by the Sheriff with the lands, and some other personal property, to be sold under said executions. All the property was sold the same day, and under all the executions. If the personal property had been first sold and the proceeds applied to the judgments entered before the marriage, they would have been satisfied and extinguished, and the land would have been sold under the judgments entered after the marriage. In that case the demandant would have been entitled to her dower. It is contended here that this court shall decree as if that had been done, because dower is a favored claim in the law. There is no evidence as to the order in which the property was sold, except that the real estate was first mentioned in the Sheriff's advertisement. It was to the interest of the creditors that the land should be first sold, because in that case it would be sold free from the right of dower and would command a higher price. A judgment creditor has a right to select what property of his debtor shall be sold under his execution. McAlley v. Barber, 4 S.

C. 48; Wagner v. Pegues, 10 S. C. 262. It may therefore be assumed that the creditors directed the sale in the order most consistent with their interests, in the absence of any better evidence on the subject.

But, if it were otherwise and the slaves were first sold, all being sold on the same day and under all the executions, there would have been no application of the purchase money, probably no payment, until all the sales were complete. The executions would have been paid out of a common fund. The purchaser, however, would have had the right to refer his purchase to any of the judgments under which the property was sold, and the creditors would have had a right to direct the application of the proceeds in accordance with their interests. Could Mrs. Jones at the time of the sale, having only a contingent right of dower, have invoked the intervention of a court *of equity, quia timet, to compel the creditors to adopt a different course in order to preserve her contingent right? There is no precedent for such a proceeding. The creditors had vested legal rights which entitled them to levy on and sell this property in satisfaction of their debts, in the manner most likely to produce that result, and it was well said that a contingent equity will never divest a legal right.

It is ordered and decreed that the judgment of the Probate Judge herein be set aside and reversed, and the petition be dismissed. Also ordered that the demandant do pay the costs of the proceeding and the costs of the appeal.

From this decree the demandant appealed upon the following exceptions:

1. Because his Honor the presiding Judge erred in holding that the existence of the judgments against the husband prior to marriage barred the widow's right of dower.

2. Because if this was not error it is submitted that the sale just after marriage, in invitum, of more than a sufficiency of his personal property on the same day with the real estate should have been so applied, by operation of law, as to satisfy the antecedent judgments and let in the widow's claim of dower.

Messrs. L. W. Perrin, J. C. Sheppard, for appellant.

Messrs. W. H. Parker, O. T. Calhoun, Burt & Graydon, contra.

June, 17, 1882. The opinion of the Court was delivered by

Mr. Justice FRASER. In a case like the present, where parties stand entirely upon their technical rights, and these are dependant upon the exact facts of the case, it is to be regretted that so much has been left to mere inference, or as to which the Court must be governed entirely by presumption.

It appears from the "case" submitted to this Court, that H. A. Jones was seized of valuable real estate, and was the owner of a large number of slaves and other personal property; that some time in 1860, judgments were obtained and duly entered *up against him to the amount of $17,000; that after these were entered up, to wit, on December 19, 1860, he intermarried with Nellie H. Jones, the demandant; that after the marriage other judgments to the amount of $20,000 or $30,000 were obtained and duly entered up against him; that these latter judgments were obtained early in 1861; that executions were duly issued on all of these judgments; that about March, 1861, H. A. Jones and wife left the State and never returned; that all the records in the proceedings in relation to said judgments were destroyed by fire at Abbeville, in November, 1872; that from such secondary evidence as could be obtained, it appears that the executions issued under the above judgments were duly levied on the real and personal estates of H. A. Jones; that the land appears first on the list of property as advertised for sale by the Sheriff; that the land and slaves were sold on sales-day in May, 1861; that the land was sold for about $9,000 or $10,000; that there were thirty-six slaves sold on that day, the average value of which was $500; that the remainder of the personal estate was sold several days after this sales-day, and that after all the proceeds of sales were applied, there was still a deficiency of about $10,000; and that H. A. Jones has died, leaving Nellie H. Jones, his widow, surviving him, who in this proceeding demands her dower in the lands of H. A. Jones, her husband, sold as above.

The Court has been left entirely to conjecture as to the true amount due on the oldest of the above judgments at the sale in May, 1861. If these judgments had been obtained early in 1860, the $17,000 might, by interest, have increased with costs to over $18,000, and may have reached the sum of $18,500. If the judgments had been obtained in December, 1860, the sum may not have been over $17,500. There is nothing, however, in the "Case" which shows whether $17,000 was an interest-bearing sum or the total amount of principal, interest and costs, at the date of the sales in May, 1861. As to the sale of the slaves on sales-day, in May, 1861, the statement in the "Case" is that there were thirty-six of them sold at an average value of $500 each. This is all the evidence on the subject, and it would be arbitrary for the Court to fix any other *than thirty-six as the true number, and $500 as the average value. The Court must, therefore, fix the amount of the sale of the slaves on sales-day in May, 1861, at $18,000. It must, therefore, be held that the slaves, sold on sales-day in May, 1861, as the property of H. A. Jones, under these executions, brought the sum of $18,000, an amount sufficient to extinguish the executions issued under ante-nuptial judgments, so far as there has been any evidence to fix the amount due on them at that date.

This Court concurs with the Circuit Judge in holding that the lien of these ante-nuptial judgments was paramount to the claim of dower in this case. This position is fully sustained by the authorities to which he refers in the Circuit decree. Park on Dower, 236; Scrib. Dower, 572; Freem. Judg., § 361. The doctrine on this subject is correctly stated by Mr. Scribner (vol. 1, p. 572) as follows: "Where a judgment lien is acquired against the husband's land prior to his marriage, and the land is sold subsequently thereto in satisfaction of the judgment debt, the right of dower of his wife in the land is defeated."

While there is some difference between the statements in the Circuit decree and in the "Case" before this Court, as to the number of slaves sold, the same conclusion has been reached—that there was ample personal property sold on that day to pay off these older judgments if the proceeds had been so applied. When the widow demands her dower in her husband's land, and shows seizin of the husband, her marriage with him and his death, she is entitled to her dower unless the respondent can show affirmatively something which defeats her claim. The burden of proof is then on him. "The obligation of proving any fact lies upon the party who substantially asserts the affirmative of the issue." 1 Green. Evid., § 74. "It applies to every fact which is essential or necessarily involved in that proposition." Ibid., note. Wilder v. Cowles, 100 Mass. 487. Now the propositions on which respondent relies in this case are, first, that there were ante-nuptial judgments against the husband; and second, that this land was sold under them, or one of them. Unless these two things are made to appear affirmatively, the land is liable to dower. It cannot be inferred

*that the land was sold first because it was first on the list of advertised property, especially when the writ of fi-fa mentioned the property (if it was properly made out) in the reverse order, "goods and chattels" being first mentioned and afterwards the lands, etc.

Neither is it a safe presumption that creditors sold the land first because it was their interest to do so. It may be safely presumed that the Sheriff did his duty, and sold for cash, each sale standing by itself and for itself, as each separate article or piece of property was sold. The Sheriff became, when the property was knocked down to a bidder, prima facie liable for the proceeds, and if in fact the money was paid afterwards, the application must have been made as of the very instant the sale was made. This applies to the land as well as the personal property. If, in fact, the land had been put up and bid off first, a subsequent compliance by the purchaser would have defeated the claim of dower, and made his title good. If the personal property had been put up and bid off first, then a subsequent compliance with the bid would have settled and paid off the older judgments and executions; and their liens on the land would have been just as effectually extinguished as if the money had then and there been paid when the bid was made.

If there had been no other property of the judgment debtor sold on sales-day in May, 1861, except this land for $9,000 or $10,000, there could be no doubt that the land was sold to pay these judgments and executions, amounting to $17,000, but personally was sold on the same day and more than was sufficient to pay off these judgments and executions which antedated the marriage, and the Court cannot presume, in the absence of any proof on the subject, that the land was sold first, and the personalty last. If all the property sold had been land, and if instead of a number of slaves land to the value of $18,000 had been sold in addition to the land now in dispute, by what principle could it now be held that these lands now in dispute were first sold? Clearly no such conclusion would follow without throwing on the widow the alternative of losing her dower in $28,000 worth of land when it could have been extinguished only, at most, in $17,000 worth, or of proving the executions to each parcel, as the cases came up. The burden of proof is not on her but on him who alleges that her right has been extinguished by a sale under an existing lien. To deprive one of rights there must be proof, something more than a probability, that creditors did what they now know to have been their interest to do, but of which they have not preserved the evidence. At most nothing more than a probability has been shown, and this Court does not think that this is sufficient to defeat the widow's right of dower.

It is therefore ordered and adjudged that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed, and that the case be remanded to the Probate Court for such further proceedings as may be necessary and proper to carry out the judgment of the Probate Court herein.

Mr. Justice McIVER, dissenting. I cannot concur in the conclusion reached by the majority of this Court, and on the contrary, think that the Circuit Judge has taken the correct view of the case. I do not deem it necessary to add anything to what has been said by the Circuit Judge, except to say that, in my judgment, there was no sufficient evidence to warrant the conclusion that the personal property sold on the day the land was sold, brought an amount sufficient to satisfy the antenuptial judgments. Those judgments amounted to seventeen thousand dollars, but whether this was the amount at the time of the sale or the amount at the time of the recovery of the judgments does not distinctly appear. The statement in the "Case" is that "during the year 1860, and prior to the marriage, judgments to the amount of $17,000 were obtained, and this would indicate that seventeen thousand dollars was the amount recovered, which, of course, would bear interest from the time of the recovery. But exactly when the judgments were recovered does not appear, except that it was some time in 1860, prior to the marriage, which took place on December 19th, 1860. It does, however, appear, from the Statute Book, that at that time the Court for Abbeville, where those judgments were recovered, was appointed to be held on the first Mondays in March and October in each year (12 Stat. *262) and if the judgments were recovered in October, 1860, the interest to the first Monday in May, 1861, when the property was sold, to say nothing of the costs, would carry the amount over eighteen thousand dollars. And as it is not pretended that the personal property sold on that day brought more than eighteen thousand dollars, there would still be a balance due on the ante-nuptial judgments, even after applying to them the whole amount of the proceeds of the sale of the personal property, which would authorize the sale of the land under those judgments.

But in addition to this, I do not think that the evidence is sufficient to justify the conclusion that the personal property sold on the day the land was sold brought the sum of eighteen thousand dollars. The only testimony on this point, as derived from the "Case," is that thirty-six slaves were sold on the day the land was sold—the other personal property having been sold on a subsequent day—"and the witnesses estimated the average value of a lot of negroes at that time at $500"—not that such was the average value of this particular lot of negroes. Hence, in order to reach the conclusion that they brought eighteen thousand dollars, we must first infer, without any evidence from which to draw such inference, that this particular lot of negroes were of the average value, and next that they brought a full average value at Sheriff's sale—an inference not justified by experience, as it very frequently happens that property does not bring its value under the Sheriff's hammer.

It seems to me, therefore, that the judgment of the Circuit Court should be affirmed.

Before Mackey, J., Charleston, May, 1881.

This was an action by Amelia L. Annelly and Julia A. Blake, as devisee and executrix of Anna M. Annelly, to foreclose a mortgage given by John W. Lewis, on his one fourth interest in the Commercial Wharves of Charleston, to secure the payment of two bonds of the same date and for the same amount, payable, one to Amelia L. Annelly and the other to Anna M. Annelly. After the execution of the bonds, Anna M. Annelly died, and by her last will and testament appointed Julia A. Blake, executrix, and gave her entire estate to Julia A. Blake, Francis P. Lewis and John W. A. Lewis. The mortgagor died, and W. G. DeSaussure became the sole executor, with full power to sell all of his testator's lands. Acting under such power, and with the co-operation of the other owners, and, as he supposed, with the assent of the mortgagees, he made sale of his testator's interest in the Commercial Wharves for a full price to the "Commercial Wharf and Cotton Press Company," who, in full persuasion of a perfect title, at once erected very costly improvements. The defendants were W. G. DeSaussure, executor, the purchaser, and the heirs-at-law of John W. Lewis, two of whom were devisees of Anna M. Annelly. For a more particular statement, reference is made to the case as reported in 12 S. C. 488.

Upon the return of the cause to the Circuit Court it was referred to the Master to inquire into the matters directed by the Supreme Court. The Master declined to hear testimony de novo, and confining his inquiry to two points, reported that there were no persons having any interest in the assets of the estate of Anna M. Annelly except the three devisees before the Court, and that actual partition of the premises was impracticable. *391

Exceptions to this report were overruled by the Circuit Judge and order of foreclosure passed upon one-sixth (that is, one fourth less two thirds in one eighth) of the entire property; and the Commercial Wharf and Cotton Press Company were ordered to pay the costs.

This company and also W. G. DeSaussure, executor, appealed to this Court upon exceptions which raised the questions considered in the opinion.

[For subsequent opinion, see Ex parte Blake, 18 S. C. 603; 26 S. C. 497, 2 S. E. 490, 4 Am. St. Rep. 725.]

Messrs. Simonton & Barker, DeSaussure & Son, for appellants.

Messrs. Campbell & Whaley, contra.

Mr. Justice McIVER. This was an action to foreclose a mortgage on an undivided fourth part of certain real property in the city of Charleston, known as the Commercial Wharves. Inasmuch, however, as the case has been before the Court on a former occasion, when it was fully reported (12 S. C. 488), it will be unnecessary to encumber this opinion with a detailed statement of the facts. We, propose, therefore, to confine ourselves to the consideration of the questions which are now presented for our decision.

We think that the former decision settled two things. 1st. That the plaintiffs were entitled to have their mortgage foreclosed in this proceeding. 2d. That F. P. Lewis and J. W. Lewis, Jr., not having appealed from the former Circuit decree, were bound by its terms and that their rights must stand as settled by that decree. The practical result, therefore, is that the plaintiffs are entitled to have a foreclosure of their mortgage upon the one undivided sixth part of the property known as the Commercial Wharves, but how that should be done—what provision, if any, should be made in regard to, the improvements put upon the property by the Commercial Wharf and Cotton Press Company, and how the account for rents and profits of *the mortgaged premises should be taken, were left unsettled by the former decision of this Court. As is said in the opinion of Willard, C. J., "So far as it regards the question of improvements made jointly by the assignee of a tenant subject to mortgage and his co-tenants not affected by such mortgage, or, as in the present case, by a party uniting both these characters, no inquiry has been made and findings of fact presented enabling this Court to determine whether the improvements are of a character, and the property so circumstanced, as to call for the recognition of equitable severalty in them, as regards the undivided interest derived under different titles. Williman v. Holmes, 4 Rich. Eq. 475. For the want of a proper basis of fact, that question cannot be considered in the present stage of the case; but there should be an inquiry into such facts and proper action thereon."

Mr. Justice Haskell (the other Associate Justice, having filed a dissenting opinion), while concurring with the then Chief Justice in the conclusion that the executor of John W. Lewis had no authority to act for the mortgagees in making the sale to the Commercial Wharf and Cotton Press Company, and that the mortgagees had not ratified such sale either by acquiescence or otherwise, and also in the conclusion that such of the parties as had not appealed were bound by the circuit decree, limited his concurrence to these points, and said expressly that, while the mortgage to the extent not affected by the acquiescence of such of the parties as had not appealed from the former circuit decree, "remains a lien on the interest held by Lewis," yet, he adds, "what that interest is has not been considered by the Circuit Judge, for the whole case turned upon the point which is error, and the right to foreclose being thus denied, the question of partition was never reached."

It is manifest, therefore, that when the former Circuit decree was reversed and the case remanded, it was for the purpose of ascertaining "whether there are parties other than the devisee Julia A. Blake, and the co-devisees, entitled to participate in the assets of the estate of Anna M. Annely;" next, "whether the improvements are of a nature and the property so circumstanced as to call for the recognition of equitable severalty in them as regards the undivided interest derived under different titles," according to the principles established by the case of Williman v. Holmes, supra, and after these matters were determined, then that a decree for foreclosure should be rendered. These inquiries have been made, and it has been ascertained that no persons other than the devisees are interested in the assets of the estate of Anna Maria Annely and that the property is so situated that it would be impracticable to make actual partition so as to give the benefit of the improvements to the improving co-tenant and leave the remainder to be sold under the mortgage; and to these findings no exception has been taken.

The Circuit decree, which is now before us for review, directs a sale of the one undivided sixth part of the property without making any allowance for the improvements, and if, as most likely will be the case, the proceeds of the sale shall prove insufficient to satisfy the mortgage debt, requires the Commercial Wharf and Cotton Press Company to account for "the rental value of the premises directed herein to be sold, while in the possession of the defendant the Commercial Wharf and Cotton Press Company, from the filing of the complaint in this case," and requires that the costs of the case be paid by the said company. To this decree the defendants except on various grounds, which we do not propose to state in detail, but rather the questions which we understand to be raised by these exceptions.

The first question is as to the scope and effect of the former decision of this Court: whether it remanded the whole case for a hearing de novo of all the issues of law and fact. Upon this point we have already, in giving an outline of the case, indicated our opinion that the majority of this Court held, at the former hearing, that the defence then mainly relied upon—that the sale by the executor of the mortgagor was made by the authority of the mortgagees, or if not that it was ratified by their subsequent conduct—could not be sustained, and that the plaintiffs were entitled to a judgment of foreclosure.

The next question is whether the Commercial Wharf and *Cotton Press Company was any longer a necessary or proper party to the action. We think the company was a proper party. It was in possession of the mortgaged premises claiming an interest therein, and before that interest was severed and ascertained by partition, it seems to us clear that it was a proper party to the action. While the executor of the mortgagor had no authority, as it has been settled by the former decision of this Court, to make the sale free from the lien of the mortgage, he certainly had the authority to contract for the sale of the equity of redemption and this was all that could pass under the contract of sale, by which the company was enabled to take and retain the possession. We think, therefore, that there was no error on the part of the Circuit Judge in refusing to dismiss the complaint against the Commercial Wharf and Cotton Press Company.

The next inquiry is whether the Commercial Wharf and Cotton Press Company is entitled to any allowance for improvements which it put upon the common property upon an undivided one sixth of which the plaintiffs hold a mortgage. There is no doubt that the rule is that where a mortgagor, or a purchaser from him, puts improvements upon the mortgaged premises, and the premises are subsequently sold under a judgment for foreclosure, that there can be no allowance for the improvements, and that the same will inure to the benefit of the mortgagee to the extent necessary to satisfy his mortgage debt. But where premises are held by two persons as tenants in common, and one of the co-tenants gives a mortgage on his undivided share, and the other co-tenant enters into possession, as he has a right to do, and improves the common property, it seems to us that the same rule should apply as in cases of partition. In such case the mortgagee can claim nothing more than his mortgagor could, and if he, upon partition, would be required to allow the improving tenant anything for improvements, we see no reason why a mortgagee of an undivided share of real estate should not be required to make the same allowance to the improving tenant, upon a sale under a judgment for foreclosure.

In the recent case of Scaife v. Thomson,

15 S. C. 337, we *had occasion to consider the question of the right of an improving co-tenant to an allowance for improvements upon the common property where a sale for partition becomes necessary; and it was there held that while it was true that the rule was settled that the improving co-tenant was not entitled to the exclusive benefit of his improvements where he was aware at the time of making the improvements, that other persons were entitled to interests in the property so improved, yet "when one has expended his money in the improvement of property, under the honest conviction of exclusive ownership in himself, it seems to us that there is manifest equity in allowing him the benefit of such improvements, as far as the same can be done without injury to the other co-tenants." That case also holds that where actual partition is practicable, it should be so made as to give to the party who had made the improvements that portion of the common property which had been improved, without accounting for the increased value imparted to such portion by the improvements (as was done in Williman v. Holmes, supra). "But even if such partition cannot be made and a sale should become necessary, we see no reason why, upon the same principle, the improving tenant should not be allowed out of the proceeds of the sale—not the cost of such improvements, but—the amount which such improvements can be shown to have enhanced the value of the property."

In the case now under consideration there cannot be a doubt that, when the Commercial Wharf and Cotton Press Company took possession of the property in question and contracted for the improvements, they were acting under the honest conviction, based upon the advice of eminent counsel, that they had acquired the exclusive ownership of the property free from the lien of the mortgage, and hence under the principle above announced, the company is entitled to an allowance for the improvements—and as it has been ascertained that actual partition is not practicable but that a sale of the undivided sixth part of the property will be necessary, the company must be held entitled to receive out of the proceeds of the sale—not the proportionate part of the cost of the improvements put upon the common property, but—the amount which such im*provements shall, upon inquiry, be ascertained to have enhanced the value of such one undivided sixth part, and that the balance of the proceeds of the sale be applied to the mortgage debt.

The next inquiry is as to the rents and profits. This, too, it seems to us, is settled by the principles announced in Scaife v. Thomson, supra, and in taking the account of the rents and profits the Commercial Wharf and Cotton Press Company should not be held liable for such rents and profits as may be due to the improvements put upon the property by said company.

The only remaining inquiry is as to the costs. We are unable to perceive any just ground for imposing the entire costs of the case upon the Commercial Wharf and Cotton Press Company. So much of the costs as were incurred in resisting the unsuccessful defence, originally set up by that company, might with propriety be imposed upon it, but we see no reason why the balance of the costs should not be provided for in the usual way. This is a matter, however, more appropriately within the province of the Circuit Court when it comes to render a final judgment, and we prefer to leave it to that tribunal.

The judgment of this Court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be so modified as to conform to the principles herein announced, and that the case be remanded to that Court for such further proceedings as may be necessary.

Ex parte WILLIAMS, Treasurer. GIBBES v. GREENVILLE AND COLUMBIA RAILROAD COMPANY. THE STATE ex rel. THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. SAME.

(November Term, 1881.)

[1. Receivers ¶150.]

The whole transaction connected with the closing of an account by note being in writing and set forth in the pleadings; there was no error in passing upon a petition to have such account paid out of the receiver's fund without ordering a reference to take testimony.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Receivers, Cent. Dig. § 268; Dec. Dig. ¶150.]

[2. Corporations ¶559.]

After order passed constituting the officers of a railroad company, in effect, receivers of the road, the company continued to conduct its business as before, officers were annually elected and no separate books were opened by them as receivers. During this time a note was given by this corporation in its corporate name, signed by the president and treasurer as such in settlement of an account for running expenses. Held, that the existence of such corporation was not interfered with, or its officers displaced, and that the note so given was not made or received with reference to the receiver's fund.

[3. Payment ¶74.]

Whether a note was received as payment of an account is a question of fact depending upon intention, but such intention appears here from the manner of closing the account by note for balance, together with receipt for such note expressed to be in settlement, and a deposit of collaterals to secure the payment of the note.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Witte v. Weinberg, 37 S. C. 591, 17 S. E. 681.

[4. Payment ¶17.]

Besides, the payee of such note having transferred it with the collaterals for value, and the collaterals having been sold by the transferee, the original cause of action on the account, if still existing, was then destroyed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Payment, Cent. Dig. ¶77; Dec. Dig. ¶17.]

[5. Payment ¶17.]

If the account was properly chargeable against the receiver's fund, it was a mere equity, which did not attach to the note given by the corporation and to the collaterals intended to secure it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Payment, Cent. Dig. §§ 70-77; Dec. Dig. ¶17.]

Before Aldrich, J., Richland, April, 1881.

This is a petition in the two cases above stated. For a full consideration of the important effect of the order constituting the officers of the Greenville and Columbia Railroad Company, receivers, see In re Fifty-four First Mortgage Bonds, 15 S. C. 304, and Ex parte Brown and wife, Ibid. 518.

The petition was filed March 19, 1881.—Answer by certain holders of second mortgage bonds was served April 9, 1881.—On April 19, Judge Aldrich passed the following order:

On motion of Buist & Buist, attorneys of the petitioner, It is Ordered, That leave be granted to any of the parties or respondents to take testimony in Columbia, before N. B. Barnwell, Master, or in Charleston, before W. D. Clancy, Master; and that the testimony so taken be used on the hearing by the Court, or before the Master, on any order of reference which may be hereafter made to him.

On the same day the motion in this case, stated in the opinion, was made, and ten days thereafter, the order dismissing the petition was filed. All other facts necessary to a proper understanding of the case, are stated in the opinion, but for convenience of reference, the order of Judge Melton of June 18, 1872, is here inserted. It was as follows:

2. As the State cannot be required to give security, as other plaintiffs, It is Ordered: That the president and directors of the Greenville and Columbia Railroad Company, under the order of, and subject to this Court, continue in the possession and management of the property of all kinds of the said company; and in like manner continue to conduct and carry on the business of the said company; that they make report to this Court at such times as this Court may require, of the condition of the property of all kinds of the said company, of its earnings and profits and expenditures, to the end that such orders may, from time to time, be moved for, as may be necessary and proper for the protection of the property of the said company, and the interests of all parties concerned, pending litigation.

Messrs. Buist & Buist, Simonton & Barker, Lord & Inglesby, for appellant.

Mr. James Conner, contra.

August 8, 1882. The opinion of the Court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. The Greenville and Columbia Railroad Company was indebted to the South Carolina Railroad Company, by balance of open account, December 30, 1876, and on that day W. J. Magrath, who was president of both companies, struck the balance and executed and delivered to the South Carolina Company a note of which the following is a copy:

"Columbia, S. C., Dec. 30, 1876.

"One day after date the Greenville and Columbia Railroad Company promises to pay to the South Carolina Railroad Company or order, fifty-one thousand four hundred and thirty-two 86/100 dollars, for value received with interest from January 1, 1875, and interest after maturity at the rate of seven per cent per annum, having deposited with the said South Carolina Railroad Company as collateral security one hundred and three

*Greenville and Columbia Railroad Company second mortgage bonds of $500.00 each, which said mortgage bonds shall at any time be subject to exchange for the new first mortgage bonds of the Greenville and Columbia Railroad Company, upon the terms of exchange accepted by other holders of this class of bonds; and in case this note shall not be paid when due we hereby give the said South Carolina Railroad Company authority to sell the said security or any part thereof, for account of ourselves, on the maturity of this note, or at any time thereafter at public or private sale, at their discretion, without advertising the same; and to apply so much of the proceeds of said security to the payment of this note as may be necessary to pay the same, with all interest due thereon and expenses attending sale of said security. If the net proceeds of said security shall not cover the amount due thereon, we hold ourselves bound to pay the balance forthwith after such sale, with interest at the rate of seven per cent per annum.

"C. H. Manson, Treasurer."

"W. J. Magrath, President."

On March 1, 1877, the South Carolina Railroad Company endorsed the said note and delivered the collaterals named therein to Geo. W. Williams, as treasurer of a committee of the directors of the South Carolina Railroad Company, as collateral security for certain loans, indorsements, and advances made by them for said company. On April 10, 1880, the said treasurer sold the 103 second mortgage bonds pledged as collateral security for said note and the proceeds of sale $5,150.00 was credited as of that date upon the note, leaving a balance still due of $68,642.71.

The Greenville and Columbia Railroad Company proved to be insolvent and the case of James S. Gibbes v. The Greenville and Columbia Railroad Company was filed to foreclose mortgages and sell the road. In this case the creditors of the G. & C. road were called in by publication, but no claim in regard to the said note or its considerations was presented by the South Carolina Railroad Company, although they presented other *claims. The road was sold and the priorities of creditors established, showing a large amount of the mortgage debt still unpaid.

Matters stood in this condition until it was held by the Court that an order of Judge Melton in the case above stated of June, 1872, made "the officers of the Greenville and Columbia Railroad Company officers of the court, and responsible to it in the character of receivers," when on March 14, 1881, after final judgment, Geo. W. Williams, treasurer, as aforesaid, filed this petition ex parte in the case, praying to have "the balance of said note paid out of the proceeds of the sale of the Greenville and Columbia Railroad Company, or out of the income paid over to the Master by James Conner, receiver, in preference to all other liens and claims upon said property." A motion was made before Judge Aldrich that a sufficient amount be reserved in the hands of Mr. Barnwell, the Master, to cover the claim of the petitioner, and that the Master be restrained from entering satisfaction on the mortgage given for the purchase-money of the road. Upon this motion the pleadings were read, and Judge Aldrich, holding that the original account, if it ever had any equity to be paid out of the receiver's fund in preference to the mortgage bondholders, was paid and satisfied by the aforesaid note and the collaterals to secure it given by the Greenville and Columbia Railroad Company, refused the motion and dismissed the petition.

Appeal is now made to this Court upon the following exceptions:

1. Because, there being a controversy, and an order having been made to take the testimony on the 19th April, 1881, and the testimony not having been taken before him, the Judge erred in dismissing the petition when it was only before him on a motion made on the 19th April, 1881, that a sufficient amount of money be reserved in the hands of Mr. Barnwell, the Master, to cover the claim of the petitioner, and that the Master be restrained from entering satisfaction on the mortgage given for the purchase-money of the road.

2. Because the Judge erred in not granting the motion on behalf of the petitioner on 19th April, 1881, the fund being *still in the possession of the Court, and being jointly payable to the petitioner if he should establish his claim.

3. Because the Judge erred in deciding as a matter of fact that the note was a payment of the account set forth in the petition, when there was no proof before him that such was the intention of the parties, and the note itself was produced and shown to be unpaid.

4. Because the Judge erred in deciding that one who takes a note, secured collaterally, cannot take advantage of the account which was the consideration of the note; whereas he ought to have decided that the consideration of the note becomes a part of the note, and whatever special equities attach to the consideration become a part of the note.

5. Because the Judge erred in deciding that the present holder negotiated for the note in open market, when the allegation is, and it is not denied but admitted, that the present holder received the same as collateral security only, and therefore holds the same for the use of the payee after his debt is paid.

6. Because the Judge erred in not deciding that the consideration of the note so held by the petitioner, being an account for labor and material furnished to the president and directors of the Greenville & Columbia Railroad Company, between the 31st day of January, 1873, and the 30th day of December, 1876, while the property was in the possession of this court, under the order of Judge Melton of the 2d day of June, 1872, and the said labor and material having contributed to the earnings of the road, under the principles of the decree of Judge Pressley, of the 6th day of September, 1879, they were entitled to a priority of payment out of the earnings of said road, and there still being funds in possession of the court, out of which said claim could be paid, the judge should have ordered the claim to have been paid."

Did the Circuit Judge err, as alleged, in dismissing the petition? We see nothing in the case to sustain the allegation that the decision was prematurely made because the testimony had not been taken. The whole transaction was in writing, and its proper construction and effect could only be drawn *from the papers themselves. The defence was in the nature of a demurrer, for want of sufficient facts to constitute a cause of action. If, according to the papers exhibited, there could be no ground for the special equity claimed to give this debt of the G. & C. R. R. Co. a preference over mortgage bondholders, it was proper to decide it at once, without the delay and expense incident to a fruitless reference.

It has been lately decided that Judge Melton's order of 1872, in the case of James S. Gibbs v. The Greenville & Columbia Railroad Company, supra, made the president and directors of the company officers of the court, substantially receivers, although somewhat "anomalous" in character. It seems that the full import of that order, as subsequently declared, was not understood until Judge Pressley's order in the same case was entered in 1878. In the meantime the officers of the company, elected as usual by the stockholders, without making returns to the court, or opening separate books, or contracting, or in any other way acting as receivers, continued to conduct the affairs of the company in all respects as they had done before. During this period an account, in the ordinary course of business, was contracted, as alleged, with the South Carolina Railroad Company, which that company, taking no notice whatever of the order of 1872, charged not against the officers as receivers, but in the usual way against the Greenville and Columbia Railroad Company.

It may be that the identity of the persons described as receivers with the regular officers of the company tended to some confusion in this respect; but making every allowance for that, we cannot doubt that the parties were ignorant at that time of the effect of the order in respect to contracting accounts and their powers under it; and that credit was not in fact given to the officers of the road as receivers, or on the faith of a receiver's fund, but, as the form of the account indicates, to the corporation of the Greenville and Columbia Railroad Company.

Even if the parties had understood the full effect of Judge Melton's order, as we conceive, that order did not and could not interfere with the corporate existence of the company, or *displace the officers who held their places under an act of the Legislature and the election of the stockholders. High, Receiv., § 391, and notes; Jones, R. R., Sec., § 519. But if, recognizing the latent force of the order of 1872 as lately declared, and giving it retroactive effect, we must now hold that said account, contrary to its terms and the intention of the parties, was in fact against the officers and receivers, and by a special equity was chargeable upon the income in preference to the lien of the mortgage bondholders, it is clear that the South Carolina Railroad Company accepted in liquidation of that account a note of the Greenville and Columbia Railroad Company as such. The tenor of the note is, "The Greenville and Columbia Railroad Company promises to pay," and it was signed by W. J. Magrath, President, and C. H. Manson, Treasurer, and was secured by collaterals which were the property of the company.

The extent of a receiver's powers is shown by the definition of his office: "A receiver is an indifferent person between the parties to a cause, appointed by the Court to receive and preserve the property in litigation pendente lite. He is not the agent or representative of either party to the action, but is uniformly regarded as an officer of the court, exercising his functions in the interest of neither the plaintiff nor defendant, but for the common benefit of all parties in interest."

In this view of the case it will not be necessary to examine the items of account as to their character. The controlling question is whether the note and collaterals were taken merely in substitution for, or in payment and satisfaction of the account. There is some conflict in the cases, but we understand the law on the subject to be as stated by Judge Withers in the case of Townsend, Arnold & Co. v. Stevenson & Walker, 4 Rich. 62. "One rule touching the question in this case certainly is that upon a sale and delivery of goods, the promise to pay, as implied by law, is not discharged as a cause of action by merely receiving a note, whether executed by the debtor or a third person, for the existing debt. To discharge the existing cause of action, such note must be received in payment of the debt arising upon the sale and delivery. The *question is what was the intention and understanding of the parties."

Whether the note and collaterals received in this case were taken in payment and satisfaction of the account was a question of fact which the judge determined against the petitioner; and as the proceeding is somewhat analogous to an action at law upon the account, alleging that it is still unsatisfied, we possibly might rest upon the determination of the question of fact by the Circuit Judge. But while it is the supposed virtue of the account which is invoked here, the right to the priority claimed is, if it exist, an equity, and we will therefore consider the petition as a "case in chancery," and examine the evidence.

The exhibits show that the account against the Greenville and Columbia Railroad Company contained two columns, debit and credit. From time to time as payments were made they were entered in the credit column. On the day of settlement the payments were aggregated and deducted from the charges, and there was found to be a balance against the G. & C. Co. of $51,432.86. For this amount the note was taken and the item added, the last in the payment column, and the account balanced with the statement. "Dec. 31, by note dated December 30, 1876, secured by 103 second mortgage bonds of your company, $500.00 each, with coupons, payable July 1, 1872, in settlement of balance." The following receipt was given:

"Received from C. H. Manson, treasurer, Greenville and Columbia Railroad Company, their note dated Dec. 30, 1876, at one day date, with interest from Jan'y 1, 1875, secured by second mortgage bonds as stated therein, in settlement of the above account.

"J. H. Wilson,

"Treas. S. C. R. R. Company."

It seems to us that the manner of closing the account shows that the parties intended the note and collaterals to be in payment and satisfaction of the account which was formally balanced. The words "in settlement of balance" are the words usually employed to express that purpose. Are they not as *strong that the parties intended payment, as the words "settled in full," which, not in closing a mere open account but upon an official bond, under seal, where held to have that effect in the case of Griffin v. Addison, 3 S. C. 105. See McLure v. Askew, 5 Rich. Eq. 162, and Kirkland v. Cureton, 4 S. C. 122. That this was the sense in which these words were used in this case is strengthened by the fact that the note was secured by second mortgage bonds, which were delivered at the time, to the full amount of its face value.

*405

In States where the equity of the vendor of land is recognized, it has been held that taking other security was evidence of a waiver of equity. See McCorkle v. Montgomery, 11 Rich. Eq. 114, and Mackreth v. Symmons, 1 Lead. Cas. Eq. 242. In the light in which the parties acted the account was no more than a claim against the G. & C. Co., and the note was the same and had the advantage of being liquidated, bearing interest and being secured by collaterals. Under the circumstances there was no object for leaving the account unsatisfied, and we have no doubt that payment was intended.

But if the circumstances under which the note and collaterals were taken left the intention of the parties at all doubtful, that was put beyond doubt so far as the South Carolina Company was concerned, when they transferred the note and its collaterals for a valuable consideration to the petitioner. "Although the receiving of a note is not payment unless received as such, yet if the creditor place the note beyond his power and control so that it cannot be delivered up to be cancelled, the note is payment and the original cause of action is extinguished." Judge Wallace in Adger & Co. v. Pringle, 11 S. C. 535; Townsend, Arnold & Co. v. Stevenson & Walker, supra. Here the note is brought into court, not, however, by the South Carolina Railroad Company but by their assignee, who has sold the collateral bonds, and the parties cannot be placed in statu quo.

It is not necessary to enter into the question as to what rights or equities the South Carolina Company transferred to the petitioner, or what was the effect of the transfer to him, being merely as collateral security for a debt. In the view *taken the account was extinguished, and there was nothing to transfer but the note and the collaterals which secured it. We may say, however, that if as contended for the petitioner, the South Carolina R. R. Company had the right at any time to set up a special equity on the account against a receiver's fund, that right never amounted to an express lien like a mortgage; but was a mere equity which did not go with the note and the collaterals intended to secure it.

The petitioner, in the course of business, received the note and its collaterals as simple obligations of the Greenville and Columbia Railroad Company. He was authorized to sell the collaterals and he did so, but he still holds the balance of the note against the company in the right in which he acquired it. He has all the security he contracted for. To adjudge now that he has the additional subsequently discovered equity to be paid out of the proceeds of sale of the road in priority to bondholders, who had a prior mortgage upon it, would be to take from subsisting liens and give to him that which was not within the contemplation of any of the parties or the express terms of his contract.

The judgment of this Court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

Before Pressley, J., Richland, July, 1881.

Action by Ann S. Rodgers, widow, and her children, against the Mutual Endowment Assessment Association of Baltimore, Maryland. After service of the summons as stated in the opinion, defendant wrote to counsel to represent it. Such counsel, in ignorance of where the cause of action arose, or that defendant had no property or agency in this state, understood from a conversation with plaintiffs' attorneys that the summons had been properly served, and then demanded and accepted service of a copy-complaint. As soon as defendant's attorneys learned the real facts, without answering they made a motion to set aside the summons and complaint, as the defendant had not been brought within the jurisdiction of the Court.

This motion was refused, his honor saying that where a contract might be performed by one of the parties in one place and is to be performed by another one of the parties in another place, the contract may be performed in either place, and the cause of action may arise in either.

Defendants appealed upon several exceptions, all of which raised the single point that the cause of action did not arise in this State, and that, therefore, the motion should have been granted.

Messrs. Pope & Haskell, for appellants.

Messrs. N. K. Perry and J. T. Seibles, contra.

August 8, 1882. The opinion of the Court was delivered by

Mr. Justice MCGOWAN. "The Mutual Endowment Assessment Association of Baltimore, Maryland" is a body corporate, as its name indicates, of the State of Maryland. It seems to be a peculiar kind of life insurance company, which extends its benefits not by issuing policies of insurance to strangers in

*408

*the usual way, but by the parties to be insured becoming members of the association, and mutually participating in the profits and losses of the risks taken. When one is accepted as a member he receives a certificate that he is a beneficiary and "entitled to mortuary benefits, to be assessed according to the tables of the association; and to be paid at the office of the association within ninety days after the death of said member shall have been satisfactorily established. All dues payable at the office of the association in Baltimore."

It seems that the association had a canvassing agent, J. J. Mackey, who induced John W. Rodgers, of Columbia, South Carolina, to make application to become a member of the association, and gave him the following paper. "Office of Mutual Endowment Assessment Association, Baltimore, Md., Sept. 8, 1880. Per due bill. Received of J. W. Rodgers the sum of fifteen dollars, it being the amount specified in the application for a membership in the Mutual Endowment Assessment Association of Baltimore. If said application is not accepted by the association the above due bill shall be returned. (Signed) J. J. Mackey, Agent."

Nothing further appears to have been done until March 5, 1881, when Rodgers died without having received his certificate of membership. The association refused to pay anything and Anna S. Rodgers, widow, and the other plaintiffs, children of John W. Rodgers, filed the complaint in Richland County, South Carolina, claiming judgment against the association for $2,500, the alleged insurance on the life of the said John W. Rodgers, deceased. An order of publication was allowed against the corporation as an absent defendant, and a copy of the complaint was served on the secretary of the company in Baltimore. A motion was made on behalf of the defendant corporation to set aside the summons and complaint on the ground that the same had not been served on the defendants, so as to bring them within the jurisdiction of the Court. The Circuit Judge refused the motion and gave leave to answer, and the appeal comes to this Court alleging error in that order.

We agree with the Circuit Judge in disregarding the matter *of alleged acceptance of service by the attorney of the defendant, as that was clearly shown to have been a misunderstanding and was very properly not urged by the plaintiffs' attorney.

The single question is whether legal service was made upon the defendant, a foreign corporation, having neither office, officer nor property within the State. It is fundamental that a Court cannot adjudge any matter, unless the party interested is properly before it. Every man has a right to be heard and no binding judgment can be rendered against him unless he can be considered as legally present. Was the defendant here sued, a corporation of the State of Maryland, properly before the Court?

The old rule certainly was that a party could only be brought before the Court, so as to make the judgment binding upon him in one of two ways; that is to say, either by personal service in some form or other, or by seizing his property within the jurisdiction and making publication for him to come in and defend; and in the latter case the judgment could only affect the property attached.

But the code of procedure has made some change and laid down some rules upon the subject, intended to cover every case which can possibly arise under the general head of "Manner of commencing civil actions;" the first part of section 158 provides as follows: "When the person on whom service of summons is to be made can not, after due diligence, be found within the State, and that fact appears by affidavit to the satisfaction of the Court or a judge thereof, or of the Probate Judge of the County where the trial is to be had, and it in like manner appears that a cause of action exists against the defendant in respect to whom the service is to be made, or that he is a proper party to an action relating to real property in this State, such Court or judge may grant an order that the service be made by the publication of a summons in either of the following cases, viz.: Where the defendant is a foreign corporation, has property within the State, or the cause of action arose therein."

It is admitted that the corporation has no property in the State and the effort is made to bring this case under this provision, and the question is whether, according to the facts, the cause of action arose in this State. If not, the defendant could not be made a party by publication. What is the cause of action? We must keep in view the difference between the subject of action and the cause of action. The subject of action is what was formerly understood as the subject-matter of the action, and, as Mr. Pomeroy says, "finds its primary and far more important application in equitable rather than legal proceedings. The cause of action is the right claimed or wrong suffered by the plaintiff on the one hand and the duty or delict of the defendant on the other, and these appear by the facts of each separate case." See Hayes v. Clinkscales, 9 S. C. 453, where the doctrine is approved. "The cause of action must always consist of two factors, (1) the plaintiff's primary right and the defendant's primary duty, whatever be the subject to which they relate, person, character, property or contract; and (2) the delict, or wrongful act or omission of the defendant by which the primary right and duty have been violated."

According to these principles did the cause of action arise here or in Maryland? and in making this inquiry the first point is where, as matter of fact, was the alleged contract to be performed? "When the contract is made in one place and to be performed in another, the cause of action upon such contract arises at the latter place." Story's Conf. Laws, § 280; Bank of Commerce v. Railroad Co. 10 How. Prac. 1, and the authorities cited. We will not consider any agreement alleged to have been made in this State between Mackey, the agent, and Rodgers at the time the due bill and receipt were executed, except what appears in those papers. They must be looked to as containing the contract, if any, and looking at them we cannot see that any contract was made in the State, except that Rodgers, having taken the initiatory step, might file his application for admission as a member of the association, and if "said application is not accepted by the said association the above due bill shall be returned." The admission was to depend on a future event and that was to be determined at Baltimore. It does not appear whether Rodgers ever applied and actually became a member, so as to be entitled "to the mortuary benefits." It is certain that he never received the certificate of membership, and it may be that he never complied with the requirements which were made necessary to full membership.

But assuming that he did apply, and, having paid up all his dues, was a full member when he died, from the very nature of the association, he was not merely a stranger insured, but a member of a foreign corporation; and though living in South Carolina, bound by all its rules, one of which was that in case of death, his representative would be entitled, not to a fixed and certain sum, but to benefits "to be assessed according to the tables of the association and at the office of the association in Baltimore, provided the assessment did not exceed $2500." If Rodgers never became a member no contract was ever consummated.

If he did become a member, and that membership imposed an obligation upon the corporation, it was by its terms to be performed in Baltimore. The applying member lived in this State, and the first preliminary step was taken in this State. He died in this State and the plaintiffs, who claim benefit from his act reside in this State, but the defendant corporation is located in Maryland, and the contract was to be performed there. The delict which created the cause of action was in refusing to pay the mortuary benefits according to the tables of the association, all which by the contract was to be done at the office in Baltimore. We cannot in any point of view, see that the cause of action arose in this State.

The judgment of this Court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed and the motion to dismiss the complaint granted.

Before Kershaw, J., Charleston, July, 1881.

Action by John Kennerty against the Etiwan Phosphate Company, commenced May 2, 1881. The opinion states the case.

[For subsequent opinion, see 21 S. C. 226, 53 Am. Rep. 669.]

Messrs. Robert Chisolm, A. G. Magrath, for appellants.

Messrs. Campbell & Whaley, A. T. Smythe, contra.

August 8, 1882. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. The plaintiff owns a farm near the works of the Etiwan Phosphate Company, which was incorporated for the purpose of carrying on the business of manufacturing commercial fertilizers. He alleges that in their business the defendants manufacture large quantities of sulphuric acid, which is one of the most pernicious gases in its effects upon vegetable and animal life; that the works are so constructed that sulphuric acid gas and other pernicious gases and noisome smells escape in the atmosphere and come over and on his farm and dwelling-house, to the injury of the crops and trees so as unpleasantly to affect him in his own person, both in his fields and home, and by so doing the plaintiff is irreparably damaged by the defendant corporation.

*The complaint further exhibits an agreement and covenant which on or about June 10th, 1876, the plaintiff entered into with the defendant corporation to settle a case then pending at law between the same parties for damages from the same cause, which, after requiring that the defendant company should pay $2250.00 and the costs of that action, $179.00, provided as follows: "And further, upon the said company raising the duct or escape pipes to their trunk, through which the fumes and gases from the manufactory are let off into the air to an elevation of twenty-five feet higher than their present elevation, being fifty-six feet high; and further, upon said company undertaking to keep, and actually keeping at all times their escape-pipes through which their fumes are let off at the said measured elevation and at the same distance from the land of the said John Kennerty as they now are, and their said pipes to be always of such a diameter that no greater volume of fumes can be precipitated through the top of the pipes than at present into the air. Thereupon the aforesaid terms and conditions being complied with by the company, and continued to be performed on their part, I, John Kennerty, do agree not to oppose opening of the verdict given in this case on the day of April, 1876: and at the option of the said company defendant will discontinue my present action against them, and release all claim of right of action for damages, past or future, against the said company, that may accrue to the crops of the adjacent lands of plaintiff, Kennerty, and arising from the fumes or gases that may escape from the company's works into the air, but for future damages resulting from this cause alone, and no other, do I release, and I consent not to sue the said company for damages arising from this cause, and from this alone, so long as the conditions herein stipulated to be kept by them are observed," etc. Appended to the contract was a receipt for the money agreed to be paid.

The plaintiff does not allege that the defendants have failed to perform any of the covenants to be by them performed. He does, however, allege that the danger of the injury above stated recurs with every season, and that he has no adequate *remedy at law, and prays an injunction against the defendant. An order was granted temporarily restraining the defendant from so using its works as to injure the plaintiff. It seems that an answer and a reply were filed, but without taking evidence, upon motion after notice, Judge Kershaw granted an order to dismiss the complaint upon the ground that "it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action." The parties disagreeing about the "Case" for the Supreme Court, the judge settled it by directing the answer and reply to be stricken out and only the complaint included. From this order the plaintiff appealed, and also from the order dismissing the complaint, upon the following exceptions:

1. Because in the pleadings in the case presented to the court, a cause of action was therein stated; which entitled the plaintiff to produce his proofs and be heard in support of his right to the relief asked for.

2. Because the defendant, having fully answered the complaint, admitted thereby a cause of action to be stated in the complaint; and could not, after such answer, move to dismiss the complaint on the ground that it did not set forth a cause of action.

3. Because his honor having read the pleadings in the case, the complaint, the answer and the reply, had before him a cause of action stated in the pleadings, that is, damage to the crop of the plaintiff by the wrongful act of the defendant; the answer of the defendant denying the damage, and pleading a release by the plaintiff from all actions for damage—past, present or future; and the reply of the plaintiff that the release relied on by the defendant was obtained under circumstances which did not entitle the defendant to the benefit of the defence, because of it set forth in the answer, should not have dismissed the complaint without full hearing.

4. Because the decree dismissing the complaint was made upon motion, not at the hearing of the case, and without opportunity to the defendant to sustain, by his proof, the averments of his complaint as to the damage he sustained; and to the release, as not giving the defendant the exemption from all suits for damages as claimed in the answer.

*5. Because the complaint set forth damage by the defendant to the plaintiff in two modes; first, in that done to his crop by the fumes and works of the defendant; and next, because of the damage done by fumes and vapors escaping from the works of the defendant; making his residence, because of offensive smells, unwholesome and uncomfortable; and for such damage the release set up the defendant did not in terms profess to exclude every right of action; but by the limitation in its terms to damage done to the crops, did not affect the plaintiff's right to sue for a cause of action, sounding in damages, because of injury done to his residence and home, as such.

6. Because the decree dismissing the complaint would bar the plaintiff from any recovery against the defendant because of damage done to his crops, his property, his residence and home, his health, and his person because of a paper set up as a release; and excludes all evidence to prove that such paper, so called a release, was not binding on the plaintiff, and could not give to the defendant an exemption of liability for all damages, however sustained, and occasioned by the acts of the defendant willful or otherwise.

The appeal from the order "settling the case" was not argued here, and we regard it as properly abandoned.

The first four exceptions make the point substantially that after answer filed and issue joined it was too late to consider the case exclusively with reference to the allegations of the complaint; and that the judge should have allowed the plaintiff to prove the facts of the case put in issue. The objection was in fact an oral demurrer, under the sixth head of section 167 of the Code upon the ground that "the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action."

The Code enacts that the only pleading on the part of the defendant shall be a demurrer, or an answer, and after setting out the grounds upon which alone a demurrer can be interposed, provides in section 171 that "if such objection be not taken by demurrer or answer, the defendant shall be deemed to have waived the same, excepting only the objection to the jurisdiction of the court, and the objection that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action." *In accordance with this exception it has often been held, both in New York and in this State, that such objection may be made at any stage of the proceedings, even after issue joined and the case heard. Southern Porcelain Manufacturing Co. v. Thew, 5 S. C. 10; Bowden & Earle v. Winsmith, 11 S. C. 411; Balle v. Moseley, 13 S. C. 440; Coffin v. Reynolds, 37 N. Y. 640. In the last case cited it is expressly said: "It was clearly right to entertain the application at that stage of the case, since the code provides that the specific objection that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action need not be taken by answer or demurrer, but is available in any stage of the action."

All the other exceptions insist that the complaint did state facts sufficient to authorize the court to grant the injunction prayed for, and that the order dismissing the complaint was error. The principles involved are important and the consequences serious. It is not a small matter to embarrass or destroy an industry so useful as that of the Etiwan Phosphate Company, because of the consequences of operating their works in a legitimate business chartered by the State, upon their own land, and with no unlawful intent; and on the other hand it is even more important to secure to every man the enjoyment of that which is a common right, the use of pure and uncorrupted air.

For the purposes of the case we must consider the statements of the complaint as true, and so considering them, was such a case made as entitled the plaintiff to the injunction prayed for? First consider how the matter would stand if there had been no former action between the parties or covenant on the part of the plaintiff not to sue, but the action was an original proceeding of the plaintiff against the defendant for injunction. The matter complained of was that the works of the defendant company operated as a private nuisance, injuring the plaintiff in his person and in his property. The complaint was in the equity jurisdiction, not for past damages for corrupting the air, but for an injunction against the throwing off of such gases in the future, even if it resulted in the stoppage of the works. *The existence or non-existence of a nuisance was necessarily involved in the question.

The Court of Equity is not the appropriate tribunal for the trial of such an issue. In such case the general rule undoubtedly is that equity will not grant an injunction until the legal rights of the parties are determined and the fact that a nuisance exists is established in a law court, which is the proper tribunal to decide such questions and measure the damages. The fact of damage is one which the defendant had a right to have passed upon by a jury, and the right of the plaintiff in case of success in that issue to have an injunction against the continuance of the nuisance was supplementary thereto. It may be conceded that the facts stated would constitute a cause of action at law for damages, but it does not necessarily follow that they constitute a cause of action in equity as an original proceeding for the special relief of injunction.

"The equity for an injunction attaches only on an admitted or legally adjudged right in the plaintiff, admitted or legally adjudged to be infringed by the defendant. The existence of the right and the fact of its infringement must be tried, if disputed, in a court of law, and therefore if the plaintiff resorts to equity in the first instance he should move forthwith for an interlocutory injunction to protect his alleged right until decree, and thus give an opportunity for directing the trial at law, so that when the cause comes on for hearing it may be ready for immediate adjudication. When a motion for an interlocutory injunction is made, the court, having regard to the extent of prima facie title shown, the probability of mischief to the property, and the balance of inconvenience on either side, will either grant the injunction accompanied by a provision for putting the legal right into an immediate course of trial, or will send the parties to law, directing the defendant to keep an account, or will merely retain the bill with liberty to the plaintiff to proceed at law." Adams' Equity, 497; Wilson v. Cohen, Rice's Eq. 83. The complaint in this case neither alleged that the nuisance charged had been admitted or legally adjudged, nor that an action was pending in a law court, nor did it ask leave to make up an issue to try the question.

"It is true to this general rule there are exceptions. The court as an original matter will intervene in extreme cases, for example when the thing itself is a nuisance per se, or the mischief is irreparable and not susceptible of compensation in damages. The doctrine as we understand it is stated in the case of the Mohawk Bridge Co. v. The U. and S. R. R. Co., 6 Paige, 563. "The principles upon which the court should proceed in granting or refusing relief by injunction in cases of this kind are correctly laid down by Lord Brougham in the recent case of The Earl of Ripon v. Hobert (Cooper's Rep. temp. Brougham, 343). If the thing sought to be prohibited is in itself a nuisance, the court will interfere to stay irreparable mischief, where the complainant's right is not doubtful, without waiting for the result of a trial. But where the thing sought to be restrained is not in itself noxious, but only something which may, according to circumstances, prove to be so, the court will refuse to interfere, until the matter has been tried at law by an action; though in particular cases the court may direct an issue, for its own satisfaction, where an action could not be brought in such a form as to meet the question."

It was not alleged that the operation of defendant's works authorized by the Legislature was in itself a nuisance, "but only something which may according to circumstances prove to be so," nor was it alleged that the right had been decided at law, and it is at least doubtful whether the facts stated, under the circumstances, made out such a case of irreparable mischief as required the judge, without reference to a trial at law, to grant the injunction.

But there can be no doubt, when we consider the allegation of the complaint that there had been a former action at law by the plaintiff against the defendant for the same causes, which action the plaintiff had compromised and for valuable consideration covenanted with the defendant to discontinue, and to release all claim or right of action for damages present or future against the said company arising from the fumes or gases that may escape from the company's works in the air; "but for the future damage resulting from this cause and no other, do I release &c.: and I consent not to sue the said company for *damages arising from this cause, so long as the conditions herein stipulated to be kept by them, are observed."

The plaintiff agreed to release and "not to sue for future damage arising from the fumes or gases that may escape from the company's works in the air, etc.," the identical thing he is now seeking relief against by way of injunction. It seems to us that considering the whole of this agreement together, and the circumstances under which it was executed, the fair construction of it is, that the parties intended to bar all judicial proceedings for the same cause—a suit in equity for injunction as well as suit at law for damages. We do not suppose that the parties had in view the difference between an action at law and a proceeding in equity, and that in providing against the former they intentionally omitted to provide against the latter, which would enable the party covenanting against future suits for damages, to accomplish his purpose only the more effectually in another way, by injunction. The qualification in the covenant has reference to the cause, and not the objects to be affected by it "for damages arising from this cause and this alone."

But if we restrict the agreement to the technical meaning of the terms used, the covenant not to sue for future damages incidentally affected the remedy by injunction in the equity jurisdiction, for the reason that in any and every view there can be no injunction without the legal right to rest upon. Injunction is a matter of grace and without the legal right as a foundation will not be granted; "Equity will not grant an injunction for the protection of a naked legal right, which plaintiff and those under whom he claims have covenanted not to exercise." Bosby v. McKim, 7 Harr. & John., 468. In that case Justice Dorsey said "The annals of judicial proceedings do not furnish a case, where a court of Equity has granted a perpetual injunction to a plaintiff to protect him in the enjoyment of a naked legal right, which he and those under whom he claims, have by the most solemn deeds stipulated not to exercise."

But it is urged that the agreement was not binding on the plaintiff; that it was executed at the suggestion of defendant upon erroneous advice, and so far as it undertook to covenant *against suing for future injuries was illegal and void. No allegation is made in the complaint that it was obtained by misrepresentation or fraud. It would not be enough to invalidate the covenant, if it was executed upon erroneous advice or at the suggestion of the defendant, or that the plaintiff was mistaken in his judgment as to the effect of the changes required to be made in the works, or from all these causes combined. The plaintiff entered into it deliberately, received the consideration in money, and acquiesced in it for a number of years.

Without entering into the learning with which the point was argued at the bar, whether a covenant not to sue for future injuries from a known cause in existence is good, or without considering the precise difference between a covenant not to sue, and the conveyance of an easement or an executed license, it is enough for us to say, that there can be no doubt that the plaintiff is estopped from doing what he covenanted under seal he would not do. Whilst compromising a suit then pending for past damages arising from a certain cause, the plaintiff, for value received, covenanted not to sue again for injuries from the same cause if they should arise in the future. When such injuries do afterwards arise as alleged he cannot disregard his covenant. To allow him to do so would operate as a fraud.

It may be true that as a general rule a thing in the future cannot be released, but a covenant for a consideration not to do a particular thing, such as building a house, or in some uncertain emergency to seek legal redress, will be enforced in order to avoid circuitry of action and upon the principle of estoppel. As was said by Chief Justice Spencer in the case of Chandler v. Herrick, 19 John, 134: "It is well settled that a covenant never to sue an obligor may be pleaded as a release to avoid circuitry of action." Covenant not to sue, if it convey or pass no present right, is an agreement to pass it when it occurs: like a covenant for future assurances, it is a warranty that the expressed intention shall not be defeated by the grantor or his privies. Big. Est. 333.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

*PEAKE v. PEAKE.

(April Term, 1882.)

[1. Appeal and Error ⇨1000; Equity ⇨381.]

The verdict of a jury upon issues referred to them out of chancery is entitled to great weight, but is not absolutely binding upon the conscience of the Judge who hears and decides the case.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 3926; Dec. Dig. ⇨1000; Equity, Cent. Dig. § 816; Dec. Dig. ⇨381.]

[2. Equity 381.]

Upon the trial of the case by the Court after such verdict, the Judge has the power to hear further testimony upon the issues considered by the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Equity, Cent. Dig. §§ 813-817; Dec. Dig. ⇨381.]

[3. Equity ⇨381.]

After a verdict on issues referred certified to by the Judge presiding, with his own approval of the findings, judgment cannot be entered up on the law side of the court in accordance with such verdict, but there must be a further hearing of the cause by the Court on its equity side.

Before Fraser, J., Abbeville, November, 1881.

At the hearing of this appeal Hon. J. H. HUDSON, of the Fourth Circuit, sat in the place of Mr. Justice McGOWAN, who had been of counsel in the cause.

The order of the Circuit Judge fully presents the case, and its statements will be found in the opinion of this Court. Continuing, the Circuit Judge thus gives the reasons which influenced his judgment:

To enable a judge properly to decide an issue of fact, he should have the right, when parties deem it necessary for their protection, to hear the testimony for himself, and even to see the witnesses. If he is to render a judgment on the law and the facts, he ought not only to hear the testimony and see the witnesses, but he ought to have control and direction of the whole question of the introduction and the admissibility of evidence. When the testimony is taken by the Master or Referee, these matters can be reviewed on exception. There can be no exception to the admissibility of the evidence taken by another Judge, and no appeal from his rulings to another Circuit Judge, though it has been the practice to order new issues or even the same issues to be again submitted to a jury, in order that their verdict may aid the Chancellor in a doubtful case. The practice originated in cases where on hearing the evidence such doubt has arisen in the mind of the Chancellor as to induce *him to ask the aid of a jury. It seems to me not to be a mere question of practice but one of jurisdiction.

Now, there is no good reason why one Circuit Judge should be required, under an order for the trial of issues, to act as a master of the court or a Referee to report the testimony, and the practice has never been to consider him bound "to state the evidence and give a minute history of the trial." See 2 Dan. Ch. Prac., (1st Am. Ed.) p. 1305, note C. Judge Kershaw does not say in his certificate that he reports in full the oral testimony, but only "notes of oral testimony." From my own personal experience, I do not consider notes of testimony taken by a presiding Judge on a trial before a jury as sufficiently full and accurate to be relied on with entire confidence in a large majority of the cases in which issues are ordered. To hold that they must be received as the only testimony which can be used on trial, would make one Judge very little more than a clerk for another.

It was for this, and perhaps other reasons, held that "notwithstanding the verdict, the party against whom it was given has a right to proceed in his case." (Story Eq. Jur., § 1479 and note x,) and that "a Chancellor may decide every question of fact for himself," (§ 376 and note.) It is for this reason that in some courts where parties ask for an issue of fact to be tried by a jury, the Court has put them on terms to agree beforehand to abide the result. See Ansdell v. Ansdell, 4 Myl. & Cr., 449, 454. It may be that in some of the States the practice is, in all cases, to consider the finding of the jury as conclusive on the issues submitted to them, but such practice has not been adopted here. The language of the Court on this subject in Sloan v. Westfield, 11 S. C. 445, and other cases, is in conformity to what I think is the law in reference to these trials.

If we assume, as contended here, that by the Code and the rules of court parties have a right to demand an order for the trial of the issues of fact in an equity case before a jury, I do not find it anywhere laid down that the verdict is conclusive, or that the Judge has no right to hear the whole case on the testimony and exercise an original jurisdiction on hearing the whole case, when it is his duty under the Constitution and law

*to render judgment on the law and the facts. Unless the will of the Legislature to restrict a Circuit Judge hearing an equity case as a Chancellor to the testimony taken before a jury on the trial of issues at second hand without seeing the witnesses and without any control over the process by which the testimony was introduced, was expressed in clear and unmistakable language, I would hesitate long before I would adopt such a construction of the Code or rules of court.

To hold that a Circuit Judge who hears an equity case after verdict on issues tried by a jury, is bound to render a judgment as proposed by the motion now before me, would seriously interfere with the jurisdiction conferred on him by the Constitution. The motion must therefore be refused with ten dollars costs.

From this order the assignees of Jennings, Smith & Co. appealed upon the following exceptions:

1. Because, under the Constitution, statutes, and rules of court of this State, the verdict of the jury in this case is final and conclusive as to the matters of fact submitted to them for determination by the order of the Court, and being in favor of said defendants upon all the issues of fact, it was error in the presiding Judge not to render judgment that the pretended mortgage of plaintiff is fraudulent and void as to said defendants, in accordance with the verdict of the jury.

2. Because, according to the English chancery practice and the chancery practice of this State, it was error in the presiding Judge not to render judgment in favor of said defendants, based upon the verdict of the jury in favor of said defendants upon all the issues of fact submitted to them, accompanied with the certificate of Judge Kershaw that he saw no reason to be dissatisfied with said verdict.

3. Because it was error in the presiding Judge not to try the case upon the report of Judge Kershaw, his notes of the testimony taken on the trial of the issues, the depositions of witnesses examined by the Master and by commission, the verdict of the jury, the certificate of Judge Kershaw, and the other papers in the case.

4. Because it was error in the presiding Judge not to render judgment in favor of said defendants in accordance with their motion, of which notice was duly given.

5. Because it was error in the presiding Judge to hold that he could not decide the case without having the witnesses before him.

Mr. A. Burt. for appellant.

Messrs. W. H. Parker and L. W. Perrin, contra.

May 27, 1882. The opinion of the Court was delivered by

Mr. Justice HUDSON. In the introduction of his decree the Circuit Judge makes the following statement:

"This case came before me at the Special Term of the Court of Common Pleas held for Abbeville County in November, 1881. The action was brought to foreclose a mortgage given to James W. Peake, the plaintiff, by William H. Peake. Jennings, Smith & Co., who had obtained a judgment against William H. Peake after the date of the mortgage, were made parties defendant, and in their answer alleged that the mortgage was fraudulent and void, and should be so adjudged, and proper relief given. Since the commencement of the action there have been several transfers of interest from the original parties, which I presume have been properly provided for in the case as it now stands. On February 4, 1876, the cause came up before his Honor Judge T. H. Cooke, and an order was made by him of that date, that certain issues of fact in reference to this allegation of fraud should be tried by a jury, and that the case should be placed on Calendar No. 1. On February 7, 1881, at a term of the Court of Common Pleas held for Abbeville County, his Honor Judge Kershaw presiding, these issues were submitted to a jury, and a verdict rendered that the mortgage was fraudulent, and in favor of the defendants, Jennings, Smith & Co. On April 29, 1881, two months and twenty-two days after this trial, by giving and rendition of the verdict, Judge Kershaw signed a certificate of the verdict of the jury accompanied with the testimony, some of which was taken by commission and some by the Master, and also the notes of oral testimony taken on the trial by the jury before *him. Judge Kershaw also certified that he saw 'no reason for being dissatisfied with the verdict.' The cause was found by me on Calendar No. 1 and Calendar No. 2, and I marked it, 'Heard on both.' It was heard by me, however, only on a motion on notice by the assignees of Jennings, Smith & Co., who have been made parties, 'for judgment in accordance with the verdict of the jury rendered herein.' Counsel for the motion insisted on his right to have this motion heard and disposed of on Calendar No. 1. Plaintiff's counsel claimed the right to go into the whole case anew, and have the case heard in full upon testimony as an equity cause on Calendar No. 2.

"Until the motion for judgment is disposed of, I did not think it proper to complicate the case by hearing any motion on the part of the plaintiff as to the mode of trial or character of the testimony he expected to introduce."

The Circuit Judge proceeds to consider the propositions involved in the motion as touching questions of jurisdiction and practice, and renders judgment refusing the motion to enter up judgment on Calendar No. 1 in accordance with the verdict of the jury, holding that the cause is still open for a final hearing on Calendar No. 2.

In this he is correct. The confusion which has arisen upon the practice in such cases as the present, and which has brought the question so often to this court, arises from the blending by statute of the courts of law and equity into one, and of all actions, legal and equitable, into one, denominated civil action. To avoid this confusion and doubt in matters of jurisdiction and practice we should keep clearly in mind the distinction between an action in which a legal right is sought to be enforced or wrong redressed, and one in which the relief demanded is equitable, and the forms of trial prescribed in these actions respectively. This can best be done by regarding the Court of Common Pleas, whilst hearing the first class of cases, a court of law, and whilst hearing the last class of cases, a court of equity. In the court of law trial by jury is demandable as a matter of right in actions there pending, and judgment on verdict of the jury must be entered, and generally without motion.

*In a court of equity the relief demanded is obtainable only on judgment or decree of the court, and trial by jury is not demandable as a matter of right. It is discretionary with the Judge whether any or all the issues of fact arising in a civil action for equitable relief shall be referred to a jury for determination. If an issue be referred, the verdict of the jury though entitled to great weight, so much so, that it will be, and ordinarily is accepted as conclusive of the issue of fact, yet it is not absolutely binding on the conscience of the Judge, but may be accepted or rejected by him according to the conclusion he may have arrived at upon hearing the evidence, if he presided at the trial, or may form from a careful review thereof, if certified to him by the Judge who did preside at the trial of the issues. But whether he be the Judge who tried the issues of fact on Calendar 1, before a jury, and then heard the whole cause on Calendar 2, on the equity side of the court, or whether he only hears the cause on the latter calendar, with the verdict of the jury and the evidence on which it rests certified to him by the Circuit Judge who presided at the trial of the issues on Calendar 1; in neither instance can he enter up judgment on the verdict, nor order it to be done, but must grant or refuse the relief demanded, according to his own findings of fact and conclusions of law upon a full hearing of the whole cause on its merits on Calendar 2, on the equity side, so to speak, of the court.

At such a hearing, whilst it would be an unusual thing for the Judge to hear further testimony upon the issues passed upon by the jury, yet he has the power to do so, and for good and satisfactory cause shown, would do so. It is for his judgment to be convinced and his conscience to be satisfied before he grants or refuses the relief demanded; and to this end the services of jury are often invoked with great advantage to the ends of justice; and the verdict is generally entitled to great respect, and ordinarily will be suffered to prevail in fixing the facts of the case referred for determination.

This Court has in a series of decisions announced and endeavored to make clear the law which under our present system governs questions of jurisdiction and the rules of practice in *the trial and final determination of equitable actions like the present, in which issues of fact are referred to a jury. Sloan v. Westfield, 11 S. C. 448; C. C. & A. R. R. Co. v. Earle, 12 S. C. 54; Ivy v. Claussen, 14 S. C. 273, and authorities there cited; Grierson v. Harmon, 16 S. C. 618; Ostendorff v. Brown, 15 S. C. 616; are some of the series of cases in which this Court has prescribed the rule of practice and jurisdiction controlling Circuit Judges in determining actions for equitable relief, where the parties on motion, or the Court of its own accord, have invoked the aid of a jury in deciding questions of fact.

The present action seeks to foreclose a mortgage and sell the mortgaged premises, and therefore demands equitable relief. The defence of the judgment creditors is that the mortgage is as to them fraudulent and void, and they ask that it be by the Court so adjudged and vacated accordingly. The relief here sought is affirmative and equitable, and can no more be had upon the verdict of a jury solely than can the relief demanded by the plaintiff. The cause was placed on Calendar No. 1, for the sole purpose of having a jury to determine the issues of fact referred to them. Upon the rendition of that verdict, the cause on that calendar was ended, and was not open to a motion for a judgment on verdict. After this finding of the jury the only proper place for the cause was on Calendar 2; upon the call of which, the whole cause, embodying this verdict and the material to support it, stood for full hearing and final decree of the Judge, sitting as chancellor. At such hearing on Calendar 2 the Judge, as Chancellor, could not have granted a motion for "judgment in accordance with the verdict," but could only, after a full hearing of the whole case, have granted or refused the relief demanded according to the view he may have taken of the verdict of the jury. He could affirm or disregard it according to his own convictions, and shape his decree accordingly.

We only speak of the Judge's powers and jurisdiction, and the practice in such cases, and design to say nothing which may restrain the Judge before whom this cause may come for further hearing on the circuit, in so far as his discretionary *powers may be involved in the details of the hearing and adjudging of the cause. Our purpose has only been to reiterate our views upon the questions of jurisdiction and practice involved in this appeal, and place the action in its present stage in a proper attitude and status in the court below. The appeal of the defendants, which seeks to reverse the judgment below, and to obtain leave to enter up judgment for the appellants on Calendar No. 1, in accordance with the verdict of the jury, without further hearing, of the cause on Calendar No. 2, cannot be sustained.

Wherefore it is the judgment of this Court that the appeal be dismissed, and the action be remanded to the Circuit Court for a hearing in accordance with the principles herein announced.

PRATT v. MCGHEE.

[1. Wills ⇐552.]

In the statutory provision, "if any child should die in the lifetime of the father or mother having issue, any legacy given in the last will of such father or mother shall go to such issue" (5 Stat. 107, § 9; Gen. Stat. ch. lxxxvi, § 13), the word "legacy" is used in its technical sense, and does not include a devise of land, as appears from a comparison of this section with other sections of the same act.

[Cited in Roundtree v. Roundtree, 26 S. C. 469, 2 S. E. 474; Brock v. O'Dell, 44 S. C. 41, 21 S. E. 976; Logan v. Brunson, 56 S. C. 11, 33 S. E. 737.

[2. Wills ⇐775.]

A devise of land to a son of testator lapses where the son dies before his father; and if the son leave issue who survive the testator, they do not take under the devise.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. §§ 1997-2000; Dec. Dig. ⇐775.]

Before Fraser, J., Abbeville, November, 1881.

Hon. J. H. HUDSON, of the Fourth Circuit, occupied the seat of Mr. Justice McGOWAN, who had been of counsel in the cause.

Action by Louisa J. Pratt, Margaret Clinkscales, and others against Leonora McGhee, Claudia Ellis, John R. Ellis, and Robert Pratt, executor, for partition, account for advancements, etc. The opinion states the facts of the case.

The circuit decree, omitting its statement of facts, was as follows:

I find that all the portions given off by the testator to his *children were given off anterior to the date of the will. I find it difficult to state accurately the amount and value of these portions, but the testimony shows clearly that the portions or advancements made to John R. Ellis were at least double what was given to either of the other children. The complaint alleges that there is not sufficient personalty to pay "the debts, funeral expenses, and pecuniary legacies." If there is anything in the testimony to show that any part of the pecuniary legacies will be paid out of the estate it has escaped me.

It is not easy to arrive at a satisfactory conclusion as to the proper construction of this Sec. 13, above referred to. If the words "when living" refer to the period after the date of the will, then the parties are all equal, because the evidence shows that during this period the testator gave nothing to any of his children, unless it be held that the use of the plantation and stock by the son as above set forth was a portion to him. If the words refer to a period of time anterior to the date of the will, then John R. Ellis received a much larger portion than the other children. In this view of the facts it is not important to consider the dictum of Chancellor Johnston in Pegues v. Pegues, 11 Rich. Eq. 554, suggesting that this expression in the section ought to be construed to apply to portions given after the date of the will.

The most serious difficulty in the way of the claim made by the issue of John Robert Ellis in this case is that the section refers to "legacies," and the gift in this case is a tract of land. A gift of personalty in a will is called a legacy, and a gift of land is called a devise. The primary signification of the word legacy is a gift of personalty, and this word is never construed to include a gift of land in a will unless there is something in the context which shows that the testator did use it in this latter sense. The text writers, Jarman, Roper, and Williams, are very clear that this is the signification of the word "legacy." There is a very wide distinction between a legacy and a devise—a gift of personalty and a gift of land in a will. They are governed by different rules and have different values in the order of distribution and administration.

1. When this Section 13 was first introduced into our statutes, personal property acquired after the date of the will would pass under it if covered by its terms—land acquired after the date of the will would not pass under it. It is true that has been changed, but the illustration remains the same.
2. Any legacy in a will, or as I hold the same any gift of personalty, could be adeemed by the testator standing in loco parentis by gifts of personalty, after the date of the will, when an intention to adeem appears—but a devise, or gift of land in a will, cannot be so adeemed—Allen v. Allen, 13 S. C. 512 [36 Am. Rep. 716].
3. All pecuniary legacies and specific legacies or gifts of specific property in a will are liable in the course of administration to be subjected to the payment of testator's debts before the real estate can be reached for this purpose.

When such distinctions as these exist between legacies and devises, or personal and real property passing under a will, I cannot hold that the legacy, which in its natural and ordinary sense means a gift of personalty only, when used in an act of the Legislature should be construed to include land unless there is something in the context to control it. I find nothing in this section which points to a different meaning—and the preceding and following sections show that these distinctions between the different kinds of property were constantly in the mind of the Legislature.

It is therefore ordered and adjudged that a writ of partition do issue, etc.

The defendants, children of John R. Ellis, deceased, appealed, upon four grounds, all of which raised the point that his honor erred in his construction of the 9th section of the act of 1789, or if correct, that he should have decreed to them the personal property given to their father by his father's will.

Messrs. Noble & Noble, for appellants.

Messrs. Parker & McGowon, L. W. Perrin, contra.

June 3d, 1882. The opinion of the Court was delivered by *Mr. Justice HUDSON. In 1872 John L. Ellis, late of the County of Abbeville, made and executed his last will and testament, and in 1879 departed this life, leaving the same unrevoked.

*431

He left surviving him five children, who are the first-named plaintiffs, and six grandchildren, three of whom, children of a deceased daughter, Eliza McDaniel, are also plaintiffs, and three others, children of a deceased son, John R. Ellis, are defendants, joined with Robert Pratt, who is the sole executor of the said will. He left no widow. The chief object of the testator's bounty was his son, John Robert Ellis, to whom, in the first clause of his will, he gave his entire real estate, consisting of a tract of six hundred and ninety-three acres of land, and also, with slight exception, all his personal property, consisting of his household and kitchen furniture and live stock of all kinds. To each of his daughters he gave thirty dollars; to the children of Eliza McDaniel, deceased, thirty dollars betwixt them, and to his grandson, Robert N. Pratt, a watch. After the making of this will, but before the death of the testator, his said son, John R. Ellis, to wit, in 1873, departed this life, leaving a widow, Margaret Ellis, and three children, Leonora McGhee, Claudia Ellis, and John R. Ellis, the two last being minors.

In this complaint, which seeks a partition and settlement of the estate of their testator, the plaintiffs claim that the gift of land and personalty to the son, John R. Ellis, lapsed by reason of his having predeceased his father, and because he had been during life more than "equally portioned" with the other children; and hence they pray that the said land and personal property set forth in the devise and bequest to him, may be partitioned among the heirs-at-law of John L. Ellis as intestate property. This claim is resisted by the defendants, children of John R. Ellis, who contend that their father, in his lifetime, was not equally portioned with the other children of John L. Ellis, and that the gift to him under the first clause of the said will is saved from lapsing by sec. 13, chap.

lxxxvi, General Stat. 444, which is the re-enactment of sec. 9, act of 1789, 5 Stat. 107.

*The original section reads as follows: "That if any child should die in the lifetime of the father or mother leaving issue, any legacy given in the last will of such father or mother shall go to such issue, unless such deceased child was equally portioned with the other children, by the father or mother when living." In the re-enactment in the Revised Statutes this language is not changed.

The circuit judge found as a matter of fact, that John R. Ellis had been, while living, greatly more than equally portioned with the other children of the testator, John L. Ellis. He further held that the term "legacy" in the 13th sec. aforesaid cannot be construed to include a devise of realty, but must be construed to apply only to a gift of personalty, according to its legal technical meaning. Under this construction of the statute, and in view of the fact that John Robert Ellis had already been equally portioned with the other children, he held that the entire devise and bequest to him in the first clause of the will lapsed upon his predeceasing his father, and became after the death of the testator distributable among his heirs-at-law as intestate property. Accordingly he decreed partition to be made as craved by the plaintiffs. This judgment is appealed from by the children of John R. Ellis, who seek in this court a reversal of the construction by the circuit judge of the statute aforesaid, under and by virtue of which they claim that the gift to their father is saved from lapse and goes to them.

After a careful examination of the entire act of 1789, which contains many sections, and a like careful examination and comparison of chap. lxxxvi, Gen. Stat. 444, with its many clauses and sections, we are constrained to conclude that the Legislature used the word "legacy" in its technical legal sense, and no other. In the sections which precede and follow this clause, both in the old and new act, the terms "devise," "bequest" and "legacy" are used invariably in this strictly technical sense, the word devise being in each section made to refer to a gift of realty, and the words legacy and bequest to gifts of personalty. It thus appears that these words are nowhere in these acts used as synonymous terms, but always with an appropriate distinction and legal significance.

*The terms were well understood by the legislatures which, at the two periods separated by nearly a century, used them throughout with the closest regard to their respective differences and technical meaning. In no section of either act would the sense be retained by substituting one of these words for the other or by enlarging one so as to embrace the others. Why then should we conclude that in this single section the legislature inadvertently used the word, "legacy" in an untechnical sense, and intended to imply thereby a gift of realty (a devise) as well as of personalty, when in all other sections the true distinction is carefully preserved?

We know of no canon of construction which, when brought to bear upon this entire act, will conduct us to such a conclusion. We are told that there is no reason why the legislature should intend to save a legacy from lapsing, which would not more strongly induce that body to likewise preserve a devise of real estate to the issue of a pre-deceased child; and that therefore we must conclude that by the term legacy in this clause a devise is likewise meant. But as the question is, not what the legislature ought to have intended, but what they did intend, we must examine the whole context of the act to ascertain that intention. Such examination demonstrates the fact that in every other clause of the act a gift of real estate is styled a devise, a gift of personal estate is called a legacy or bequest, and a gift of both real and personal property is entitled a devise and bequest. Had a joint gift of real and personal property been contemplated in the 13th section, it would have been likewise designated a devise and bequest, and not untechnically a legacy.

In the statute of Victoria upon this subject, and in the acts of the legislatures of all those States of the Union which have made similar provision against the lapsing of gifts to pre-deceased children, the terms "devise and bequest," or others equally unequivocal and comprehensive, are employed. The fact that our legislature for nearly a century has adhered to the simple word "legacy," with a full knowledge of its appropriate and limited signification, is evidence of an intention to save only a gift of personalty from lapsing.

To cover realty as well as personalty, in its terms, will require further legislation. The courts cannot supply the place of legislation by enlarging the meaning of a word of limited purport, which the legislature has used knowingly and advisedly.

If this clause of the act stood alone as a separate enactment the argument that, in the reason and nature of things, the legislature could not have intended to save from lapse perishable personal property, and to suffer the more valuable real property to pass from the issue of a pre-deceased child might have been urged with special force, and would probably induce the Court to widen the meaning of the term "legacy" so as to embrace all gifts, whether of land or goods. But controlled in the context of this Act, as it must be, by the language that precedes and follows it, the term must be restricted to its legal sense.

Numerous cases have been cited by counsel from the law books both of England and America, where in last wills and testaments, the use of the term legacy by the testator, the Courts have held to be synonymous with, or as comprehensive as, the terms "devise and bequest." But an examination of these cases will discover the fact that the testator in each instance, used the word in a popular sense, and clearly intended thereby to embrace both real and personal estate. Without thus enlarging the meaning, the will was either unintelligible, or the clear intent of the testator would be defeated. Hence, in order to carry into effect the interest of the testator apparent from the context, the courts have very properly construed the word legacy to include land as well as personal property in many cases. As authority for this construction, see 1 Jarm. Wills, Note, 145 1; 1 Redf. Wills, (3rd ed.), *617; Ladd v. Harvey, 21 N. H. 528; Brady v. Cubitt, 1 Doug. 31-39. Decisions to the like effect in construing wills are numerous, the controlling guide in each case being the manifest intention of the testator. But just as in these numerous instances it was manifest that the testator intended by the word "legacy" to embrace land as well as goods and chattels in his gift, so in the case now before the Court, resting upon the statute in question, it is equally clear that the legislature used the term in its technical sense.

*Wherefore, we concur with the Circuit Judge in his construction of the statute, and nothing in the brief submitted, appears as evidence to show that the son, John Robert Ellis, was not equally portioned with the other children. The Circuit Judge found that he was greatly more than apportioned, and in this we see no error. He concludes that under the statute and the evidence, the whole gift, both of land and personal property, lapsed, and in this view we concur. We deem it unnecessary to notice other minor points not urged in argument, and not affecting the case.

It is the judgment of this Court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed, that the cause be remanded to the Circuit Court to have the decree below carried into effect, and that the appeal be dismissed.

Before Aldrich, J., Laurens, September, 1881.

Hon. J. H. HUDSON, of the Fourth Circuit, sat in the place of the CHIEF JUSTICE, who had been concerned in the cause.

*Action by John R. Finley et al. against V. B. Robertson. The opinion makes a full statement of the case.

Messrs. Brown & Tribble, for appellants.

Messrs. Ball & Watts, contra.

June 10, 1882. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice HUDSON. In 1851 John Finley was seized in fee simple of a tract of 547 acres of land in the County (then District) of Laurens, called the homestead tract, on which he lived. In 1852 he died, leaving of force his last will and testament, in which, among other provisions, he devised as follows: "I give to my son James Finley, and the heirs of his body, after the death of my wife, Polly Finley, my homestead tract of land whereon I now live." The testator nominated his said son, James Finley, executor of his said will, the administration of which he undertook, and in 1864 his accounts were passed upon by the ordinary of Laurens District, who directed him to reserve until the proper time a legacy of $2000.00 specially bequeathed by the testator to his granddaughter, Mary Francis Finley, child of Hampton G. Finley, and to pay to her and to each of four residuary legatees the sum of $4697.75 found to be due to them respectively.

In 1861, Polly Finley, the widow of testator, died, and in 1871 James Finley died, leaving the present plaintiffs surviving heirs of his body. John R. Finley administered upon the estate of his father, James; and in 1875, Mary Francis Finley, who had intermarried with Thomas Langston, joined her said husband in an action in the Court of Probate for the County of Laurens, against John R. Finley as administrator of the estate of James Finley, deceased executor of John Finley, to recover of him the pecuniary legacies bequeathed to Mary Francis in the will aforesaid. The judgment recovered in this action was for the total sum (principal and interest) of $10,951.29.

Subsequently the said Fannie Langston and Thomas Langston, her husband, as creditors of the estate of James Finley, *entered suit in the said Court of Probate in the nature of a creditors' bill to marshal the assets of the estate of James Finley, and to sell his land in aid of the personality to pay debts. To this action the administrator aforesaid of James Finley and all and singular the children who were the heirs of his body were made parties defendant by the acceptance of service of a summons signed neither by the attorneys of the plaintiffs, nor by the Probate Judge, but with it a complaint which was duly signed by counsel. Except as to the signature the summons was in due form, and the complaint, of which service was likewise accepted, clearly set forth the object of the suit. Of the defendants thus accepting service, all were adults except Margaret T. Finley and Thomas R. Finley, who were aged respectively about sixteen and eighteen years.

On October 5th, 1877, W. H. Langston, father of the plaintiff, Thomas Langston, was appointed by the Probate Court guardian ad litem of these two minor defendants, but the record fails to show that any notice of the application for the appointment was given to the minors or that they in any manner assented to or asked for the appointment, or had any knowledge thereof. None of the adults answered, nor have we any record of an answer for the infants. Fannie Langston died pending suit, leaving a will, and her executor, her husband, Thomas L., became sole plaintiff.

The action was then prosecuted to judgment, and on October 8th, 1877, three days after the order appointing W. H. Langston guardian as aforesaid, the court decreed a sale of the land of James Finley devised as aforesaid, and directed the proceeds to be applied to the debt due Mary Francis Langston, deceased. Accordingly the land was sold in November, 1877, at public outcry, and was purchased by V. B. Robertson, for the sum of $4225, and he received titles from the Probate Court. No defence was made by the adult children of James Finley nor by the guardian of the minors to these proceedings, nor was any appeal taken; and no objection to the sale was interposed by any of them. In December, 1877, V. B. Robertson ousted the family of James Finley, defendants to that action, and took possession of the land; and thereafter, to wit, on September 7th, *1880, they began this action in the Court of Common Pleas for Laurens, to recover of the said V. B. Robertson possession of the said land with rents and profits and damages. The defendant, Robertson, relies in his defence upon the deed under the sale by the Probate Court.

At the term of the court for Laurens, September 26th, 1881, the cause came on for trial before Judge A. P. Aldrich and a jury. In support of their claim the plaintiffs proved the death of John Finley, and his last will and testament, in which this land was devised to James Finley and the heirs of his body; the possession of the land by James after the death of his mother, Polly, the birth of the plaintiffs as lawful children of James, and his death, leaving them surviving him and in possession of the land; the ouster by the defendant, his occupation, and the value of rents and profits, and rested.

The defendant Robertson, in support of his title, then offered in evidence his deed and the proceedings in the Probate Court under and by virtue of which his title was acquired against the present plaintiffs. To this evidence the plaintiffs objected upon the ground that the Court of Probate had no jurisdiction of the subject-matter of that action. This objection was overruled by the presiding judge, and the deed and record having been introduced, and the land identified, the defendants rested. In reply the plaintiffs offered to prove by Thomas R. Finley that no copy of summons and complaint was served on him, and no papers whatever in the action were ever served on him, nor notices received, and that at that time he was living at Honea Path in Anderson County. After he had so testified the testimony was ruled out at the instance of the defendant, and the evidence was closed.

In the argument the counsel for the plaintiffs urged upon the court: 1. That the Court of Probate has no jurisdiction to entertain an action by a creditor to marshal the assets of an insolvent estate. 2. That the proceedings are fatally defective in that no summons was signed by counsel nor the clerk of the Probate Court. 3. That minors cannot be made parties to an action by acceptance of service, nor can a guardian ad litem be appointed to represent them except in the mode prescribed by statute. 4. That the devise to James Finley of this tract of land by the testator John Finley created in him a fee conditional, which descended to the plaintiffs per formam doni free and discharged of the debts of the tenant in fee conditional except as to liens and incumbrances specially created; and that the sale thereof by even a court of competent jurisdiction to pay debts other than such liens and incumbrances is void. 5. That the simple acquiescence of the plaintiffs in a void sale does not conclude their rights.

Such is the substance of the argument of the plaintiffs' counsel, and the same was by way of requests to charge formulated into various propositions, and submitted to his honor, the presiding judge. All were overruled, and the defendant's title was held to rest upon proceedings before a court of competent jurisdiction and regular in form. The jury rendered a verdict for the defendant, and the plaintiffs on appeal renew these propositions before this court.

We feel no hesitancy in holding that the judgment of the Court of Probate of October 8th, 1877, decreeing a sale of this tract of land, is not binding upon the minors, and does not conclude their rights. The mode of making infants parties to an action in a court of record is clearly and expressly prescribed by statute, and a due and tender regard for the rights and welfare of infants requires that this statute shall be strictly followed. An infant is incapable of making himself or herself a party to an action by accepting service, so as to be bound by a judgment therein. All the formalities prescribed by statute must be complied with.

Equal care must be observed in the appointment of a guardian ad litem, the prerequisites to which appointment are likewise clearly enacted. The record of this inferior court fails to show that the law has been complied with in that action, either in making the infants parties, or in the appointment of a guardian ad litem; on the contrary it shows that the proper steps were not taken; and the parol testimony of Thomas R. Finley, which the judge erroneously ruled out, proves that the most essential steps to make him a party and to have him represented by a guardian ad litem were never taken. Thomas *R. Finley and his sister Margaret are not concluded by that judgment, and are not barred thereby of the right to their share of this land.

Even under the law and the practice prior to 1868, when the exact method of making infants parties to actions, and securing for them guardians ad litem, was not fixed by statute, but depended upon established rules of practice in the courts, we search in vain for a decision of a tribunal of law or of equity sustaining a judgment against infants brought in and represented as these were. The case of Bulow v. Witte, 3 S. C. 308, which perhaps relaxes the rule in such cases as much if not more than any other decision, wants much of sustaining the proceedings in the case now under review. An examination of that case discloses the fact that the greatest caution and care were exercised by the chancellor and master in having the infants represented by a guardian ad litem duly appointed, and one by nature disposed to be zealous and watchful of the welfare of her own children. In the present instance the guardian was most irregularly appointed, and was a person by natural relations inclined to be friendly to the plaintiff, his son and daughter-in-law, and antagonistic to the infants.

Now as to the adults who were defendants in that action the case is very different. Being sui juris, they are responsible for their conduct and must abide the consequences of a failure to defend their rights at the proper time. They accepted service of the summons and complaint, and thereby became presumed aware of the nature, scope and object of the proceedings begun in the Court of Probate. Having this knowledge, they entered no appearance, filed no answers, made no defence, and took no steps to have a higher court to correct the judgment of the inferior court, nor in any way to interfere therewith by any of the proceedings known in law and available.

Furthermore they raised no objection to the sale of the property, and thus indirectly if not directly encouraged the defendant to lay out and expend his money in buying their property. By this conduct they are estopped to deny the validity of the sale or the jurisdiction of the court. They cannot now be admitted to question the title of the defendant, Robertson, to that property which was sold under proceedings to which they were parties, and to which they made no objections. Having the opportunity to defend against the informality of the summons and the powers of the court, they neglected to do so, and the rights of a third party having intervened, the door is now closed against a defence which they should have availed themselves of at the proper time.

The very interesting question of jurisdiction of the Probate Court over actions by creditors to marshal the assets of an insolvent need not here be determined, because, under the facts and circumstances of this case, we hold that the plaintiffs in this action who were adult defendants in the action before the Court of Probate are estopped whether that court had jurisdiction or not, and the two who were then infants are not estopped, regardless of the question of jurisdiction, for the reason that they were not parties thereto.

For the same reason we deem it unnecessary to decide whether an estate in fee conditional, descending as it must per formam doni to the heirs of the body of the tenant in fee conditional, carries with it in its descent only the liens and incumbrances imposed by the ancestor, or whether it became in the hands of the heirs of his body assets for the payment of his debts generally. This question can avail the plaintiffs no more than the serious question of jurisdiction. The adults cannot raise it, and the infants need not.

The verdict and judgment below must stand as against all the plaintiffs except Thomas R. Finley and Margaret T. Finley, as to whom there must be a reversal. It is therefore ordered and adjudged that, in favor of these two plaintiffs, the said verdict and judgment of the Circuit Court be set aside and a new trial be had; and that the said two plaintiffs have leave to amend their complaint so as to ask for a partition of the said land in the possession of their tenant in common, V. B. Robertson, should they be so advised; and that the appeal of the remaining plaintiffs be dismissed.

Before Wallace, J., Darlington, September, 1881.

Action by Elizabeth Vaughan against C. W. Hewitt and E. Keith Dargan, commenced in July, 1881. The opinion states the case.

Mr. R. K. Charles, for appellant.

Messrs. Boyd & Nettles, Dargan & Dargan, contra.

July 3, 1882. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McIVER. The plaintiff in her complaint alleges: 1. That on December 4th, 1872, she made a contract with Adrian and Vollers, for the purchase of a certain tract of land, on which she paid one third cash and secured the balance by her two notes, whereupon said Adrian and Vollers gave her a bond for titles. 2. That on March 28th, 1876, "the said notes having been fully paid, the said Adrian and Vollers did execute to plaintiff titles for the said tract, in accordance with the terms of said bond, at which time the notes were past due." 3. That said notes were not then delivered up to plaintiff, the same having been placed in the custody of one Ragsdale for safe keeping. 4. That said Ragsdale subsequently informed plaintiff that the notes were subject to her order. 5. That plaintiff neglected to obtain said notes from Ragsdale, "supposing they were sufficiently cancelled." 6. That at some time (when is not stated), an action was brought against plaintiff by C. W. Hewitt, one of the defendants herein, upon said notes. "Plaintiff thereupon employed counsel to represent her, to wit, George D. Rollins, Esq., and delivered to him all the papers in the action and all information to make her defence of payment as aforesaid, and the said attorney did file an answer on her behalf. That the case came on for trial, and the said attorney, without notice to plaintiff, abandoned her defence, withdrew her answer, and suffered judgment by default to go against her. That the said action of her attorney was unauthorized by plaintiff, totally to her surprise, and operated as a fraud upon her; and she again alleges, that no part of said notes was due, and that her defence could have been successfully made." 7. That judgment was accordingly entered up against her on October 23d, 1879, under which a certain tract of land was sold, as her property, on March 7th, 1881. 8. That the land was bid off by the defendant, E. K. Dargan, who paid the purchase money and took titles from the Sheriff. 9. That upon receiving information of the same, and before the money was paid out by the Sheriff, as she is informed and believes, this plaintiff caused notice to be given to him of her proposed action to set aside the judgment aforesaid, and she is well informed and believes that he does still hold the purchase money subject to the judgment of the court." "That previous to the date of said sale, plaintiff herein conveyed away all her right, title and interest in the said lands, by warranty deed, to E. H. Vaughan." Wherefore, she demands "that the said judgment be vacated and set aside, and the deed of the Sheriff, together with all other proceedings thereunder, be declared void, and that all parties be put back into their previous condition, and for such other and further relief as this court may deem lawful, and to justice and equity may pertain.

To this complaint the defendants separately demurred, on the ground that it does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, which demurrers were sustained, and the plaintiff appeals.

First as to the demurrer filed by the defendant Hewitt. The appellant contends that this is an action seeking equitable relief, and the question therefore is, whether the facts stated in the complaint furnish any ground for such relief. It will be observed that the ground upon which the judgment is assailed is that the attorney employed by the present plaintiff to defend the action in which the judgment was recovered, when the case came on for trial, without notice to her, "abandoned her defence, withdrew her answer, and suffered judgment by default to go against her." Whether this would constitute a sufficient ground to set aside the judgment, if presented in any form, or whether the only remedy would not be against the attorney who had abused the trust confided to him, need not be considered here, inasmuch as the question here is, whether this will constitute such a ground as will warrant the exercise of the equity powers of the court. Southern Porcelain Manufacturing Co. v. Thew, 5 S. C. 5. In this case there is no charge of any fraudulent collusion between the attorney and the plaintiff in that action; and indeed there is no direct charge of fraud even against the attorney, and certainly none affecting the plaintiff in that case.

There is an allegation that the action of the attorney was unauthorized, "and operated as a fraud" upon the plaintiff herein, who was the defendant in the former action. But even if this could be construed as an allegation of fraud, as against the attorney, there is certainly nothing in it by which to connect the plaintiff in that action with such fraud. It is not even alleged that such plaintiff was aware, at the time he took his judgment, that the attorney was acting without authority in withdrawing the defence. On the contrary, he doubtless supposed, as he had a right to do, that the attorney was acting by authority, inasmuch as it is the constant practice for an attorney to withdraw a defence, without question from the opposite party or from the court as to his authority so to do.

Again it will be observed, that facts sufficient to show that the plaintiff herein had a valid defence to the action in which the judgment in question was recovered, are not stated in the complaint. It is true that the plaintiff alleges "that her defence could have been successfully made," but that is a mere statement of a legal opinion, and she does not even allege that she had been advised by counsel, after a full and fair statement of the facts, that she had a valid defence. Whether the notes upon which the judgment was recovered were negotiable or unnegotiable, or whether they were transferred before or after due, does not appear, though from the language used in the second paragraph of the complaint, as well as from the terms of the original contract with Adrian and Vollers, the inference would be that they were negotiable, and might have been transferred before due; and if so the conduct of the attorney in withdrawing the answer might have been justified upon the ground that no valid defence could have been made.

Be that as it may, however, the mere fact that the attorney of a defendant has, without any special authority from his client, withdrawn the answer, and suffered judgment by default to go against the defendant, without some allegation of fraudulent collusion between the attorney and the plaintiff in the action, furnishes no ground for the exercise of the equitable jurisdiction of the court in setting aside the judgment. The code (§ 197) affords ample remedy for the relief of a party "from a judgment, order or other proceeding taken against him through his mistake, inadvertence, surprise or excusable neglect," or, what is the same thing, the mistake, inadvertence, surprise or excusable neglect of his counsel; and if a party fails to avail himself of the remedy thus provided within the time prescribed, he cannot afterwards invoke the aid of the equity powers of the court unless he can show some recognized ground of equitable jurisdiction; and this, we think, the plaintiff has altogether failed to do in this case. The demurrer filed by the defendant Hewitt was therefore properly sustained.

As to the defendant Dargan, it is very manifest that the plaintiff has stated no cause of action whatever against him. For in addition to what has been said, the plaintiff, if she ever had any cause of action against him, could not have any now, inasmuch as she had conveyed to another all her right, title and interest in the land prior to the sale under which the defendant Dargan claims, and which alone connects him with the case. He manifestly stands as a purchaser for valuable consideration without notice, holding the legal title, and is entitled to the benefit of his purchase. No equity is alleged sufficient to constitute a cause of action against him, and his demurrer was properly sustained.

The judgment of this court is, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

Before Pressley, J., Edgefield, June, 1881.

Petition by James P. Carroll, in re, L. R. Tompkins against D. H. Tompkins. The order of the Circuit Judge setting aside the judgment was as follows:

This is a motion to set aside a judgment of said court by L. R. Tompkins v. D. H. Tompkins by confession before the Clerk on November 6th, 1876, on which the judgment was not duly signed and recorded until November 6th, 1878. Under execution on said judgment defendant's land was levied on by the Sheriff of said county, and on the first Monday of January, 1880, it was sold and purchased by plaintiff in said judgment. The party making this motion is a junior judgment creditor of D. H. Tompkins, and his motion is based on the insufficiency of the statement in writing, which section 400 of the Code requires of the defendant in such cases. This statement simply sets out a promissory note as the basis of indebtedness, stating no other facts out of which it arose. The motion is opposed on the grounds that the defect of statement, if any, is a mere irregularity, which may be amended, and that third parties cannot move to set aside the judgment for such irregularity; that the right to make the motion is barred by lapse of time, and that the sheriff's sale under said judgment has vested a right in the purchaser of the land which cannot be properly decided on mere motion, and yet would be affected by the granting it.

The only point in the case which has seriously troubled me is that last named. I am clear that said statement is defective; that it is matter of substance, nor mere form, which could be amended, and as such is not a mere irregularity, but affects the validity of the judgment, as against other judgment creditors. I am further satisfied that said judgment was not such a record of the court as to be notice to other creditors until November, 1878, and therefore the objection of lapse of time cannot be sustained. As to the question of the rights acquired under the sale by the sheriff, my conclusion is that it is not involved in this motion, and would not be affected by any decision thereon. It is therefore ordered and adjudged that the said judgment, and the execution thereon, be set aside, for want of the statement in writing by defendant, as required by law.

Mr. J. E. Bacon, contra.

July 4, 1882. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McIVER. This was a motion, made by James P. Carroll, a junior judgment creditor of D. H. Tompkins, to set *aside a judgment by confession in favor of L. R. Tompkins against D. H. Tompkins, upon the ground that the "statement" required by the Code, sec. 400, was insufficient. The Circuit Judge granted the motion, and Mrs. L. R. Tompkins, the plaintiff in such confession of judgment, appeals on various grounds, which substantially are as follows:

1st. That the proceeding by motion was not the proper remedy. 2d. Because the application came too late, and was barred by the statute of limitations and lapse of time. 3d. Because the alleged defect in the statement upon which the judgment is based is a mere irregularity, and cannot be taken advantage of by third parties. 4th. Because rights have become vested under said judgment, and such rights cannot be attacked in a collateral proceeding. 5th. Because the Circuit Judge erred in holding that the said judgment could not be amended. 6th. Because judgment was good between the parties, and was not, therefore, void.

It will be observed that no question is made in any of the grounds of appeal as to the insufficiency of the statement upon which the confession of judgment was based, and indeed, it seems to be well settled that a statement like the one in the present case, that the indebtedness grew out of a note given by the defendant to the plaintiff, without stating a consideration of the note, or what it was given for, will not be sufficient. Chappel v. Chappel, 12 N. Y. 215; Dunham v. Waterman, 17 N. Y. 15, cited with approval as to this point in Weinges v. Cash, 15 S. C. 44.

We proceed then to the consideration of the various grounds of appeal, not, however, in the order in which they are stated in the record, but in the order in which we have stated them above. As to whether the relief sought could be obtained by motion:—In New York, from whence the provision of our code upon the subject of judgments by confession has been borrowed, it seems to be settled that the proceeding by motion is proper. Chappel v. Chappel and Dunham v. Waterman, supra. See also Freeman on Judgments, sec. 558. This seems to be in accordance with the practice long prevailing in this State. Mooney v. Welsh, 1 Mill Con. R. 133; Barns v. Branch, 3 McC. 19.

*449

*The next inquiry is whether the application came too late. There was some controversy at the bar as to the time when the judgment in question was actually entered up, but, to say nothing of the fact that it is the duty of a party claiming a benefit from lapse of time to show clearly and beyond dispute that the required time has actually elapsed, from the view which we take we do not think it material to determine whether the appellant or the respondent is correct as to the true date when the judgment was entered, because even if it was at the time contended for by the appellant, we do not think that this motion comes too late. There is no statutory limitation in this State as to the time within which a motion to set aside a judgment must be made, except in those cases provided for by sec. 197 of the code. In Mooney v. Welsh, supra, five years was suggested as the limit, in analogy to the statute of limitations, in actions for the recovery of real estate, then of force, and as that period had not elapsed from the time when the appellant insists that the judgment was entered, to the time when notice of this motion was given, we do not think that the application came too late, especially as the facts stated in the affidavit of the moving party negative any laches on his part.

The case of Clark v. Porcelain Manufacturing Company, 8 S. C. 22, relied upon by the appellant, does not support the position contended for, that four years will bar such a proceeding; for as matter of fact the judgment was entered in that case March 18th, 1871, and notice of the motion to set aside was served March 2d, 1875, so that the proceeding there was commenced within four years, and hence the decision could not have rested on the ground that four years would be a bar. But in addition to this, the motion in that case was not made by a third party, but by the defendant in the action, and was based, not upon any substantial defect in the judgment, but upon a mere irregularity in the summons capable of being rectified by amendment, and upon the allegation that the president of the defendant corporation had omitted through accident and excusable neglect to make a defence to the action; and the court simply held that after the lapse of nearly four years, a motion based upon such grounds could not be sustained, and did not *hold that four years would bar a motion to set aside a judgment, made by a junior judgment creditor upon the ground of a substantial defect in such judgment. For the court after alluding to the facts showing laches on the part of the company, uses this language: "In the face of these facts, can their omission to defend the action be attributed to accident, inadvertence, and mistake, or, at the least, to excusable negligence on the part of their president?" showing clearly that the court regarded the motion as a proceeding under sec. 197 of the code, the time for bringing which is expressly limited to one year. And as to the irregularity in the summons the court said: "If the exception now taken to the summons had been made on appearance and in regular form, leave would have been granted to amend. * * * The respondents are not to be placed in a worse condition because, by the neglect of the company, no appearance or defence was made." It is quite manifest, therefore, that this case does not affect the question now under consideration.

For a third ground of appeal, the appellant insists that the alleged defect in the judgment is a mere irregularity, and cannot be taken advantage of by third parties. The judgment in question derives its origin from a special statutory provision, and to make it valid the requirements of the statute must be strictly complied with, Freeman on Judgments, sec. 543. In the recent case of Weinges v. Cash, above cited, we have had occasion to consider the meaning of this part of the code, and from the authorities therein cited as well as from what is said in that case, it is quite clear that this ground cannot be sustained. The object of the statement required by the code is to protect creditors against fraudulent confessions of judgment, by giving them such information as will enable them, by inquiry, to ascertain whether the alleged indebtedness is bona fide or pretensive and fraudulent, and if the statement fails to furnish such information, then the judgment based upon it must be regarded as fraudulent and void as to other creditors, even though it may be valid as between the parties to it, who may be estopped from questioning its validity.

The next ground of appeal raises a question which was not *passed upon by the circuit judge, and is not properly before us for decision. The only question which we are called upon to determine is whether there was any error on the part of the circuit judge in granting the motion to set aside the judgment. What is to be the effect of his order upon rights which may have previously vested cannot now be considered. If the judgment was not a valid judgment as against a junior judgment creditor, then there was no error in granting the motion to set it aside; and if the plaintiff in the judgment, who is the party resisting that motion, happens to be a purchaser under that judgment, claiming rights acquired by such purchase, that should not deter the court from deciding a question properly presented for decision, even though the result may be to prejudice her rights as purchaser.

The fifth ground of appeal alleges that the circuit judge erred in holding that the judgment could not be amended. This ground cannot be sustained. The defect in the judgment is substantial, not of form merely. If the statement required by the code was not made, then there was no authority to enter the judgment, and so far as third persons are concerned, it was without any validity and absolutely void.

The only remaining ground taken by the appellant is that, as "the judgment was good between the parties," it could not "therefore, be void." We are unable to perceive the force of this ground. A deed may be good as between the parties, and yet absolutely void as to creditors, and we see no reason why the same may not be said of a judgment.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

Before Wallace, J., Darlington, September, 1881.

This was a motion by J. G. Rains to open a judgment by default obtained against him by John C. Truett. The brief gives no explanation of the delay in the hearing of the motion. The opinion states the case.

Mr. Elihu C. Baker, for appellant.

Mr. J. J. Ward, contra.

July 15, 1882. The opinion of the court was delivered by Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. In this case an action was brought on a note, and no answer having been put in, judgment was rendered in open court on October 27th, 1874, for one hundred and sixty-eight dollars and forty-five cents. In December following, a notice was served by the defendant upon the plaintiff's counsel, to the effect that on the first Wednesday after the first Monday of February term next ensuing, the defendant would move the court to vacate the judgment entered in the above case, upon affidavits annexed.

The motion was docketed and came to a hearing at the September term of the Court of Common Pleas for Darlington County, Sept. 24th, 1881, before Judge Wallace, presiding. Upon the affidavits submitted showing the defence claimed by the defendant and why it had not been interposed at the proper time, and those of plaintiff contra, Judge Wallace ordered the judgment to be set aside, and that the defendant Rains have twenty days from the date of the order to file and serve his answer on the plaintiff's attorney. From this order this appeal has been taken.

The argument of the appellant is based upon an alleged insufficiency in the evidence submitted by the defendant to sustain the facts upon which the motion below was founded. We do not think we can go into this question. It does not distinctly appear whether the motion below was made under sec. 197 of the code or under the Act of 1869. Section 197 invests the court with power in its discretion, and upon such terms as may be just, at any time within one year after notice thereof to relieve a party from a judgment order or other proceeding taken against him, through his mistake, inadvertence, etc. The Act of 1869, now repealed, gave power to the presiding judge of the circuit to vacate and set aside judgments * * * upon satisfactory proof being made to said judge that said judgment is erroneous and ought to be set aside * * * provided the motion be made within two years after the judgment is rendered. If the motion below was made by virtue of section 197 of the code supra, it will be observed from the express language of the section that it was a motion addressed to the discretion of the judge.

As a general rule, where a court or judge is invested with power to be exercised at discretion, such power is absolute, and when exercised it is final. From the very meaning of the term and the nature of the power, discretion is unlimited. It is bounded by no rule except the good sense and integrity of the party empowered to exercise it, and, in the absence of an express right to appeal, it necessarily follows that its exercise is unappealable. Gibbes v. Elliott, 8 S. C. 50.

If this motion was made under the Act of 1869 the same result must follow. This act provides that the presiding judge of the circuit may, upon satisfactory proof made to him, vacate erroneous judgments. * * * Now, when under this act a circuit judge has ordered a judgment to be vacated, we must assume in the language of the act that this has been done upon satisfactory proof, and therefore is final. It might be upon an examination of the evidence submitted in a case, this court might conclude that the testimony ought not to have been satisfactory. We might differ from the circuit judge as to the deduction to be drawn therefrom. The vacation, however, of the judgment does not depend upon the conclusions of this court, but upon the effect of the evidence submitted on the mind of the circuit judge. The Legislature has seen proper to invest the circuit judges with this power, and it would be an unwarranted assumption of authority in this court if it should undertake to review its exercise.

Besides, the act certainly contemplated that such applications should be made upon some error involving questions of fact, as will be seen from the language employed, to wit, "upon satisfactory proof." These terms are applicable to facts, and not to questions of law. The powers of this court do not extend to facts except in appellate cases. Our opinion is that where the proof is satisfactory to the circuit judge, the conditions required by the act have been complied with, and there the matter must end. Garvin v. Garvin, 14 S. C. 639; Hill v. Watson, 10 S. C. 269.

In some cases a question of law might arise, as where the fact alleged as ground of error in the judgment, even if true, would not in law render the judgment erroneous. In such case an error in the ruling of the circuit judge might possibly be reviewed. But this question is not raised here, and therefore need not be considered.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

*Action by Jane E. Wallace against William C. Johnson and R. B. Holman, commenced February 5, 1878. The opinion states the case.

Messrs. Suber & Caldwell, for appellant.

It being conceded that the husband has had no exemptions of real or personal property set apart to him, and that the goods distrained are worth less than $500, the act of 1874 (15 Stat. 589) is sufficient to exempt this property to the wife. But Article XIV., Section 8, of the Constitution seems to be conclusive of the question. "Levy and sale" include distress for rent. 4 McC. 378; 4 Strob. 365.

Mr. T. S. Moorman, contra.

The homestead provisions of the constitution and statutes exempt property only to the head of a family out of his own property and as against his own debts. The provision as to married women gives them no more rights than other persons have in their own property, or than they would have if femmes sole. Indeed, there is a restriction in the proviso to this section. The property here distrained was therefore exempt as his property, but was entitled to no greater privileges than the property of other persons, if found on these leased premises. They could therefore be distrained. 10 S. C. 474; 1 Bail. 502.

July 15, 1882. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. Andrew Wallace having failed to pay the rent of a certain house leased to the said Wallace by W. C. Johnson, a distress warrant was issued by a trial justice at the instance of the said Johnson, which was levied by the constable Holman, upon the personal property of Mrs. Wallace, the wife of the tenant, being the household and kitchen furniture on the premises and in the use of the family. This action was brought by Mrs. Wallace to recover possession of this property, the landlord and the constable being defendants.

*There is no contest as to the title of the property. This is conceded to belong to Mrs. Wallace, but the defendants claim that being found on the premises of the tenant, it was liable to be distrained for the rent in arrears. The remedy by distress for rent in arrears, which had been abolished by Section 20 of the Act of 1868 (14 Stat. 106), was restored by the Act of June, 1877 (16 Stat. 265). Mobley v. Dent, 10 S. C. 471. This act was amended by the Act of March, 1878 (16 Stat. 511), so as to restrict the right of distress to such property as belonged alone to the tenant in his own right; so that the question involved here cannot hereafter arise. The seizure of the property in this case by the constable Holman, however, took place in January, 1878, just before the Act of March, 1878, and while the Act of June, 1877, was of force, unaffected by the restriction in the Act of 1878. The question raised therefore is a pertinent one in this case.

The plaintiff claimed that the property was exempt from distress upon two grounds: First, under the Homestead Act of 1874, 15 Stat. 589; and secondly, under Art. XIV., Section 8, of the Constitution of this State, in reference to the property of married women. The right of trial by jury having been waived, the case was heard by the presiding judge, who dismissed the complaint, and ordered the property seized to be sold, and the proceeds applied to the rentals due and costs.

The appeal rests upon the two grounds above mentioned, and calls for the judgment of the court thereon.

The Homestead Act of 1874, supra, provides that in case any married woman having a separate estate shall be married to the head of a family who has sufficient property to constitute a homestead as hereinbefore provided, shall be entitled to all the provisions of the Act and to the exemptions of her property from levy and sale for her debts and of her contracts. It will be seen that by the terms of this act, the exemption is limited to her debts, and of her own contracting, while therefore if this levy was made by virtue of a debt of the appellant, a debt of her own contracting, this act might be interposed by the plaintiff successfully; yet made under the circumstance surrounding this case and not for her debt, but the debt of her *husband, in our opinion it does not apply. The distress warrant was executed upon appellant's property not by virtue of appellant's debt for the rent, but by virtue of the law of distress which authorized its levy upon any property found on the premises, without regard to the ownership. The Act of 1874 as to married women was intended to afford protection in a limited class of cases. This case does not fall within that class, and the act cannot be extended by construction so as to cover it. Such being our view as to the extent of the act, it will not be necessary to consider the question of its constitutionality raised in appellant's argument, because whether constitutional or not, it does not apply to the facts of this case. Its further consideration may therefore be dismissed.

We are of the opinion, however, that appellant's second ground must be sustained. She has the right to stand upon the constitutional provision which she invokes. Article XIV., Section 8, provides that the real and personal property of a woman held at the time of her marriage, or that which she may acquire thereafter, either by gift, grant, inheritance, devise or otherwise, shall not be subject to levy and sale for her husband's debts but shall be held as her separate property, and may be bequeathed, devised or alienated by her the same as if she were unmarried. Here is an inhibition positive and direct. It is in the organic law of the State, and it overrides all other laws. It is not pretended that the rent in this case is due by the appellant; on the contrary it is acknowledged and well understood by all parties, that it is the debt of the husband. Such being the fact, the distress warrant levied upon this property is an effort on the part of respondent to bring to sale the property of the wife for the debt of the husband, which is in direct conflict with the constitutional inhibition referred to above.

It may be urged that the wife knowing the law of distress, and leaving her property on the premises, it became subject to the operation of that law, by her consent; that this amounted to a voluntary pledge on her part for the payment of her husband's debt, which under the recent decisions she had a right to make, and that she cannot now repudiate this implied contract. This would be stretching the doctrine of implied contracts beyond all reasonable limits. The property here was household and kitchen furniture, in the immediate use of the wife, no doubt at the head of this department of the household affairs. This property was hers, as it is admitted, and living with her husband, where else could it have been kept and used, but on the premises which he provided for their home?

By keeping the property there, we do not believe that she intended to pledge it for the payment of the rent, nor did a contract either express or implied to that effect arise out of the facts; so that at last the case turns upon the question, shall the constitution, which expressly inhibits the sale of the wife's property for the debt of the husband, prevail, or shall the law of distress, which allows any property found on the premises to be sold for rent in arrears, control in this case? The Constitution is the paramount law of the State; certainly no act passed since its adoption can override its provisions, nor any principle of the common law which is in conflict therewith.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed.

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. The plaintiff appellant in January, 1874, obtained from the defendant $663. At the same time he excuted to the respondent a paper which he alleges he understood at the time to be a mortgage, intended to secure the payment of this sum, but which afterwards, as he learned, was claimed by respondent to be an absolute deed. Some time after the execution of this paper, the respondent obtained possession of the premises by forcibly ejecting appellant.

This action was commenced on August 11th, 1880, the plaintiff appellant alleging the above facts, and claiming that the paper in question, though absolute on its face, was understood and intended by the parties to be a mortgage; that the sum borrowed had been refunded to the respondent by the sale of portions of the land to other parties by the respondent, with plaintiff's consent, and by other creditors; that respondent had subsequently agreed in writing to reconvey the land to the plaintiff, but had failed to do so, respondent claiming to hold the land for the payment of a store account against the plaintiff. Upon these allegations the complaint prayed specific performance by a reconveyance of the unsold portion of the land, damages for the forcible ejectment, and general relief. The answer put in issue all of the material allegations of the complaint.

The case was heard at the September term of the Court for Chesterfield County. The presiding judge submitted certain issues to a jury, which with their findings will be found in the decree, as follows:

"The above stated case having been brought to trial, and the following issues of fact having been submitted to a jury, to wit: First. Was the conveyance from the plaintiff to the defendant intended or understood by the parties to be a mortgage or conditional conveyance, or security for the repayment of money received from defendant? Second. Did defendant agree to convey the same to plaintiff or any part thereof upon the payment of a sum of money to him? Third. Has the *plaintiff performed his part of the contract by making the payment in any manner? Fourth. Did plaintiff rent the land from defendant after the conveyance to defendant?"—and the jury having found upon the first issue as follows, "We consider it a conditional sale or conveyance," and upon the second issue as follows, "Yes;" upon the third "No;" and upon the fourth issue "He did;" and the court having fully concurred with the jury in their findings of fact, it is therefore ordered, adjudged and decreed that the complaint be and the same is hereby dismissed with costs."

The plaintiff asked his Honor for an order of reference to ascertain the amount still due on the mortgage debt, or that a sale of the land be ordered, the surplus after the payment of the mortgage to be paid to the plaintiff, and for such other order as the justice of the case might require to protect the plain-tiff's rights in the premises—which he declined.

The plaintiff appealed on the following grounds: 1. Because his Honor erred in dismissing the complaint, after the finding of the jury that the conveyance was a mortgage for the security of the debt. 2. His Honor erred in refusing a reference to ascertain what was due. 3. His Honor erred in refusing a decree to protect the plaintiff's right in his equity of redemption. 4. His Honor erred in refusing any relief to the plaintiff after agreeing with the jury in their findings. 5. His Honor erred in allowing the conveyance to stand and to operate as an absolute conveyance when the jury found it was only a mortgage. 6. His Honor erred in not rendering a judgment for specific performance of defendant's agreement after proof of part performance by plaintiff. 7. His Honor erred in not granting the relief to which the plaintiff in justice and equity was entitled."

The two prominent facts found by the jury and concurred in by the judge are as follows: First. The fact that the paper under which the defendant claims was understood by the parties to be a mortgage or conditional sale for the security of the debt of plaintiff. Second. That the mortgage debt has not been fully paid. From these facts it follows, that the relation between the parties is that of mortgagor and mortgagee. They stand before the court in that attitude, and the proper *proceeding for the adjustment of their respective rights under ordinary circumstances would be a proceeding by the mortgagee for the foreclosure of the mortgage. Here, however, the mortgagee is in possession. How he obtained it, does not clearly appear, but he is in possession, and being satisfied has no inducement to institute foreclosure proceedings; and unless the mortgagor, who is plaintiff here, can obtain redress by becoming the actor, he is without remedy.

Under the findings of fact by the circuit judge, the land stands pledged for the payment of the plaintiff's debt, and is subject to sale for that purpose, the proceeds to be applied first to the debt—the surplus, if any, to go to the plaintiff. Can the respondent, by getting possession of the land and declining to take proceedings himself, prevent the enforcement of plaintiff's right to the surplus, if any? There is no doubt that a portion at least of the debt has been paid; in fact it seems much the larger portion, and the land in possession of the respondent is probably worth more than the balance of the debt now due. The respondent's right under the mortgage is not to take and hold the land, but it is to have it sold and the proceeds applied; and if he was now before the court as plaintiff seeking redress, such no doubt would be the decree. Cannot such decree be passed as the parties now stand?

It is true that the court, unless under peculiar circumstances, would not entertain a complaint by a mortgagor to have the mortgage foreclosed and the mortgage debt paid. There is no precedent for such a case, nor any general principle under which it could be sustained as an independent proceeding. But where other equities intervene entitling the mortgagor to appeal to the equity jurisdiction of the court, the court having assumed jurisdiction will generally go through and enforce all the equities involved.

Here the primary question of contest between the parties was as to the character of the deed executed. The defendant was in possession of the land under this deed, claiming it as an absolute deed of conveyance. The plaintiff denied that it was a conveyance, and claimed it to be a mortgage. The jury found it to be a mortgage. This entitled the plaintiff to appeal *to the court below for redress, by having the deed declared a mortgage, and the land surrendered, either for sale in payment of the debt, if any due, or to the plaintiff, as the equity of the parties might demand, upon the facts as proved.

We think, therefore, upon the facts found, an inquiry should have been had by reference, or otherwise, as in the judgment of the circuit judge might have been best, as to the precise amount due by the plaintiff to the defendant, and a sale of the premises ordered, the proceeds to be applied in payment of the debt—the surplus, if any, to be paid to the plaintiff.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be reversed, and the case be remanded, for such proceedings as may be necessary to carry out the principles herein announced.

STATE v. HAMILTON.

(April Term, 1882.)

Before Aldrich, J., Abbeville, January, 1882.

Indictment against Sam Hamilton, for stealing cotton from the field. There were no requests to charge, and no exceptions to the charge as made, and no motion for new trial. Other matters are stated in the opinion.

Mr. M. L. Bonham, Jr., for appellant.
Mr. Solicitor Orr, contra.

July 15, 1882. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. At the January term, 1882, of the Court of General Sessions for Abbeville County, the defendant appellant was indicted, tried, and convicted of larceny in stealing seventy-five pounds of seed cotton, alleged in the indictment to be the proper goods and chattels of one Prue P. Benson. Upon conviction, the appellant moved in arrest of judgment, upon the ground that the property laid in the indictment to be the property of P. P. Benson, was, in fact, the property of another party, to wit, that of Louisa Miller, as shown by the testimony in the case, and therefore that the indictment is fatally defective.

The defendant has appealed upon two grounds as follows:

1st. Because, the indictment laid the possession of the property alleged to have been stolen in P. P. Benson, and the proof adduced by the State itself shows it was the property of Louisa Miller.

2d. Because his Honor, it is respectfully submitted, erred in holding that the question of possession was for the jury.

Arrest of judgment is the proper remedy, where there is some defect in the indictment, and on its face "as for the want of sufficient certainty, in setting forth either the person, the place or the offence." 4 Black. Com. 376. It is never applicable to raise the question of sufficiency of evidence to sustain the allegations in the indictment. It affords no relief whatever, where there is simply a conflict between the allegata and probata. In such cases the proper proceeding is a motion for a new trial, and not in arrest of judgment. This can be invoked only in cases of the character first above mentioned.

In this case the indictment alleged the property in question as the proper goods and chattels of P. P. Benson, and the trial proceeded upon that issue. Whether this allegation was true or not, was a question of fact. It was material to the conviction of the defendant upon the indictment undergoing trial, but it was no defect in the indictment itself. It was a distinct charge which the State intended to make as a question of fact, and its truth was entirely for the jury, dependent upon the testimony to be introduced. The judge properly submitted it to the jury as a question of fact, and they have solved it against the appellant. In this the jury may have been in error, but this court would have no jurisdiction to correct that error, even if it was apparent. In cases at law both civil and criminal we sit for the correction of errors of law, not of facts; the constitution has wisely left the solution of facts to juries.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

Before Pressley, J., York, October, 1881.

Action by R. B. Kennedy, administrator, against S. R. Moore, executor. The opinion states the case.

Mr. W. P. Good, for appellant.

Messrs. Wilson & Wilson, contra.

Mr. Justice McIVER. This action, which was commenced on June 12th, 1881, was brought by the plaintiff as administrator de bonis non of N. P. Kennedy, against the defendant as executor of John S. Moore, deceased, on a note of which the following is admitted to be a copy:

$1015—Twelve months after date we or either of us promise to pay to the order of George Steele, Admr. of N. P. Kennedy, dec'd, one thousand and fifteen dollars with interest for *value received, witness our hands and seals this the 29th December, 1853. In- Jas. G. Lindsey, [Seal.]

terest to become prin- John S. Moore, [Seal.]
cipal annually if not J. F. Lindsey, [Seal.]
paid.

J. G. Lindsey.

In his complaint the plaintiff alleged: "That on the 29th day of December, A. D. 1853, John S. Moore, together with Jas. G. Lindsey, made and delivered their note under seal to George Steele whereby each of them promised to pay to the said George Steele, as administrator of N. P. Kennedy, deceased, the sum of one thousand and fifteen dollars, with interest thereon from the said 29th day of December." The defendant in his answer admitted "that on the 29th of December, 1853, a sealed note signed by Jas. G. Lindsey, John S. Moore, and J. F. Lindsey, was executed to George Steele, as administrator of N. P. Kennedy; but defendant denies that said note is correctly described or set forth in plaintiff's said complaint." For a further defence it was alleged that Jas. G. Lindsey was principal and John S. Moore one of his sureties on the note referred to, and that said note was materially altered, after it was executed by said Moore, by the addition of the words, "Interest to become principal annually if not paid," without the knowledge or assent of said Moore, whereby the said note became void as to him.

When the case came on for trial the court ruled "that as to the proof of the note the affirmative of the issue was on the plaintiff." Thereupon the plaintiff offered the note in evidence, the signature being admitted, and rested. There were several credits indorsed on the note, the last of which was dated April 18th, 1872; but there was no evidence as to who made the payments evidenced by these credits. The defendant then offered testimony tending to show that the note had been altered after it was executed. In reply the plaintiff offered in evidence "the record of the Bankrupt Court in the matter of J. F. Lindsey, Petitioner in Bankruptcy, containing a schedule of all debts due by the petitioner, amongst which was the note in issue; also an affidavit as to the existence and correctness of a debt by sealed note held by the firm of John *S. Moore & Sons, made by a member of the firm; also the proof of the debt evidenced by the note in issue by W. E. Erwin, administrator of George Steele, deceased." The court ruled that this record from the Bankrupt Court was not competent evidence in this issue, and this ruling constitutes the basis of one of the exceptions.

Whether Moore was principal or surety on the note, and whether the alleged alteration was made before or after the maturity of the note, were not, according to our view of the case, inquiries material to the issue presented. We deem it unnecessary, therefore, to consider the several exceptions as to these points.

The rule is well settled that any alteration of a note in a material part, after its execution, without the assent of the maker, renders it void. Stagg v. Pepoon, 1 N. & McC. 102; Mills v. Starr, 2 Bail. 359; Vaughan v. Fowler, 14 S. C. 355 [37 Am. Rep. 731]. There can be no question but that the alleged additional words constituted a material alteration of the terms of the note as originally written, for by these words the note is converted from a note bearing ordinary simple interest into a note bearing interest payable annually. The only questions, therefore, were whether such alleged alteration had in fact been made, and if so, whether it was done with the assent of Moore, the defendant's testator. These questions were properly left to the jury, who have by their verdict solved them in favor of the defendant. When on the production of a paper it appears to have been altered in a material part, it is incumbent upon the party offering it in evidence to explain this appearance. Vaughan v. Fowler, supra; 1 Greenl. Evid. § 569. This he may do, either by the internal evidence derived from the paper itself, as in Wicker v. Pope, 12 Rich. 387 [75 Am. Dec. 732], or by any other competent evidence. In this case the note upon its production did appear to have been altered by the addition of the words, "Interest to become principal annually if not paid," and it was the duty of the plaintiff to satisfy the jury that these words were added before the note was signed by Moore, or that they were subsequently inserted with his assent, and this he failed to do, as shown by the verdict.

*It is contended by the appellant that the Circuit Judge erred in holding that the affirmative of the issue was with the plaintiff, because the defendant had admitted in his answer the execution of the note sued on. This position is based upon a mistaken view of the pleadings. The defendant while admitting that his testator did sign a note to Geo. Steele as Admr. of N. P. Kennedy, in effect denied that he signed the note sued upon; so that in addition to what has already been said, it is manifest that there was no error in holding that the affirmative of the issue was with the plaintiff.

The only remaining question is whether the record from the Bankrupt Court was competent evidence in this case. It seems to us very clear that it was res inter alios acta. How any proceedings had in the Bankrupt Court under the petition of J. F. Lindsey, to which the testator, John S. Moore, was not a party, could be competent evidence against his executor in this issue, we are at a loss to conceive. The most formal and solemn admission by J. F. Lindsey of the validity of the note in suit could not be any evidence against Moore or his executor, and certainly the fact that this note was proved in the Bankrupt Court as against J. F. Lindsey, cannot be used as evidence to fix a liability upon the estate of Moore.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

STATE v. TRAPP.

[1. Burglary ⚭22.]

In a case of burglary, the dwelling house was occupied by husband and wife, but leased by the wife, who had a separate estate, and the goods in the house belonged to the wife. Held, that the indictment properly laid the ownership of the house in the wife.

[2. Indictment and Information ⚭182.]

The ownership might properly have been laid in either husband or wife.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Indictment and Information, Cent. Dig. § 564; Dec. Dig. ⚭182.]

Before Cothran, J., Fairfield, February, 1882.

To the statement of the case contained in the opinion of this court should be added so much of the report of the presiding judge as is not there stated. It was as follows:

*It was earnestly contended by the prisoner's counsel that the offence charged in the indictment was against the habitation, and as such affected the matter of possession rather than the right of property; that the constitution of 1868 touching the rights of married women as to property held or acquired by them separately, as well as the Act of Assembly upon the subject, do not operate upon or affect the family relation, which remains as at common law; that the possession being joint, and the husband's domiciliary right being thus unquestioned, as the head of the family he has not only the right to fix and determine but to control the matter of family domicile. The purpose of this report, and of the appeal which it is intended to forward, is to present sharply the single matter hereinbefore set forth.

It presents a case of novel impression in this State, and the motion made in behalf of the defendant is not without strong reasons for its support. In other States of the Union, where similar changes in the organic law as to the marital relations have long existed, there are not wanting judicial decisions that hold the doctrine contended for here. Nevertheless, to have granted the motion in this case would have had the effect of turning loose upon the community (without a precedent in this State to sustain it), upon a mere technicality, one convicted of a most daring and atrocious crime; and having instructed the jury to resolve all doubtful questions of fact in favor of the defendant, I determined to resolve a doubtful question of law in favor of the State, and refused the motion for a new trial, to which the defendant, by his counsel, duly excepted.

Mr. J. E. McDonald, for appellant.

Burglary, like arson, is an offence against the habitation, the residence, the domicile, and regards the possession rather than the property. 2 Bl. Com. 220, 223; 1 Bish. Crim. Law, §§ 104, 559; 1 Russ. Crimes, 797; 2 Whart. Crim. Law, §§ 1555, 1566; 29 Conn. 342; 26 Mich. 106. Being such, it is an offence against the domiciliary proprietor, the head of the family, who is the husband. 1 Bouv. Inst. 62, 96, 98, 115, 116; 2 Wait Act. & Def. 635, 638; Tyler Inf. & Cov. 312; 2 Bish. Mar. Wom. § 157; 1 Russ. Cr. 807-9; 2 East P. C. *500-4; 2 Whart. Cr. Law, §§ 1577, 1582; 38 E. C. L. R. 175. The constitution and acts enlarging the rights of married women have not modified the common law rule in this respect. The husband still has a right to fix, determine and control the family domicile, and to be the legally recognized head of the family. Tyl. Inf. & Cov. 789; 12 Casey, 410; 2 Bish. Mar. Wom. § 24; 12 Md. 108; 124 Mass. 30; 26 Mich. 106.

Mr. Solicitor Gaston, contra.

Mr. Justice McIVER. The defendant having been convicted of burglary, moved the circuit judge for a new trial, upon the ground that the indictment alleged that the house which was broken into was "the dwelling house of Mrs. Mary Ladd," whereas it should have alleged the house to be that of her husband, A. W. Ladd. "The testimony of Mrs. Ladd and of her husband, which was not contradicted, showed that Mrs. Ladd had a separate estate; that she had leased the premises occupied by them; that the goods in the house belonged to her, and that her husband acted as her agent." The circuit judge refused the motion, whereupon this appeal was taken, which presents the single question, whether the allegation of ownership of the house was sufficient.

This question, as is said by the circuit judge, is one of novel impression in this State, and therefore we are not bound to follow the technical rules which formerly embarrassed the courts in determining questions of this character, under the principles of the common law. Indeed an examination of the various cases in which such questions have arisen would show that it would be quite difficult, if not impossible, to reconcile them, or to extract from them any well-defined rule. As is said in 2 Bish. Crim. Prac. § 109: "It is not easy to lay down, in a single sentence, a rule by which the ownership is, within the principles pertaining to this department of our law, to be determined. Probably in some cases the ownership may be laid in one person or another, at the election of the pleader. Thus where a gardener lived in a house of his master, quite *separate from the dwelling house of the latter, and the gardener had the entire control of the house he lived in, and kept the key, it was held that on an indictment for burglary, the gardener's house might be laid either as his or his master's," citing Rex v. Rees, 7 C. & P. 568.

So in 2 East P. C. 499, it is said: "It is necessary to ascertain to whom the mansion belongs, and to state that with accuracy in the indictment. And here it is to be lamented that the same rule does not prevail in this case as in arson, which is considered as an offence against the actual possessor, by whatever title he may hold possession. But in burglary the rule is much more complex, the ownership being neither referable altogether to the legal title nor to the possession, but partaking sometimes of one, sometimes of the other, as well as of both. If the rule by which to ascertain this ownership may be compressed, with sufficient discrimination, into a small compass, I should say, generally, that where the legal title to the whole mansion remains in the same person, there, if he inhabit it, either by himself, his family or servants, or even by his guests, the indictment must lay the offence to be committed against his mansion."

So far as we can perceive, there are only two reasons for requiring the ownership of the house to be stated in an indictment for burglary: 1st. For the purpose of showing on the record that the house alleged to have been broken into, was not the dwelling house of the accused, inasmuch as one cannot commit the offence of burglary by breaking into his own house. 2d. For the purpose of so identifying the offence, as to protect the accused from a second prosecution for the same offence. Hence when the ownership is alleged to be in a person who is not the accused, and that allegation is proved upon the trial, the reasons of this requirement seem to be fully met.

In this case the allegation of ownership has been shown by the evidence to be strictly true; that the wife not only had the legal title, but that she actually resided in the house at the time; and the fact that it may, at the same time, have been the residence of her husband as well as of herself, cannot affect *the question. If her right to reside in the house in question depended solely upon the marital relation, then a different question would be presented; but where, as in this case, she not only had the right to reside there by virtue of her marital relation, but also by virtue of being the legal owner of the premises, and did actually reside in the house at the time of the alleged burglary, we think the allegation of ownership in her was strictly true in point of fact, and was quite sufficient to sustain the indictment.

It is true that burglary is an offence against the habitation of some other person, but it is very clear that it is not essential that such habitation shall be alleged to be that of the person who actually occupies—inhabits—the house at the time it is broken into, for there are quite a number of cases in which indictments alleging ownership in the master have been sustained, where the house was, at the time, not occupied by the master, but by some other person as his servant or agent. In Rex v. Atthea, Ry. & Mood. C. C. 399, cited in 2 Arch. Cr. Pl. & Prac. 296, it was held that a house, the joint property of partners in trade, and in which their business was carried on, might be described as the dwelling house of all the partners though only one of them resided in it.

Some of the old English cases went very far in cases of married women, but that was because the common law ignored the separate existence of a married woman, so far as property rights were concerned, and regarded the wife as nothing more than the servant of the husband. Hence in Rex v. French, Russ. & Ry. 491, where a dwelling house in which a wife lived separate and apart from her husband, the rent of which was paid out of her separate estate in the hands of trustees, was broken into, the court held that the indictment properly laid the ownership of the house in the husband, although he had never been in it, saying "it was the dwelling house of some one; it was not that of the trustees, for they had nothing to do with it; it was not the wife's, because, at law, she could have no property; it could then only be the husband's." It is very manifest that this case and others of a like character cannot now be regarded as authority, based as they are upon the incapacity of a *married woman to hold property, when such incapacity has been entirely removed.

The case of Snyder v. The People, 26 Mich. 106, much relied on by the appellant, we do not think is in point. In that case the husband was indicted for arson in burning the dwelling house of his wife, which was owned by her as her separate property, though it was occupied by them jointly as a residence. The court held that the indictment would not lie, inasmuch as it could not be said that the husband had violated the statute making it a penal offence wilfully and maliciously to burn, in the night time, "the dwelling of another," the house burned being his dwelling place, and not "the dwelling of another." The court used this language: "The property is hers alone, but the residence is equally his;

the estate is in her, but the dwelling house, the domus, is that of both." Care was taken, however, to reserve the question as to what would have been the result if it had appeared that the husband was not actually occupying the house, as a residence, when it was burned; the court saying: "There is much reason for holding that the wife's dwelling house can be considered that of the husband, only while he makes it such in fact, and that there is no such legal identity as can preclude her house being considered, in legal proceedings against him, as the dwelling of 'another,' when it is no longer his abode."

In the case now before the court it was conceded that the wife was the legal owner of the premises, and as long as they were jointly occupied by herself and husband as their dwelling, we say in the language of Judge Cooley, supra: "The property is hers alone, but the residence is equally his; the estate is in her, but the dwelling house, the domus, is that of both." Hence in this case an allegation of ownership in either husband or wife would have been sufficient, inasmuch as either allegation would have been sustained by the evidence and would have been sufficient to show upon the record that the accused was charged with breaking into the dwelling house of another, and would have so identified the offence as to protect him from another charge for the same offence.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

Before Pressley, J., Laurens, February, 1882.

This was an indictment against Neel Coleman for the murder of his son by cruel treatment. The opinion states the case. There was no report by the presiding judge.

Messrs. Ball & Watts, for appellant.
Mr. Solicitor Duncan, contra.

Mr. Justice McIVER. Under an indictment for murder, the appellant was convicted of manslaughter, and moved in arrest of judgment because there was no allegation in the indictment of any place where the deceased died. The motion was refused by the circuit judge, whereupon this appeal was taken, alleging error in such refusal. The defendant also appeals upon the ground that the circuit judge refused to charge certain propositions of law, but as it does not appear from the "Case" as presented for argument here that any request was made to charge these propositions, or any exception taken to the refusal so to charge, these grounds are not properly before us for consideration, and indeed were not urged in the argument here.

The only question, therefore, presented by this appeal is whether the omission to state in the indictment the place where the deceased died is a fatal defect. There can be no doubt that such an omission would have been fatal at common law, *and the question then is narrowed down to the inquiry whether there are any statutory provisions which render such an allegation unnecessary. The statute relied on for this purpose is the Act of 1859 (12 Stat. 822), incorporated into the General Statutes (Chap. 128, Sections 19, 20 and 21), as amended by the Act of December 21st, 1880 (17 Stat. 336).

It will be observed that these statutory provisions do not purport to make any change in the rules of criminal pleading, but are simply designed to prescribe a place of trial in certain cases, where, as the law then stood, it was at least doubtful as to where would be the proper place of trial. They do not declare in general terms that, no matter where the death ensues, the accused may be indicted and tried where the injury causing the death was inflicted, but they specify particularly that where death ensues in a particular place, from an injury inflicted in another place, then the accused may be indicted and tried in a certain place, and so on. We do not see, therefore, how these statutory provisions can be regarded as having the effect of altering the established rules of criminal pleading, especially in cases not falling within any of the classes provided for by these statutes.

There are four classes of cases embraced within these statutory provisions: 1st, Where the injury causing the death is inflicted within the limits of this State, and the death ensues beyond the limits of the State. 2d, Where the injury is inflicted by a person who, at the time, is within the limits of the State, upon a person who, at the time, is beyond the limits of the State, or vice versa, where the injury causing the death is inflicted by a person who, at the time, is beyond the limits of this State, upon a person who, at the time, is within the limits of the State. 3d, Where the injury causing death is inflicted by a person who, at the time, is within the bounds of one county, upon a person who, at the time, is within the limits of another county. 4th, Where the injury causing the death is inflicted in one county, and death ensues therefrom in another county; but these provisions do not embrace a case in which the death ensues in the same county where the injury causing it was inflicted, and therefore an indictment, in such a *case, must be framed in accordance with the established rules of criminal pleading, altogether unaffected by these statutory provisions.

The indictment in the case now under consideration cannot be regarded as framed under any of these statutory provisions, for there is no rule better settled than that, in framing an indictment under a statute, care must be taken to follow the terms of the statute closely, in order that the indictment may show on its face that the offence charged comes within the class provided for by the statute, and in this case the indictment does not show that the offence charged comes within any one of the four classes provided for by these statutes. There is an allegation that the injuries causing the death were inflicted in Laurens County, upon the deceased while in that county, but there is no allegation as to where the death ensued from such injuries—whether within or without the State, or whether within or without the county of Laurens. The indictment, therefore, cannot be regarded as a good indictment under these statutory provisions, inasmuch as it does not state a case provided for by these statutes, and it cannot be sustained as a good indictment at common law, because it omits an allegation essential to the validity of a common law indictment.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the circuit court be reversed, and that the motion in arrest of judgment be granted.

(April Term, 1882.)

[Attachment  $\hookrightarrow$  179.]

Where two attachments are levied upon personal property of the same debtor at different hours of the same day, the one first levied has no priority of lien, but the two take rank together.

Before Witherspoon, J., Darlington, March, 1882.

This was a rule on the sheriff in the case of Steffens & Werner against Isaac Wanboeker. The opinion states the case.

Mr. R. K. Charles, for appellant.

*Messrs Dargan & Dargan, contra.

August 8, 1882. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. This was a rule on the Sheriff to show cause why the proceeds of certain attached personal property should not be applied towards the satisfaction of plaintiffs' execution. The Sheriff made return, that on the morning of March 31, 1881, the plaintiffs lodged in his office a warrant of attachment against Isaac Wanboeker, and he sent a deputy to execute it. A few hours afterwards, on the same day, Cohen & Loeb lodged another warrant of attachment, and he went in person to execute it. When he reached the store of the defendant he found that his deputy had executed the first warrant, and he levied the same warrant upon the same property—personal property, it being a stock of goods. The warrant of plaintiffs bore date March 30, and was levied at 9.30 a. m.; that of Cohen & Loeb bore date March 31, and was levied at 11 a. m. of the same day. Judgments were obtained in both cases on the same day, and the proceeds of the property are not sufficient to satisfy both. The circuit judge ordered that the proceeds of sale be applied pro rata to the judgments, and Steffens & Werner, the plaintiffs in the attachment first levied, appeal to this court, upon the ground that the whole proceeds should be applied to their case.

The general rule certainly is, that in regard to the entry of process, the law does not regard fractions of days. Ex parte Staggs, 1 N. & McC. 405. This, however, is always subject to be controlled by positive enactment. To this general rule there was, prior to 1870, an exception as to attachments, to which, coming from the custom of London, the practice of the custom was applied, which was that the first executed had the first lien; and in determining priority not only fractions of days and hours were considered, but even minutes.

But, as we understand it, the law in that particular was changed by the code of procedure. Section 255 provides "that the Sheriff or Constable to whom such warrant is directed shall immediately attach all the real estate of such debtor and all his personal estate, etc., which he shall safely *keep to be disposed of as hereinafter directed;" and after directing the manner of attaching real estate, proceeds as follows: "Said attachment shall be a lien, subject to all prior liens, and bind the real estate attached from the date of lodgment: Provided that all attachments lodged upon the same day shall take rank together." As the latter part of the section treats of attachments especially on real estate, and the words as to the lien are "and bind the real estate attached," it might seem that the proviso was limited to real estate, but the words are general—"Provided that all attachments lodged upon the same day shall take rank together."

Such was manifestly the view of the court in Bachman v. Sulzbacher, 5 S. C. 62. That was a question of priority of executions on personal property under sec. 316 of the code, which declared that executions should bind personal property only "by actual attachment or levy thereon," and the court held that "where the executions are levied by the Sheriff on personal property on the same day but at different hours, the first levied is not entitled to preference, but the liens of both attach as if levied at the same instant of time." In delivering the judgment of the court, Chief Justice Moses said: "If the term [attachment] is to be there understood as referring to the process provided against absent debtors who have property subject to the jurisdiction of the court, its lien now 'ranks' not from the hour, but 'from the day' when it is lodged with the Sheriff." Code, § 255.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

Before Aldrich, J., Kershaw, February, 1881.

Action by John M. Russell against William L. Arthur, commenced January 1, 1879. The opinion states the case.

Messrs. J. D. Kennedy, J. T. Hay, for appellant.

Messrs. Leitner & Dunlap, contra.

August 8, 1882. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. This was an action by the plaintiff against the defendant Arthur, a merchant of Camden, for $334, balance of $800, salary for a year as book-keeper and general assistant, commencing in July, 1877, and extending to the same month in the next year. The plaintiff served the defendant, receiving his pay monthly, from July, 1877, to February 26th, 1878, when he was discharged by the defendant. The plaintiff claims that his contract with the defendant was for a whole year, and being discharged without fault, he is entitled to recover the salary for the whole year. The question is, what was the proper construction of the contract between them? It seems that the plaintiff was in Wilmington, North Carolina, and the agreement was made by letter. The plaintiff offered no evidence, except two letters of the defendant, one employing him, and the other dismissing him. The first letter contained an offer in the following words: "I don't know as I can offer you a sufficient salary, as the business of county towns does not warrant me in paying much. At the same time expense is light, as I can procure you good board for $20.00 per month. If you feel warranted in coming for $800 per annum, I shall be pleased to have you right away. We can make the arrangement for the winter months, and if all is agreeable then for a longer period."

Upon the receipt of this letter the plaintiff entered the service of defendant, and remained with him, receiving his salary

*monthly at the rate of $800 per annum, until February 26th, 1878, when he received another letter from the defendant saying in substance that he had no further use for him; that he regretted to part with him, "for with the exception of a few trifles, you have been attentive to your business and quick at your work. I send you herewith a letter of character, etc." The defendant denied that the contract was for a year, insisting that it was only for the winter months, and that he had performed his contract fully, although the plaintiff was negligent of his business in the absence of defendant, and set up a counter-claim for a store account of $38.65. Defendant upon cross examination stated that he offered to give plaintiff $50 after his discharge, not because he owed him anything, but because he was away from home, etc.

The defendant requested the judge to charge that the contract was only for the winter months and did not bind defendant for a longer time, and that defendant having retained plaintiff in his employment during the winter months was no longer liable on the contract. The judge declined so to charge or to construe the contract at all, but left it to the jury to say what was the contract. He also told the jury that "they must not consider the counter-claim set up by defendant, because he testified that he offered to pay plaintiff fifty dollars after his discharge, and he would not have done so if plaintiff was indebted to him." The jury rendered a verdict for the plaintiff for amount claimed, $334, and the defendant appeals to this court substantially upon two grounds: First. Because his Honor refused to construe the contract, the same being in writing, as to the rights and liabilities of the defendant thereunder, but left the construction of said contract to the jury. Second. Because his Honor told the jury that they must reject the counter-claim of defendant, on the ground that the evidence showed that defendant had offered money to plaintiff after his discharge, whereas the defendant explained why he had made such an offer, and the matter should have been left to the jury.

The request to interpret the contract in a particular manner, was substantially a request that the court and not the jury should construe the contract. There was no evidence of the *contract except the defendant's letter of July 18th, 1877, and we think it was error in the circuit judge to refer the construction of that letter to the jury instead of construing it himself. The fact that it was obscure and inconsistent in its different parts, making it difficult to understand, could not alter the rule that the court and not the jury should construe a contract in writing. The jury had no special information unknown to the court by which they could give proper weight to the expression, "We can make the engagement for the winter months, and if all is agreeable, then for a longer time."

The general rule is that the onus is on the plaintiff. If his proof is obscure or doubtful, it is his misfortune. This is especially true where the claim rests upon strict legal right. Where one sues for services not rendered, it is necessary, in order to recover, that he should make it clearly appear not only that the contract was an entirety for the whole year, but that he was dismissed without cause.

Whether or not there was a contract might be a question for the jury, but when there was no doubt about the existence of a contract, and the only question was about the meaning of that contract, which was in writing, then the construction was a question of law for the court. "The construction of a written contract is a question of law for the court, and it is error to submit such question to the jury. * * * The rule that the obligation is upon the court to expound a written contract exists in as full force when the contract rests in a number of letters and answers as when it is embodied in a single instrument. * * * The obligation of the court to expound the meaning of written instruments to the jury, and not to submit such questions to them, embraces every species of writing, contracts, records, deeds, wills, and all others." Thomp. Charg. Jur. 16, 17; Union Bank v. Heyward, 15 S. C. 296; Mowry v. Stogner, 3 S. C. 253. In this last case cited, the court said: "The submission to the jury of the whole question of the instrument, as depending upon parol testimony of what the parties said and did in regard to the subject-matter of the deed, was clearly erroneous."

Whether the counter-claim of the defendant was established or not was a question of fact exclusively for the jury, and upon

*that question it was competent for the plaintiff to show that the defendant offered him fifty dollars after he was discharged, but the force and effect to which that evidence was entitled was for the jury alone. It was error for the judge to take that question away from the jury by saying to them, "That they must not consider or allow the counter-claim set up by the defendant, because he offered to pay plaintiff fifty dollars after he had discharged him." The fact referred to may have been very strong evidence against the recovery of the counter-claim, yet still it was a matter exclusively for the jury, and should not have been withdrawn from them.

The judgment of the court is that the judgment of the Circuit court be reversed, and the case remanded for a new trial.

The lapse of twenty years raises a presumption of payment as to sealed notes and bonds, which, though not a presumption of law, is a presumption of fact that has acquired an artificial force subject to be rebutted by such facts only as would revive an unsealed note barred by the statute of limitations. There must be in rebuttal something more than mere belief deduced from the weight of testimony; the stay law, the war and the lunacy of plaintiff are not circumstances sufficient to rebut this presumption.

Before Kershaw, J., Newberry, November, 1880.

The case is fully stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Suber & Caldwell and J. Y. Culbreath, for appellants.

Mr. J. H. Rion, contra.

*482

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. In this case the plaintiff brought action upon a joint and several sealed note executed March 10, 1857, by E. P. Lake and James S. Spearman for $815.77, payable twelve months after date, to Chancellor Job Johnstone, or bearer or order, with a credit indorsed of $500 on March 9, 1858. Chancellor Johnstone, who had been the guardian of the plaintiff, died in 1862, and Carver Randall became his successor. This note fell into the possession of Randall, and by him was turned over to the plaintiff, who attained her majority in November, 1865, as a part of her estate.

Under these circumstances the plaintiff, on August 17, 1879, brought this action against Lake and Elizabeth Spearman, the executrix of James S. Spearman, who had died in 1878. The case came on for trial at the November term, 1880, for Newberry County. The defendants admitted the execution of the note, but insisted that the plaintiff was a lunatic and incompetent therefore to sue; also averred that the note being joint could not be sued, as to Spearman, the surety, he being dead, and relied on the lapse of time as evidence of payment.

At the trial it was admitted that the plaintiff was a lunatic and had been since 1868, and the counsel of plaintiff moved without previous notice for the appointment of a guardian ad litem, which motion was granted, against the protests of the defendants, and Silas Johnstone, Esq., was appointed. The defendants insisted that having admitted the execution of the note, they were entitled to open and reply on the trial. This was overruled. The case then went to trial, the defendants relying principally upon the defence of payment arising out of the lapse of time, twenty years and some months having elapsed since the credit of the $500, and the estate of Spearman having been proved to be solvent all this time.

On the question of payment the judge charged that the presumption of payment of a sealed note arising from the lapse of twenty years from its maturity, or new promise or part payment, can be rebutted by circumstances without positive proof of non-payment. "That the stay law of 1861-66, and the lunacy of the plaintiff, were circumstances to be taken into consideration by them in determining whether the note had been paid or not." That from all the facts as brought out in the case, they should base their verdict upon their belief whether the note as a matter of fact had been paid or not. His Honor refused to charge that the presumption of payment arising from the lapse of twenty years could be rebutted only by positive proof of non-payment.

*483

The jury found for the plaintiff the sum of $817.52.

The appeal involves three questions of law: 1st. Was it error in the judge to allow the amendment at the trial as to the appointment of the guardian ad litem? 2d. Were the defendants entitled to open and reply? 3d. Was it error to charge that the presumption of payment arising from the lapse of twenty years could be rebutted by proof of facts and circumstances, such as the stay law, the war, the lunacy of the plaintiff, etc., without positive proof of non-payment?

The motion to amend by the appointment of a guardian ad litem was made upon the facts appearing in the pleadings. The lunacy of the plaintiff was set up in defendant's answer, and the necessity for the guardian ad litem appeared from that fact, which was admitted by plaintiff's counsel. There was no necessity for affidavits as to this fact, or as to any matter dehors the record affecting this motion. The defendants were not taken by surprise, nor did any right of theirs demand delay, nor could they be prejudiced by prompt action as to this matter.

Section 196 of the Code provides "that the court may before or after judgment, in furtherance of justice and on such terms as may be proper, amend any pleading, process, or proceeding by adding or striking out the name of any party, or by correcting a mistake in the name of the party, or mistake in any other respect." * * * This gives the court a wide latitude as to amendments, and while the power should not be exercised indiscriminately or to the surprise and prejudice of opposing parties, nor generally without giving the defendant the opportunity to resist and to answer the pleadings as amended, yet this matter must be left somewhat to the discretion of the presiding judge, *and this court will not disturb the exercise of that discretion unless manifest injustice has been done. In this case we can see no reason whatever why the motion was objectionable because made without previous notice, or why time should have been given to answer. The material facts of the case, those upon which the matters at issue depended, were in no way altered by this amendment, and no new facts were needed by way of reply nor was there any surprise to the defendants. We think the power to amend was authorized by Section 196 of the Code, and that it was properly exercised here by the circuit judge.

The second ground of appeal is equally untenable. The 49th rule of the Circuit Court entitles the defendant to open and reply when he admits the plaintiff's whole case; when the admission is so full, as upon that alone in the absence of other defense, the plaintiff would be entitled to judgment. It will be observed that the admission here was not of this full character. It is true the execution of the note sued on was admitted, but the admission stopped at that point. The answer denies the right of plaintiff to sue, because a lunatic, and it averred that Spearman's estate could not be sued. In these denials there were involved questions both of fact and of law material to the plaintiff's case, not admitted. The 49th rule of the Circuit Court, therefore, does not apply.

This brings us to the consideration of the third and last ground of appeal, which presents the real question in the case. As to the character of the testimony necessary to overthrow the presumption of payment of a sealed note, which, it is admitted, the lapse of twenty years raises, the Judge seems to have laid down the rule that this was a question of belief on the part of the jury, and depended, as other facts, upon the weight of the testimony. That the lapse of twenty years would presume payment; but, after that period, this was an open question for the jury, the burden being upon the plaintiff to show to the satisfaction of the jury that the note had not been paid, which fact the jury was to determine as they would the truth of any other alleged fact, to wit, by the weight of the testimony bearing upon that question. In other words, the only *effect of the lapse of twenty years is to change the position of the parties as to the question of payment.

Ordinarily and within the twenty years, the possession of the note by the plaintiff entitles him to judgment, unless the defendant shows payment. After the twenty years the burden is shifted, and the plaintiff is then required to show non-payment, or he will fail in his suit, which fact the Judge held was a question of belief by the jury, dependent upon the force and effect of the whole testimony, and requiring no special evidence—but that it did not require positive proof of non-payment.

This is a very important question, and demands the gravest consideration of its underlying principles and of the decided cases affecting it. Until 1870 our statute of limitations, the statute of James I., made of force here, did not embrace sealed notes, nor was there any positive limitation here or in England as to such instruments or as to bonds. The seal was supposed to give such papers peculiar force and value, and to impart to them peculiar vitality. This idea, however, has since been exploded, and now, in this State, such instruments stand on the same plane in almost every respect with unsealed contracts.

In all civilized countries where the law is administered as a science having reference to the peace, quiet, and progress of society, as well as to the protection of individual rights, it has been thought wise that there should be some limit to litigation, some boundary beyond which contests or matters open to contests should be regarded as settled. Hence, early in England and in this country, in cases outside of the statute, the courts had resort to presumption to take the place, in many cases of evidence and frequently of belief, as a general common law principle. It was said by Lord Erskine, in Hillary v. Walter, 12 Ves., 267, "Mankind, from the infirmity and necessity of their situation, must, for the preservation of their property and rights, have recourse to some general principle to take the place of individual and specific belief."

In the absence of positive statutory limitation as to sealed notes and bonds, they were early brought under the operation *of this principle, and the doctrine that twenty years would presume payment firmly established. Mr. Angel says: "By analogy to the statute of limitations, an artificial presumption has long been established, that when payment of a bond or other specialty was not demanded for twenty years, and there has been no circumstance to show that it was still acknowledged to be in existence, the jury are to presume payment at the end of twenty years. This doctrine has been so often recognized that it is not requisite to cite any of the countless authorities to sustain it." Angel Lim., § 93.

This doctrine, for the same reason that originated it, as to the first class of cases to which it was referred, has been applied to various other classes. Thus, in Bowers v. Newman, 2 McM. 486, an executor's assent to a legacy of freedom to a slave was presumed from the lapse of time; and in Miller v. Reigne, 2 Hill, 592, a deed of manumission to a slave under the act of 1800 was presumed. Lapse of time will presume a deed, grant, or any conveyance necessary to complete title to one in possession. Gray v. Bates, 3 Strob. 500. Letters of administration will be presumed, although the evidence is directly to the contrary; Willingham v. Chick, 14 S. C. 103; and there are countless cases where the payment of bonds has been presumed under similar circumstances.

As was said by Chancellor Harper in Riddlehoover v. Kinard, 1 Hill Eq. 380, "These presumptions are not founded upon actual belief." The belief may in fact be distinctly the other way, yet the presumption exists. Judge Wardlaw, in the case of Stover v. Duren, 3 Strob. 450 [51 Am. Dec. 634], conveys the idea of the force and effect of this principle better than can be found elsewhere, and we copy his exact language. He says: "The subject of presumptions is a good deal confused by the various terms which have been used to distinguish the different kinds. The presumption of payment, which, in reference to debts not embraced by the statute of limitation, arises after the lapse of twenty years, is not a presumption of law, that is, a rule which the Court itself may apply, but is a presumption of fact, recognized by the law, from which a conclusion ought to be deduced by a jury. It is, however, one of those strong *presumptions which shift the burden of proof, which, from frequent occurrence, have become familiar to the Courts, and which, being constantly recommended to juries from motives of policy, have acquired an artificial force, and become as important as presumptions of law. Although the Court itself cannot make such presumption, a new trial will usually be granted if a jury disregard it. Lord Ellenborough, in William v. Gorges, 1 Camp. 217, thought that, after the lapse of twenty years, the presumption that a judgment had been paid was not rebutted by the circumstances of the absence of the defendant and his insolvency, and, therefore, he directed the jury to find for the defendant."

Judge Wardlaw said, further: "But, when by the expiration of full twenty years, the presumption of payment has acquired an artificial force, so that it stands in the place of belief, an admission that the payment has not in fact been made cannot of itself destroy the effect which considerations of policy have given to a certain period of time, whether payment has or has not been made." Chancellor Harper said in Riddlehoover v. Kinard, supra: "The lapse of twenty years is sufficient to raise the presumption of a grant from the State, of the satisfaction of a bond, mortgage, or judgment, of the grant of a franchise, or the payment of a legacy, or almost anything else that is necessary to quiet titles to property. After twenty years a bill of review will not lie. This is the general equitable bar."

Now, while it is true that cases may be found among the decisions in our own State and elsewhere in which it is stated in a general way that this presumption may be rebutted by any circumstances showing non-payment, yet, in the face of these strong opinions, pronounced by such distinguished jurists as Wardlaw, and Harper, and Lord Ellenborough, and in the absence of a statement of the distinct character of those circumstances, we cannot but conclude, notwithstanding the other cases referred to, that this presumption, though rebuttable, has a much stronger foothold than to be overthrown by a mere balance of probabilities or by an adverse conclusion or belief deduced simply from the weight of testimony. Such a pre*sumption is not founded simply upon belief. It is based upon public policy and necessity, and is frequently in direct opposition to belief. It was originally admitted in analogy to the prevailing statute of limitations, and in considering admissions which rebut it, the same principles are applicable as in considering admissions which take a case out of the statute.

But when, by the expiration of full twenty years, the presumption of payment has acquired an artificial force, so that it stands in place of belief, it should not be overthrown simply by a contrary belief deduced from circumstances. This would fritter the doctrine away and render it useless, leaving sealed notes and bonds always open. The better opinion seems to be that these circumstances should be accompanied with some acknowledgment by the debtor of an existing liability, as that expressed in the quotation from Angel, supra, where he says: "And there have been no circumstances showing that it was still acknowledged to be in existence." And as that found in the opinion of Judge Wardlaw, supra, where he says: "An admission simply that it has not been paid will not be sufficient unless it be an admission amounting to an acknowledgment of a subsisting liability like that which would renew a debt barred by the statute." Or, as was strongly expressed by Chancellor Harper, in Riddlehoover v. Kinard, supra, where he said: "Presumptions must be made against the well-known truth of the fact. If twenty years have elapsed without payment of interest, or any acknowledgment of a bond, we must presume it paid, notwithstanding the fullest conviction that it never has been paid." In McQueen v. Fletcher, 4 Rich Eq., 152, the court held that in considering admissions relied on to rebut the presumption of payment in such case, the same principles are applicable which apply when admissions are relied on to take a case out of the statute of limitations. "When an acknowledgment has been made in writing by the debtor charging him in direct terms, or by his agent, or if there has been a part payment, or part satisfaction of interest then due, the action must be brought in twenty years next after the time of such acknowledgment, part payment, or part satisfaction. But such special matter must be replied, and in confession and avoidance." Best Presump., § 188.

*Our conclusion is that the lapse of twenty years raises a presumption of payment as to sealed notes and bonds, which, though not a presumption of law, and therefore not conclusive, yet is a presumption of fact which has acquired an artificial force; subject to be rebutted, it is true, but the facts relied on for this rebuttal must be stronger than mere belief deduced from the weight of testimony being on that side. They must be of a character which would revive an unsealed note barred by the statute of limitations. We think this follows from the principles laid down by Judge Wardlaw and Chancellor Harper in the cases referred to and in the case of Williaume v. Gorges, where Lord Ellenborough directed a verdict for the defendant when the proof was that the debtor had been absent and insolvent. In the case before the court the circumstances as to the belief were no stronger than those before Lord Ellenborough. He must have thought that something more was necessary than simply a belief on the part of the jury of non-payment.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed on the last ground of appeal, and that the case be remanded for a new trial.

*Before Pressley, J., Chester, October, 1881.

Action commenced February 9, 1881, by the National Bank of Chester against I. L. Gunhouse, Myer Wachtel and Samuel Gunhouse, constituting the firm of I. L. Gunhouse & Co., and Fanny Kaufman, for foreclosure of mortgage. The plaintiff's mortgage is stated in the opinion; the mortgage held by Fanny Kaufman was to secure the repayment of money advanced by Moses Strauss on the two notes of $5000 each, described in that mortgage. Other facts, and also the Circuit decree, appear in the opinion.

Fanny Kaufman appealed on the following exceptions:

1. Because His Honor erred in finding "that the officers of the bank prove that in July, 1876, Gunhouse & Co. was indebted to the bank upwards of $35,000, when he should have found that said sum of $35,000 was only a contingent liability of I. L. Gunhouse & Co. as drawers of fifteen inland bills of exchange, duly accepted by responsible parties.

2. That His Honor erred in finding that all transactions of a new character between plaintiff and Gunhouse & Co. were duly settled and the old debt secured by mortgage was reduced by payments from time to time to the sum of $14,815.46, when the inland bills of exchange, a contingent liability of I. L. Gunhouse & Co. for $35,000 on the 12th of July, 1876, the day the plaintiff's mortgage was given, were all finally paid by the acceptors of said bills of exchange, by notes of other parties duly paid at maturity, or by inland bills of exchange on other parties duly accepted and paid.

3. That His Honor erred, as matter of law, in not finding that any settlement or transactions between the National Bank of Chester and I. L. Gunhouse & Co. could not affect the rights of Fanny Kaufman, the first endorser on the notes secured by the second mortgage.

4. That his Honor erred in not finding, as matter of law, that the fifteen inland bills of exchange, the original liability of I. L. Gunhouse & Co., on the 12th July, 1876, constituted a contingent liability only and were paid, and have no connection with the present debt to the bank.

*5. That His Honor erred in holding that the sum of $15,636.48 is the remainder of the original liability of $35,000 secured by the mortgage to the bank 12th July, 1876; but he should have held that the said sum of $15,636.48 arose from advances made by the bank subsequent to the second mortgage.

6. That His Honor erred in not finding, as matter of law, that the indebtedness of I. L. Gunhouse & Co. to the bank on the 1st of April, 1880, claimed to be the mortgage debt as shown by the six inland bills of exchange one memorandum check and an overdraft of $1200 in 1879 put in evidence by the bank and claimed as the balance due on their bond and mortgage, arose from advances made by the bank subsequent to the second mortgage of Fanny Kaufman.

7. That His Honor erred in not finding as matter of law, that the mortgage debt claimed by the bank being advances to I. L. Gunhouse & Co. made subsequent to the second mortgage, the bank having actual notice of the second mortgage, and the bond secured by the mortgage being intended to cover future advances, that the lien of the mortgage of the bank was postponed to the lien of Fanny Kaufman's mortgage, and that she is entitled to the proceeds of the sale of the mortgaged premises, to be applied to the satisfaction of her debt in priority to the mortgage of the bank.

8. Because His Honor erred in not finding that the paying of the memorandum checks of I. L. Gunhouse & Co. by the bank to an amount exceeding one hundred thousand dollars, after the execution of the second mortgage, was a loan by the bank and created the indebtedness which it is now claimed the proceeds of the sale of the mortgaged premises shall be applied to.

9. That His Honor erred in not finding, as matter of law, that the extravagant advances by way of loan on memorandum checks, subsequent to the second mortgage, were in fraud of the rights of Fanny Kaufman under said second mortgage.

10. Because His Honor erred in not finding that the bank was guilty of gross laches in connection with the six inland bills of exchange, which are claimed as part of the mortgage *debt, and in fraud of the rights of Fanny Kaufman under the second mortgage.

11. Because His Honor erred in finding that there was any admission, on the part of Moses Strauss, during the time he owned the second mortgage, as to the time when the mortgage debt now claimed by the bank was created, but he should have held that there was no evidence whatever of such fact.

12. Because His Honor erred in finding that the mortgage of the bank was made by I. L. Gunhouse & Co. in good faith for debts previously contracted, when he should have found that the said mortgage was in violation of the National Bank Law, and therefore void.

13. Because His Honor erred in not finding that the proceeds of the sale of the mortgaged premises should be first applied to the debt of Fanny Kaufman upon her two notes.

Messrs. S. P. Hamilton, A. G. Magrath, for appellant.

Messrs. J. & J. Hemphill, contra.

July 15, 1882. The opinion of the Court was delivered by

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. I. L. Gunhouse & Co., formerly merchants in the town of Chester, on July 12th, 1876, executed a bond in the penal sum of $15,000 to the National Bank of Chester, with mortgage on valuable real estate in said town to secure the same. The condition of the bond was as follows, to wit: "Whereas the said I. L. Gunhouse & Co. stand indebted to the National Bank of Chester, aforesaid, in certain large sums of money, either as makers, payers, or endorsers of notes, or as drawers or acceptors of bills of exchange, as well as memorandum checks. And whereas the said I. L. Gunhouse & Co. may hereafter, from time to time, become indebted to the said National Bank of Chester by other notes, bills of exchange, or otherwise. Now the condition of the above obligation is such that if the above bound I. L. Gunhouse, Meyer Wachtel, and Samuel Gunhouse, our heirs, executors and administrators, shall and do well and truly pay or cause to be paid unto the above-named National Bank of Chester, its certain attorneys, successors, or assigns, the full and *just sum due upon all our obligations of any and every kind to the said the National Bank of Chester, as the same severally mature and become payable, including as well those hereafter contracted as those now existing, as also any and all renewals, consolidations and substitutions of any said obligations, without fraud or further delay, then the above obligations to be void and of no effect, or else to remain in full force and virtue."

Afterwards, to wit, on November 21st, 1876, the said Gunhouse & Co. gave two notes for $5000 each to the defendant, Fanny Kaufman, with a second mortgage on the same property as that embraced in the mortgage to the bank to secure said notes. These notes and mortgage were transferred to one Moses Strauss, but subsequently were returned to Fanny Kaufman by assignment, who at the time of this action was the owner and holder.

Gunhouse & Co. finally failed in business. At the time of the failure the bank claimed that they were indebted to it in the sum of $14,815.46. This amount on April 1st, 1880, was consolidated into three notes, one for $4815.46, one for $5000, and the third for $5000, making in the whole the $14,815.46. This sum appears to have been made up of the following evidences of debts, then in the possession of the bank, to wit: five drafts on Strauss Bros., two of December 26th, 1877, for $1581.00 each, one of January 2d, 1878, for $3387.86, two of January 9th, 1878, for $3461.88 and $305.51, respectively; a draft on A. J. Salinas & Son, February 5th, 1879, for $2500; balance memorandum checks, $771.72; and overdraft, $1226.49.

On February 9th, 1881, this action was commenced, alleging the indebtedness of the defendant Gunhouse & Co. to the bank as above stated in the sum of $14,815.46, claiming that this amount was due under the penalty of the bond for $15,000 and the balance secured by the mortgage referred to herein above, and the complaint prayed judgment for that sum, a sale of the mortgaged premises, and for the deficiency.

It appearing to the court that Moses Strauss had assigned his interest in the second mortgage to Fanny Kaufman, she was made a party by order of the court, dated March 25th, 1881. Fanny Kaufman answered, and the real contest in the case is *between the bank and this defendant, the contest being which of the two mortgages shall have priority over the mortgaged property. On March 28th, 1881, Judge Fraser referred the case to a special referee, "to take the testimony on the issues of fact presented by the pleadings in the case, and to make his report of the same to the court." This report was made, embracing a mass of testimony, and the cause came on for hearing before Judge Pressley, who in January, 1882, pronounced a decree sustaining the bank, ordering the property to be sold for its benefit, and forever barring the defendants, and Fanny Kaufman, and all persons claiming under her or them, of all right, title, interest, and equity of redemption in the mortgaged premises so sold, or any part thereof.

The defendant, Fanny Kaufman, has appealed upon numerous exceptions. It will be found, however, that the case hinges upon one general question, and that it is a question of fact, to wit: Was the debt now claimed by the plaintiff, and upon which the action rests, contracted before the execution of the second mortgage held by Fanny Kaufman and set up in her answer as a security for two notes presented by her? There is little or no controversy as to the principles of law involved and applicable to the case. It is not denied that the bank had knowledge of the execution of the second mortgage, and if the debt sued on was contracted after this mortgage, all the authorities agree in the proposition that in such case the senior mortgage will be postponed to the second. Hopkinson v. Rolt, 9 H. L. Cas. 514; Seaman & Moore v. Fleming, 7 Rich. Eq. 283; Shirras v. Caig, 7 Cranch, 34 [3 L. Ed. 260]; Truscott v. King, 6 N. Y. 147; Jones Mort. § 3, 74.

The appellant does not deny that the amount sued for is due, and it is admitted in appellant's argument that if this debt is a renewal of a previous indebtedness existing prior to the second mortgage, that it must rank as of the previous debt and be protected by the deed which secured its payment; so that, as has already been stated, the material question is, Was this debt of the bank in existence when the second mortgage was executed? Judge Pressley has expressed himself in the decree very decidedly upon this question. He says that the officers of the bank *prove that in July, 1876, when the senior mortgage was executed, Gunhouse & Co. were indebted to the bank upwards of $35,000, and therefore the mortgage was taken to secure said indebtedness and future advances. He further says that all transactions of a new character between plaintiff and Gunhouse & Co. were duly settled, and the old debt secured by mortgage was reduced by payments from time to time to the sum of $14,815.46. For that amount Gunhouse gave new notes, and frequently thereafter acknowledged the correctness of said settlement, and still acknowledged it; and further, "I am satisfied that said amount, with interest, is yet due to the plaintiff on the old debt secured by the mortgage, and that no debt incurred after the date of said mortgage is included in said amount. The referee to whom the taking the testimony was committed has filed the testimony, showing that $15,636.48 was due to plaintiff on said bond and mortgage on November 16th, 1881." Upon these facts he ordered the land to be sold and the proceeds applied to the amount thus found due.

The first matter for consideration is how far these findings of fact by Judge Pressley are controlling upon this court. The cases upon this subject will be found collected by the reporter, Mr. Shand, in 12 S. C. 613 to 617. The citations there made embrace all of the cases on this subject decided by this court up to that date. The principle upon which the court has acted appears to be, that in appeals in cases of equitable cognizance the findings of fact by a Circuit Judge deduced from testimony taken orally before him, or from evidence submitted in writing, as in this case, will not be disturbed, unless clear error is shown, by reason of an entire absence of evidence to support such findings, or because the manifest weight of the testimony in the cause is the other way, and the burden of showing this is upon the appellant. These cases have not been directly overruled since, and on the principle of stare decisis, and to preserve that uniformity and harmony which should always exist in the administration of justice, and which alone can give confidence and satisfaction to litigants, and to the people, in my opinion these cases until overruled should be followed. They should not be made to apply in one case and disregarded in another. I shall therefore regard them as authority, and under their light proceed to examine the decree.

The testimony clearly shows, that at the date of the mortgage to the bank, to wit, July 12th, 1876, the bank held fifteen inland bills of exchange drawn by I. L. Gunhouse & Co., on and accepted by various parties and business houses, amounting to $35,000; that the mortgage in question was executed to secure the ultimate payment of this indebtedness either as an original indebtedness, as well as all renewals, consolidations, and substitutions, and also any future advances. The fact that the bank held these bills as an original indebtedness, and that the aggregate thereof amounted to the sum mentioned, is not denied. It is admitted in the 4th exception of appellant.

It is, however, claimed that it constituted only a contingent liability, and not a primary debt of Gunhouse & Co.

It is apparent that these bills were not drawn against funds; on the contrary, they were accommodation paper, the money being advanced to Gunhouse & Co. to enable them to carry on their business; and although it was advanced on accepted drafts and bills, yet it was understood all the time that Gunhouse & Co. were the real debtors. Why else did Gunhouse & Co. execute the July bond and mortgage? To what other indebtedness did they refer in the following language found in the bond: "Whereas the said I. L. Gunhouse & Co. stand indebted to the National Bank of Chester, aforesaid, in certain large sums of money, either as makers, payers, or endorsers, or as drawers or acceptors of bills of exchange as well as memorandum checks"? Now this language could have referred to nothing else, as the bank at that time held no other claim upon this firm.

It is true that an accommodation acceptor may be sued primarily, and when sued, he cannot deny his primary liability; but it is well understood that the debt is the debt of the drawer, and he may be treated with for payment in the first instance. 1 Dan. Neg. Inst. 433. This course seems to have been pursued here, not only in the execution of the bond and mortgage on July 12th, 1876, but also upon the final settlement, when the three notes forming the basis of this action were given. Gunhouse & Co. recognized their liability in both of these transactions, also in their failure to answer the complaint, wherein it was expressly charged that the amount sued for is the balance of the debt secured by the mortgage described in the complaint. It is too late now to take the position found in exceptions 1 and 4, that this is only a contingent liability. These exceptions are overruled.

Exceptions 2, 3, 5, 6, 7, and 8 claim in different forms that it was error in the judge to find, that the amount now due was the balance of the original indebtedness, and submit that he should have found that it was a new debt, contracted after the execution of the second mortgage, and therefore should have been postponed to that mortgage. Let us examine the testimony upon this subject.

John J. McLure, sworn as a witness, said: "I am the president of the National Bank of Chester, and have been continuously since its organization in 1871. July 12th, 1876, I was president; I knew the firm of Gunhouse & Co.; on July 12th, they were indebted to the plaintiff in drafts, bills of exchange, and notes in a sum exceeding $30,000; the Board of Directors were not satisfied with the condition of the debt, upon an examination made a short time before, and they requested Gunhouse & Co. to give additional security, which they furnished in the bond and mortgage set forth in the complaint." "It was then understood that the bank would not increase their indebtedness, but would carry it, they reducing it as rapidly as possible, and so long as they would keep it in active bankable form." He said further that the notes sued on show the balance of the indebtedness of I. L. Gunhouse & Co. to the plaintiff—the aggregate remainder or balance of the original debt due July 12th, 1876; that I. L. Gunhouse & Co. had no open running account in the bank other than the usual cash deposit account. He said he knew the amount sued for is the balance of the old indebtedness, and that his knowledge was derived not altogether from the books, but from his own knowledge of the business of the bank; that Gunhouse & Co. had repeatedly acknowledged this debt as being the balance of the old debt.

The book-keeper of the bank and the cashier corroborated *the statements of the president, and did not hesitate to say that the debt now sued was the balance of the old debt secured by the mortgage, these statements being based upon information derived from the books, and from their official connection with the business of the bank. To this is added a statement of the new account of Gunhouse & Co., beginning November 27th, 1876, and running to January 18th, 1878, inclusive, from which it appears that on the day first named Gunhouse & Co. had nothing to their credit; and although during that period they made very large deposits, amounting to something over $100,000, yet upon the last-named day the credits and debits balanced exactly; besides, these accounts were balanced uniformly by the week, showing that no large indebtedness could have originated in this way.

The facts relied on contravene, first, that the items going to make up the present indebtedness had not been traced back, through the books, to the original drafts, notes, and bills of exchange, by the officers of the bank; that all of the original bills, notes, etc., had disappeared, and there was no direct connection between them and the notes now in suit; that as to one of the original drafts on Strauss Bros., to which the book-keeper had traced one of the items of the present debt, Strauss proved that this had been paid; that this was the character of the evidence relied on by the plaintiff.

It is true there was some conflict in the testimony and some uncertainty in tracing the connection between the different papers, but we cannot say, after a careful review of the whole case, that there was an entire absence of testimony in support of the findings of the Circuit Judge, or that the manifest weight of the testimony is against them. We feel constrained therefore to affirm his decree, notwithstanding the appeal has been pressed with great zeal, force, and confidence by the learned counsel for appellant. To do otherwise on our part, would be to disregard precedents, override the Circuit Judge without authority, set up the arbitrary rulings of this court, instead of law as the principle upon which cases are to turn, and render the administration of justice uncertain, perplexing, and wholly unsatisfactory.

*There is no ground for the position that the renewals must be regarded as payment of the old debt. The rule on that subject is, that a note or other promise to pay is never considered as payment of a precedent debt, unless there be a special agreement to that effect, or unless it actually produces payment, and the onus is upon the party alleging such payment to prove it. Costelo v. Cave, 2 Hill, 528 [27 Am. Dec. 404]; Bank v. Bobo, 9 Rich. 31; Adger & Co. v. Pringle, 11 S. C. 547; Thomas v. Kelly, 3 S. C. 214 [16 Am. Rep. 716]; Fraser v. Hext, 2 Strob. Eq. 258.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

TRIMMIEB v. VISE.

(April Term, 1882*)

[Mortgages  $\Leftrightarrow$  295.]

Where a mortgage covers three parcels of land, one of which is sold by the sheriff under an execution junior to the mortgage and purchased by the mortgagee at an under value, the proportion which the true value of the parcel purchased bears to the whole mortgaged property, and not the bid at the sheriff's sale, is the proper credit on the mortgage debt; and the mortgagee may then foreclose his mortgage on the unsold parcels for the balance remaining unpaid.

[This case is also cited in Greenwood Loan & Guarantee Ass'n v. Childs, 67 S. C. 253, 45 S. E. 167, and distinguished therefrom.]

Before Fraser, J., Spartanburg, June, 1881.
Action by F. M. TrimmieB against M. S. Vise and the National Bank of Spartanburg. The opinion states the case.

Messrs. J. S. R. Thomson, G. W. Nicholls, for appellant.

Messrs. Bobo & Carlisle, contra.

July 27, 1882. The opinion of the Court was delivered by

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. The defendant Vise, in 1878, executed a mortgage of two tracts of land, one containing five acres and the other eighty-five, and also of a valuable lot in the town of Spartanburg to the plaintiff, TrimmieB, to secure the payment of a promissory note for $900, payable January 1, 1879, with interest from its date. The town lot was after*wards levied upon and sold by the sheriff under a judgment junior to the mortgage. At this sale the plaintiff, mortgagee, to whom the judgment had been previously assigned, became the purchaser at the price of $556.

This action was then commenced by the plaintiff to foreclose his mortgage on the two tracts of land remaining. The complaint contained the usual prayer for foreclosure and for judgment for any deficiency remaining unpaid after the sale of the land. The answer interposed as a defence that the sale of the town lot and its purchase by the plaintiff, mortgagee, satisfied his note and mortgage, thereby releasing the other lands from its lien. The Circuit Judge decreed adversely to the defendant's position.

The material facts of the case are as follows: The note sued on was given for the town lot. This lot was said to be worth $1,000 when it was bid off by the plaintiff at the sheriff's sale. The plaintiff had paid only a portion of this bid, and action was pending for the balance. No titles had been executed to the plaintiff. The National Bank of Spartanburg held a judgment against Vise junior to the mortgage, and, as a defendant, claimed that plaintiff's mortgage had been extinguished by his purchase of a portion of the mortgage property, and therefore that the two tracts of land should be left undisturbed and subject to its judgment.

The Circuit Judge, while recognizing the general doctrine that where a mortgagee purchases the entire property embraced in his mortgage, otherwise than at a foreclosure sale, he thereby extinguishes the mortgage debt, (Allen v. Richardson, 9 Rich. Eq. 56; McLure, Brawley & Co. v. Wheeler, 6 Rich. Eq. 344; Schnell v. Schroder, Bail. Eq. 338;) yet knowing of no case where this rule had been applied, where only a portion of the mortgaged property had been bought by the mortgagee, as in this case, he overruled the defence and ordered the mortgage of plaintiff foreclosed by sale of the two tracts referred to in the complaint: the proceeds to be paid to plaintiff's debt, costs and expenses of suit; then to the National Bank; and the balance, if any, to the defendant Vise. He further ordered "that the plaintiff have no leave to apply for judgment for any deficiency unless he shall consent that the town lot bid off by him shall be sold by the order of this Court as a part of the mortgage property. If such consent is given, either party may apply at the foot of this decree for such orders as may be necessary and proper."

From this decree the defendant Vise has appealed, assigning error: 1st, Because his Honor erred in not holding that the plaintiff's debt was extinguished by his purchase of the town lot at the sheriff's sale; 2d, If not extinguished, that the town lot should have been ordered to be first resold for the satisfaction of the mortgage debt, and only the balance, if any, should be enforced against the other real estate; 3d, That at least the plaintiff should have accounted for the true value of the town lot before selling the other lands.

The main question involved is the first. The authorities in this State are direct to the point that where a mortgagee purchases the entire mortgaged property at any other sale than a regular foreclosure sale, such purchase will extinguish the mortgage debt. The purchase of the equity of redemption unites the equitable title under the mortgage and the right to redeem in the same person; and where there is no intervening claim, merger is the result, and the mortgagee becomes the owner in fee, with nothing left for the mortgage to operate upon. See the cases referred to above.

In addition to this, the right of the mortgagor to redeem being the only interest that can be sold by a judgment junior to the mortgage, the purchaser at such sale, whether he be the mortgagee or a stranger, is supposed to give the amount of his bid for that interest, over and above the mortgage debt, leaving the land, when purchased by a stranger, still subject to be sold for the mortgage debt, and, when purchased by the mortgagee, to be applied in satisfaction of his debt, which by operation of law is thereby extinguished. As we have already said, this is the admitted doctrine where the entire property has been purchased by the mortgagee.

The difficulty here is, Does it apply in this case, where only a portion of the mortgaged property has been bought by the mortgagee? As far as we have been able to discover, this is *the first case where this question has been raised directly, either in this State or elsewhere. The abstract justice in such case would seem to demand that a mortgagee purchaser should occupy the same position that a third person would occupy under the same circumstances. He ought not to claim any better position than a stranger, nor is there any sound reason why he should be placed in a worse. He has the same right to bid at sheriff's sale as any other party, and he should occupy the same position that any other purchaser would, buying under similar circumstances.

In the case of Moss v. Bratton, 5 Rich. Eq. 3, the Court held that Bratton, who bought at sheriff's sale under an execution junior to the mortgage, obtained his title encumbered with the lien; and though he did not become personally liable for the mortgage debt, yet the land in his hands was specifically bound, so far as it might suffice for the payment of the debt. The only interest sold was the right of the mortgagor to redeem. No doubt Bratton supposed that the land was worth the amount he bid for this interest and the mortgage debt besides. If it turned out upon a resale for foreclosure that he was mistaken, this was an error of judgment on his part, and his misfortune, to which all men are liable; on the contrary, if his estimate was right, he could lose nothing, as a re-sale would, at least, pay the mortgage debt and refund to him the amount paid out and possibly something more.

An outside purchaser under such circumstances buys at this risk; why should not the mortgagee when he becomes the purchaser be subjected to the same? He certainly should not be allowed to take a portion of the mortgage property at simply the value of the mortgagor's right to redeem, a nominal value perhaps, and detracting that portion from the mortgage, then collect his whole debt out of the remainder of the land, thus applying no part of the land bought by him to the mortgage, yet retaining possession. No principle which works such a result can be sound. It would be unjust and oppressive to the debtor in the extreme, in direct conflict with every principle of natural justice, and, in fact, little short of robbery.

On the other hand, it would be equally as unjust to the mortgagor to say that, under all circumstances, where he purchases a portion of the mortgaged property, whether in value sufficient to pay his debt or not, that nevertheless his debt should become extinct. There should be some medium line. Where the mortgagee buys the entire property, there is some reason for the position, that his debt should be regarded as satisfied. When the debt was contracted he took this property as his security, and where he buys the whole of it, at the sale under a junior lien, he may be well supposed, as was said in Moss v. Bratton, supra, to estimate the mortgagor's right to redeem, which is the only interest that can be sold at such sale, to be worth the amount of his bid over and above the mortgage debt, and therefore, in effect, to contract to take the property at his bid and pay the debt besides; and there would be no hardship in such case that he should be held to his contract by applying his bid to the judgment debt and the land to the extinguishment of the mortgage. But where he buys only a portion of the mortgaged property, should this presumption arise to the full extent of extinguishing the entire debt, or should only such proportion of the debt be extinguished as the property bought bears to the whole embraced in the mortgage? This would be the justice and equity of the case; can it be sustained by authority?

It is stated in Jones on Mortgages that where one who has purchased a part of the premises subject to a mortgage takes an assignment of the mortgage, although it may operate as a merger in respect to the part of the premises bought by him, it would not have this effect in respect to the part not bought. Section 849, referring to Wilhelmi v. Leonard, 13 Iowa, 330; Casey v. Buttolph, 12 Barb. 637; 12 Allen (Mass.) 472. Nor is there merger when a mortgagee becomes a devisee of an undivided half of the mortgaged premises. Id., § 849; 42 Barb. 606.

The assignee of a mortgage covering two separate tracts of land having purchased one of them, can collect only the ratable proportion from the other. Jones on Mortgages, § 877, referring to Cotton v. Cotton, 3 Philadel. Rep. 24. And so, if the assignee of a mortgage take a conveyance of the equity of re*demption of one half of the mortgage premises described as one lot, this operates to extinguish only a part of the mortgage debt, leaving the assignee at liberty to foreclose for the residue. Klock v. Cronkhite, 1 Hill (N. Y.) 107; Jones, § 871. These principles are founded in natural justice, and in the absence of all counter authorities in this State we are disposed to adopt them.

In our opinion, the purchase of the right of redemption by the mortgagee of the town lot in question here devolved upon him the duty of extinguishing the mortgage debt to the extent of the ratable proportion of the value of said lot, leaving the other lands subject to foreclosure for the remainder of the debt. In other words, each part of the land mortgaged should be made to bear its ratable proportion in the payment of the debt, and to this end an inquiry should be had, either by reference or otherwise, as to the Circuit Judge shall be deemed most advisable, to ascertain the true value of said lot and what proportion thereof, when compared to the value of all the property mortgaged, should be applied as a credit on the mortgage debt; which being done, the other land should be sold for the remainder with costs and expenses, and if any surplus, this to go as ordered in the Circuit decree.

It is the judgment of this Court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed and the case be remanded to be enforced in accordance with the principles herein.

Mr. Justice McIVER concurred; Mr. Justice McGOWAN absent at the hearing.

McFALL v. SULLIVAN.

[1. Wills ⇨ 758.]

A testator specified and valued the property at that time and previously given to his children, and devised and bequeathed the balance of his property to his wife for life, and after her death to be appraised in lots and "the property taken into the general estimate and divided accordingly." He further directed that "on a final settlement of my estate, that each legatee get the same, and in the division, if it so happen that one gets more than another, that he have one year without interest to refund it in, except C., who I give $500 more than any of the rest." *Held, that none of the children were required to account for advancements.

Before Fraser, J., Greenville, November, 1881.

This was an action by Jane C. McFall and others, children of John C. Sullivan, deceased, against William E. Sullivan, administrator of J. C. Sullivan and others, legatees and devisees under the will of the said J. C. Sullivan, commenced in 1881, for a settlement of the estate of the testator. The case depended upon the construction of the following will:

In the name of God, amen, I, John C. Sullivan, of the District of Greenville and State of South Carolina, being of sound mind and memory, and considering the uncertainty of life, do make, ordain, publish and declare this to be my last will and testament. That is to say:

First, After all my debts are paid, the residue of my estate, real and personal, I give, bequeath to, and dispose of as follows: I have given all my children something but my daughter Clarissa, who I now give eleven negroes, Sam, Ann and her two children, Dennis and Cinda and their five children, together with their future increase, during her life, and at her death to her children. Also, one tract of land containing three hundred and eighty-one acres, consisting of a part of the tract I bought of Joseph Sullivan, and the part of the Martin tract which I purchased, and which was laid off for my daughter Elizabeth, but she moved off and left it. One horse, saddle and bridle, with two beds and furniture, on which I have put the estimate of seven thousand five hundred dollars, which she is to hold during her life, and should she die without lawful heirs, or if heirs, and they should not live to become of age, then this property to be returned unto me if living, and if dead, unto my estate to be disposed of as my other property to my living children, or their legal representatives. I have already given my son John Dunklin Sullivan in land, negroes, stock and trade, horses, cattle, hogs, tools, both plantation and blacksmith's, amounting in all to five thousand eight hundred *and fifty-six dollars, which can be seen by reference to my book of charges against my children; and, whereas, the stock I put in with him in the Grove store turned out to be an unprofitable concern after deducting what I and my family have taken out of it, I release and give up to him any balance of interest I may have to him without any charge for the same. I have already given my daughter Sarah F. Agnew, in negroes, cattle, one mare, household and kitchen furniture, provisions, with five hundred dollars in money, making in all four thousand and eighty-three dollars, which can be seen by reference to my book of charges against my children. I have given my daughter Temperance E. Agnew, in negroes, cash, mules, cattle, hogs, household and kitchen furniture, with provisions, in all making the sum of forty-seven hundred and twenty-nine dollars, which can be seen by reference to my book of charges against my children. I have already given to my daughter, Jane C. McFall, in negroes, one horse, cattle, household and kitchen furniture, with provisions, making in all forty-three hundred and sixty-nine dollars, which can be seen by reference to my book of charges against my children. I have already given my daughter Emma A. Hardin, in negroes, cash, one horse, beds and furniture, the sum of forty-five hundred and sixty-five dollars, which can be seen by reference to my book of charges against my children.

Whereas, my daughter Martha Ann H. Sullivan married in 1855 with Adam L. Eichelberger and died the same year, after giving birth to a child, which died in January, 1856; I loaned them eight negroes with the express understanding that when I came to Florida in the fall I was to deed it in trust to my daughter, as I had the property of my other married daughters, but she died before I reached there, and Eichelberger refuses to give up the property, I intend instituting a suit against him, and if I do not live to carry it out, I set aside one thousand dollars, to be used by my executor in carrying out said suit in endeavoring to recover back said property; and for the base and unprincipled manner in which the said Eichelberger has acted, I leave him one cent as what I design for him out of my estate, and no more.

*The balance of my property of which I may die in possession, I leave to my wife during her life—all my slaves, lands, except the Florida lands, stock of every kind, crop, plantation and blacksmith tools, wagons and carriages, debts due me, all the household and kitchen furniture, except two beds and furniture for Clara, the dividend on my stock in the Hamburg Bank, every other species of property of which I may die possessed, after carrying out the other provisions of this my will.

Should my wife survive me, at her death I wish my property appraised in lots, and taken by my children, Sarah's and Temperance's children each to draw a full share, to go into the hands of their mother's trustee, to be given up to them by him when they become of age; and should any of them die before they arrive of age, the others to take its interest, and if both die of either set, then the property to be taken into the general estimate and divided accordingly.

As soon after my death as convenient, I desire my executor to have the will proven and qualify; have all the property appraised, and if he cannot collect enough out of the debts due me, with the crop, to pay my liabilities, he must sell enough to meet the debts; and if they cannot agree on a division after my wife's death, these will empower him to sell all or any part either personal or real estate, and execute bills of sale and deeds of land; and it is my desire on a final settlement of my estate, that each legatee get the same, and in the division, if it so happen that one gets more than another, that he have one year without interest to refund it in, except Clarissa, who I give five hundred dollars more than any of the rest. It is my desire that my son John D. Sullivan settle up our copartner farm in Florida. Should any of my children murmur or express any dissatisfaction at the disposition I have made of my property, I wish it expressly understood that they be cut off without anything more than they have already received. I desire no sale of anything, but valued and taken by my children. I likewise appoint, make and constitute my son John D. Sullivan executor of this my last will and testament.

In witness whereof, I hereunto subscribe my name and affix *my seal, this the 7th day of January, eighteen hundred and fifty-seven.

John C. Sullivan, [L. S.]

Signed in presence of

S. S. Landers,

W. T. Shumate,

Hewlet Sullivan.

The Circuit decree was as follows:

I concur with the Master in his finding of facts that the eleven (11) slaves mentioned in the will as given to testator's daughter Clarissa (now Mrs. Cannon) went into her possession as her property during the lifetime of testator, and were not a part of his estate at his death. I do not regard this fact, however, as at all important. The language in which this gift to Clarissa is made imports not a gift in futuro to take effect at death, but a gift in presenti to take effect immediately. Testator says as to his other children, I have given, and as to Clarissa, I now give, and if she dies in his lifetime the property to come back to himself in certain contingencies. I am not sure that so much of this instrument is not a deed instead of a will. See Jarman on Wills (Jersey City Edition, 1880), *26, where it is said that there is no objection to one part of an instrument operating in presenti as a deed and another in futuro as a will. If either by the words of the instrument itself or by any act of giving away this property after the execution of the will the title passed out of John C. Sullivan in his lifetime, it was no part of his estate and could not be included in any general words simply describing his estate. And if the will had directed that all the children should be made equal in the division of the whole property, that which had been given away and which thus passed out of the operation of the will could not be properly taken into the estimate. It is true that testator may refer in his will to such previous gifts, or even to some arbitrary standard of value as a guide in the distribution of his estate, but such directions must be plainly given in the will, and are not found in this instrument.

Again, I do not think it will change the situation if we hold *that the property given to Clarissa passes under this instrument as a will, and did not come into her possession until after the death of John C. Sullivan, the testator. The gifts are specific even as to the real and personal property given to Clarissa, and unless controlled by the subsequent clause, are no part of the residue, or to be taken into any account with it on the final division. I do not think that this will can be properly construed so as to require the gifts to the other children, admitted to have been inter vivos, and these gifts to Clarissa, whatever they may be, to be taken into the account in making the children equal. The direction in the will is, "It is my desire, on a final settlement of my estate, that each legatee get the same, and in the division if it so happen that one gets more than another that he have one year without interest to refund it, except Clarissa, who I give five hundred dollars more than any of the rest." The equalization is to be made on "a final settlement" and in the division then made.

A division can be made only of property in which the parties are interested as joint-tenants or tenants in common, and there is no such interest in any of the other gifts to the children referred to. This clause stands by itself in the will and speaks for itself, and has no necessary reference to the other gifts. If the gifts to Clarissa in the previous part of the will are to be taken into the account in equalizing the shares, there is no reason why she should not be required to pay back a portion of the value ($7500) if on final division the other children do not receive sufficient to bring them within $500 of that amount. If she is to account for the gifts for one purpose, she must do so for all, and this is clearly not the intention of the testator as expressed in the will. If the testator intended these specific gifts to be brought into the account on final settlement, he would have expressed his purpose in plain language, and not used language which points to a different conclusion.

This is a case to which the doctrine of advancements does not apply. The loss of property in slaves is a common loss, and the estate must now be settled in the same way as if there had been a loss to this extent from any other cause. The share of each child in this property will now go to him or her, or to *his or her representatives to be divided amongst them, and Sarah's children will take one share amongst them and Temperance's children one share amongst them. This I take is the proper construction of the will, one full share to Sarah's children and one full share to Temperance's children.

It is therefore ordered and adjudged that out of the net proceeds of the sale of the land heretofore ordered to be sold in this case there be paid to Clarissa (now Mrs. Cannon) one full share and the sum of five hundred dollars, to Sarah's children one full share amongst them, to Temperance's children one full share amongst them, one full share to each of the other children of the testator, and where any of them have died, to their representatives as set out in the complaint.

Certain of the heirs of the testator appealed from this decree, upon the single ground that there was error in so much of this decree as holds that the will of John C. Sullivan, deceased, cannot be properly so construed as to require that the gifts to his children, including those to his daughter Clarissa, be taken into account in making his said children equal under the provisions of said will.

Messrs. Wells & Orr, for appellants.

Messrs. T. Q. Donaldson, M. F. Ansel, contra.

July 28, 1883. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. Dr. Jno. C. Sullivan, late of Greenville County, died in 1864, leaving a last will and testament, in which, after providing for the payment of his debts, and stating that he had already given all of his children something, except his unmarried daughter Clarissa, afterwards Mrs. Cannon, he then proceeds to give her certain property consisting of slaves and a tract of land containing 381 acres, and some other personal property, which in all he valued at $7500, upon certain terms and conditions. This bequest was referred to in the will as if the testator intended it as a gift in presenti. He then enumerates the property previously given off to his other children, ranging from $4800 to $5000 to each, closing

*as to each with these words: "which can be seen by reference to my book of charges against my children."

After some other unimportant directions, he leaves all the balance to his wife for life, directing that upon her death his property should be appraised in lots and taken by his children, the children of his two deceased daughters, Sarah and Temperance, each to draw a full share among them; but if they could not agree on a division, his executors were empowered to sell all or any portion for that purpose, expressing his wish that upon a final settlement that each legatee should get the same, further directing "that if in the division it should so happen that one gets more than another, that he should have one year without interest to refund, except Clarissa, to whom he gave $500 more than the rest."

His son, Jno. D. Sullivan, was appointed executor, who, after partially administering the estate, died, and William E. Sullivan, a son of John D., administered with the will annexed, de bonis non. W. A. McDaniel administered upon the estate of John D. The estate of Dr. Sullivan not having been settled, this proceeding was instituted for an accounting between the estate of the former executor, John D. Sullivan, and that of Dr. Sullivan, for the sale of the real estate of Dr. Sullivan, and for final settlement according to the rights of the parties.

The only serious question in the case is as to the liability of the children and especially of Mrs. Cannon to account for the property received by them as advancements. The case was referred to a referee to take the testimony, who reported as to Mrs. Cannon, that she went into the possession of the property bequeathed to her in the will previous to the death of her father. He also reported the amounts received by the others. The presiding Judge decreed that the settlement should be made without regard to the previous gifts, and that this should apply to Clarissa as well as to all the others, and this, too, whether Clarissa took her part under the will at the death of her father, or as a gift previous to his death. He held that there was to be no accounting. The appeal raises the question whether there was error in this ruling.

It was said in the case of McDougald v.

King, Bail. Eq. *154, that the law on the subject of advancements applies only to cases of intestacy. This is without limitation, except where the children have been advanced after the making of the will. Then it may be made a question whether such advancements are not to be taken in satisfaction of legacies given in the will, and especially will this be done if the advanced party consents to bring in his advancements. The doctrine of accounting for advancements as a legal principle comes from the statute, Genl. Stat. 440, and it applies exclusively to cases of intestacy. Allen v. Allen, 13 S. C. 513 [36 Am. Rep. 716]. But still it has never been denied that a testator might regulate the disposition of his property as he deemed best, so that in so doing he violated no established principle of law. Within this limit he can make his own law as to his own property, and the courts will respect and enforce it. In Allen v. Allen, supra, Mr. Justice McIver said: "The doctrine of advancements applies only to cases of intestacy, or when directed by the will."

Dr. Sullivan died testate, so that the question involved here must be determined upon the construction of his will. Did he intend that his children should account? and does that intent appear? There is certainly nothing in the will which directs such accounting in express terms, and if he had intended this, it is somewhat singular that the testator did not so declare in unmistakable language. He was evidently a man of more than ordinary intelligence. He had a large estate to dispose of, and no doubt knew full well how to express intelligently his purposes in reference thereto, and yet the will is silent as to any positive direction on that subject. This is a significant fact, and should have influence in endeavoring to reach the intent of the testator, which, as is often said, is the pole-star in the construction of wills. Can such intent be fairly inferred from the whole will, or from any portion of it?

The only portions of the will that refer to the division of his property among the children are the last two clauses. In the first of these two, after having given the balance of his property to his wife, he directs that, should his wife survive him, at her death it is his wish that his property be appraised in lots and be taken by his children. What property did he refer *to in this clause? Evidently, that taken by his wife for life. He had none other undisposed of. After enumerating in his will the portions given off to all of his children, including that given to Clarissa, he then gave the entire balance of his estate to his wife during her life, and proceeds to direct that at her death his property should be appraised in lots, for his children.

Could any other property have been appraised and divided into lots except that in which he had reserved the power to dispose of, after the death of his wife? Could the executors, with the view to equalize these lots, have required the advanced children to bring into hotchpot their advancements? They certainly had no such power. The will was their guide and warrant of authority, and this gave them power only over such property as he might die possessed of with a life estate in his wife. This they were directed to appraise into lots for division, and having performed this, their powers and duties ended so far as this clause is concerned.

In the last clause the testator contemplated the possibility that the children might not agree on a division at the death of his wife. In such case he empowered his executor to sell all or any portion, either personal or real, to that end, expressing a desire that upon "final settlement each legatee shall get the same;" and in the division, if it should so happen that one legatee gets more than another, that he shall have one year without interest to refund it in, "except as to Clarissa, to whom he gave $500 more than the rest."

In these two clauses the testator seems to refer entirely to the property left in the hands of his wife for life. This was to be divided equally, either by appraisal and allotment of the property itself as a whole, if that could be done, otherwise by sale in whole or in part, as the necessities of the case might require. We see nothing in the language of either clause, or in the general scheme, which either by necessary implication or reasonable inference leads us to believe that the testator intended to embrace in this last division any of the property previously given off to any of his children.

The inequality of the previous advancements cannot raise *such an inference. Testators have the right to dispose of their property as they may see fit, and while it is usual for parents to give each child an equal share, yet there is no law which requires this. Nor when a departure is made can any one demand the reason. No one but the parent himself knows the different advantages which have been received by his children respectively, the different services rendered by each, or the future necessities to be provided for. The law, therefore, wisely leaves all this to him, and to that parental attachment, which is universal, and which is the safest guaranty to parental justice. The law seeks only to know the intent. When that is reached by the proper application of the legitimate canons of construction, whatever this may be, if not inconsistent with well-established principles, the law will protect and enforce.

Seeing nothing in the will either express or necessarily implied which authorizes the construction that the testator intended that his children should account, and this being a case of testacy, it is the judgment of this Court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

MARS v. VIRGINIA HOME INSURANCE COMPANY.

[1. Garnishment ⚡126.]

In an action on a policy of fire insurance issued by a Virginia company, the Circuit judge refused to admit in evidence a certified copy of proceedings in the courts of Virginia which showed that this debt had been attached in the hands of this defendant under an attachment there issued against this plaintiff. Held that this refusal was error.

[2. Evidence ⚡244.]

The admissions by a local agent of the defendant company of the principal's liability to pay the loss were improperly received in evidence, it not having been made to appear that the local agent was authorized to adjust losses or had other powers that would make such admissions binding on his principal. And they were no part of the res gesta.

Before Aldrich, J., Abbeville, February, 1882.

*515

*Action by W. W. Mars against the Virginia Home Insurance Company, commenced July 2d, 1881. The complaint among other things, alleged that the fire "did not happen by any fraud, evil practice, or neglect of the plaintiff, or in any way excepted in the condition of said policy."

Besides proof of the fire, value of the house, stock, etc., plaintiff testified that a few days after the fire he submitted his affidavit of loss to W. T. Branch, the local agent of the company, to be sent on to the company; that soon afterwards Branch went to the place to adjust the losses, and required copy of the invoices, which were procured; that Branch afterwards gave plaintiff a blank to be filled, which was filled up particularly by detail and items, verified and delivered to Branch, who promised to deliver to the company; and that Branch told him several times that the loss would be paid. Two of plaintiff's brothers testified to the same effect. On the part of the defendant, W. T. Branch, the local agent of the company, testified that within a few days after the fire plaintiff brought up and handed him affidavits in relation to the loss, but that he told him they were not sufficient proofs; that he sent them on to the company right away; that he went down to plaintiff's to adjust the loss for the company; that he never told plaintiff or E. A. Mars the company would pay the loss.

Defendant then proved by J. W. Morrah that he saw at J. E. Caldwell's house a box, and offered to prove that J. E. Caldwell, who lived some distance from plaintiff, told him something about the box, plaintiff not being present, which he had in his possession just before the fire. Plaintiff objected, and the presiding Judge rejected the declaration on the ground that it was hearsay.

Defendant also offered in evidence an exemplification of the proceedings in the Circuit Court of Richmond, Virginia. Upon objection made by the plaintiff, the presiding Judge ruled it out.

The brief thus states the Judge's rulings:

"The presiding Judge held upon the argument of the law, that, if the plaintiff made and delivered to the defendant company through its agent the proof of loss which he said he *made, it was sufficient, and that the plaintiff could only be required to make such proof as would be reasonable, and could not be held to be in default only because the agent of the company said it was not satisfactory to them. Defendant objected to the admission in evidence of W. T. Branch's declarations as to what the company intended to do about paying the loss, but the presiding Judge overruled the objection.

On the question of fraud, the presiding Judge charged the jury that the complaint alleged that the fire occurred without fraud, negligence, or evil practice on the part of the plaintiff; that it was often difficult, sometimes impossible, to prove a negative; that it was incumbent on the plaintiff to make proof of the facts and circumstances of the burning; and that, having done that, unless it appeared from the evidence offered by the plaintiff that there was fraud, the burthen was shifted on the defendant company, and it was incumbent on them to prove that there was fraud on the part of plaintiff. His Honor charged the jury that, if they found the plaintiff was entitled to a verdict, they should add to the amount so found interest thereon from date of the burning of plaintiff's storehouse."

The jury, in accordance with this instruction, having allowed the plaintiff interest on his claim from the 3d day of January, 1881, the date of the burning of the plaintiff's storehouse, rendered a verdict for the plaintiff for the amount claimed with interest thereon from the date of the fire, being the sum of $2265.37. When the plaintiff came to enter up his judgment, he entered a remittitur for the sum of $27.56, being the interest allowed by the jury from January 3d, 1881, the date of the fire, to March 10th, 1881; this was done without defendant's consent.

The defendant appealed on the following exceptions:

1. Because his Honor refused to allow the defendant to introduce in evidence a properly certified copy of the proceedings of D. O'Neill & Sons against W. W. Mars, attaching in the hands of this defendant whatever amount of money the said defendant was due this plaintiff, said proceedings being a record in the Circuit Court of the city of Richmond, State of Virginia, a Court having full legal jurisdiction of said proceedings.

*517

*2. Because his Honor ruled that it was incumbent on the defendant to show fraud, although the plaintiff's complaint alleged that there was no fraud.

3. Because his Honor ruled that proofs of loss were served by plaintiff more than sixty days before the commencement of plaintiff's action herein, although no evidence was introduced as to the contents of said alleged proofs.

4. Because his Honor allowed plaintiff to introduce evidence that W. T. Branch, after the fire, said that the company would pay W. W. Mars, whether the said W. W. Mars paid his debts or not.

5. Because his Honor charged the jury that if they found that the plaintiff was entitled to a verdict, they should add to the amount so found interest thereon from the date of the burning of plaintiff's storehouse; the jury, in accordance with this instruction, having allowed the plaintiff interest on his claim from the 3d day of January, 1881, the date of the burning of plaintiff's storehouse.

6. Because his Honor refused to allow the defendant to introduce in evidence declaration of J. E. Caldwell that the boxes of goods in his possession just before the fire belonged to W. W. Mars, plaintiff aforesaid.

7. Because the rulings and charge of his Honor were in all other respects contrary to law.

Mr. Eugene B. Gary, for appellant.

Mr. Ellis G. Graydon, contra.

July 31, 1882. The opinion of the Court was delivered by

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. This action is against the defendant, a corporation under the laws of Virginia, upon a policy which covered a house and a stock of merchandise of plaintiff, located in Abbeville County, afterwards consumed by fire. Among other defences, the answer set up the fact that the defendant had been garnisheed in the State of Virginia, under attachment proceedings, by a creditor of the plaintiff, a citizen of Charleston, to the amount of $340, and that this *proceeding was pending in Virginia. To sustain this defence, the defendant offered as evidence a certified copy of the proceedings in the Circuit Court of the City of Richmond, a court of record, to which plaintiff had been made a party. This evidence was ruled out by the presiding judge.

In the course of the trial, the declarations of W. T. Branch, a local agent of the defendant, made after the fire, to the effect that the company would pay for the loss, were received in behalf of the plaintiff against the objections of the defendant. There were other objections not necessary now to mention. The verdict was for the plaintiff for $2265.37.

We think there was error in the rulings of the Circuit Judge upon the two matters above referred to. Mr. Drake says "That the operation of an attachment against a garnishee is compulsory. He has no choice but to pay obedience to the judgment of the court to whose jurisdiction he has been subjected, and the exercise of that jurisdiction effects a confiscation, for the plaintiff's benefit, of the debt due from the garnishee to the defendant. In this proceeding it is an inviolable rule that the garnishee shall not be prejudiced, or placed in any worse situation than he would have been in if he had not been subjected to garnishment. That is, if obliged, as garnishee, to pay to the plaintiff the debt he owed to the defendant, he shall not be compelled again to pay the same debt to the defendant. When, therefore, he is sued for that debt either before or after he has been summoned as garnishee, he must be allowed to show that he has been, or is about to be, made liable to pay, or has paid, the debt under an attachment against the defendant in which he has been charged as garnishee." Drake, § 700.

He then proceeds to show to what extent this defence will avail the defendant, and how he may take advantage of it both when the garnishment is prior to or pending the suit brought by the defendant in the attachment against the garnishee for the debt, and also after judgment rendered against the garnishee. The substance of which is, that while the garnishment is pending, it will operate at least as a "continuance, or suspension of the action, or if judgment be rendered, a stay of *execution, which can be removed afterwards, or made perpetual in whole or in part, as the exigency of the case may require. Where the action is brought after judgment rendered against a garnishee, the Court pronouncing the judgment having jurisdiction of the action and of the person of the garnishee, such judgment is conclusive against parties and privies, and constitutes a complete defence to any subsequent action by the defendant against the garnishee, for the amount which the latter was compelled to pay, and this, though the Court be a foreign tribunal." Drake, § 700 et seq., and numerous cases referred to in the notes. Campbell v. Home Insurance Co., 1 S. C. 158.

These principles are founded in good sense, and have been adopted in many of our sister States in the administration of their attachment laws, and we think they should have been applied and enforced here. The defendant proposed to prove by a certified copy of the proceeding in a court of record of the State of Virginia the pendency of the garnishment against them in that State. What effect this testimony would have had, whether causing a continuance, or judgment with a stay of execution, or whether the court in Virginia had acquired jurisdiction, we cannot now say. All this would have been for the Circuit Judge to consider, at his sound discretion. But we think the testimony was competent, and should have been received.

Next, as to the declarations of Branch. Branch, it seems, was a local agent of the defendant. His declarations were admitted, we suppose, upon the ground, that being agent, they were in law the admissions of his principal. The correctness of this ruling must depend upon the fact whether the admissions were in reference to a matter within the scope of his agency. It is well established that an agent can bind his principal within the limit of his agency as fully as the principal could himself, and no doubt the declarations and admissions of the agent within that limit would also be binding. But the agent is powerless outside of his agency. He is as complete a stranger as any one else, as to all matters except such as have been entrusted to his care and authority.

*Now, was Branch an agent entrusted with such full powers as to be authorized to admit the liability of the defendant for the losses incurred by the plaintiff in advance of any action by the defendant itself? There was no testimony before the Court, as appears from the brief, as to the character of Branch's agency. It is simply stated that he was the local agent of the defendant. Where the declarations of an agent are offered and objected to, the first step required to make them competent is to prove the agency, and to show that in its legitimate scope it embraces the very matter about which the agent proposes to speak.

No one can be presumed to be the agent of another in the absence of all testimony. Nor can the limit of an agency be determined without some evidence as to the subject-matter over which the agent has charge. It is the duty of a party relying upon declarations and admissions of an agent to furnish this information to the Court before asking that they shall be heard. We do not think that the declarations of Branch were competent in reference to all matters of interest to the defendant simply because it was understood that he was the local agent of the company.

The policy stipulated that payment for losses should be made sixty days after proofs required by the company "shall have been received at the office of the company in Richmond, Va., and the loss shall have been satisfactorily ascertained and proved," as required by its terms. There is nothing in the policy charging Branch with the duty of ascertaining and determining when the company should be liable. It does speak of certain facts which must be furnished to the company, or its adjusting agent, but it does not appear what the powers of an adjusting agent were, nor whether Mr. Branch occupied that position. Mr. Branch may have been simply an agent to insure and to pay in case of loss. This would not necessarily carry the power to admit liability. He is incidentally referred to by some of the witnesses as an adjusting agent, but the testimony on the subject does not seem to have been direct and express, and besides is quite meagre. These declarations were not admissible on the ground that they were part of the res *gestæ. Patterson v. Railroad Co., 4 S. C. 154; Aiken v. Telegraph Co., 5 S. C. 369.

We see no error in the exclusion of the declarations of J. E. Caldwell. He was no party to the action, nor had he any interest therein. He was a competent witness, and might have been put upon the stand to prove the facts referred to in his proposed declarations. The admissions of the declarations of this party would have been in direct conflict with the rule in reference to hearsay, and they constituted no part of the res gestæ. See the cases supra.

Nor do we think that the rulings of the Circuit Judge as to the question of fraud were erroneous. If fraud was involved in the case at all, it constituted a matter of defence and was no part of the cause of action.

The error assigned as to the sixty days involved a question of fact, and it does not appear that the finding of the jury on that subject is without testimony.

It is the judgment of this Court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed on the two first grounds mentioned above, and that the case be remanded for a new trial.

of James F. Crawford. The opinion *states the referee's report, the order of the Circuit Judge, and the facts of the case. The plaintiff excepted to the order of the Circuit Judge because it overruled the exceptions to the Master's report. Those exceptions alleged error in the findings of law and fact by the Master, quoting the language of the report, and were otherwise as follows:

4. Because it is respectfully submitted said Master erred in not taking into the account the amounts which the executor paid other creditors whose debts were of equal rank with that of the executor.

5. Because it is respectfully submitted said Master erred in holding that Confederate currency, received by the executor, could work a payment by operation of law for the face value of said Confederate currency, Confederate currency not being at any time legal tender, and could not, under such circumstances, work a payment by operation of law for more than the value of said Confederate currency.

6. Because it is respectfully submitted said Master erred in making his calculations, even according to the principles laid down in his report.

Mr. Eugene B. Gary, for appellant.

Messrs. Rice & Smith, W. C. Benet, contra.

July 31st, 1882, the opinion of the court was delivered by Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. In April, 1861, James F. Crawford, since deceased, executed a sealed note to his brother the defendant, S. A. Crawford, for $1936.64, payable one day after date with interest from the 1st day of January preceding. James F. Crawford died, or was killed during the war. He left of force a last will and testament in which he appointed his wife, the defendant, Anaryllis, and his brother, the said S. A. Crawford, executor and executrix, both of whom qualified.

The debts of the estate were not very heavy, and the only property which seems to have been sold, was a lot of cotton, which brought $2000, and a few cattle for $350.

These sales *were made in 1864, and were paid in Confederate money to S. A. Crawford, aggregating $2350.00. This executor paid debts of the estate, and other expenses, and liabilities of the deceased, during the years 1863, and 1864 to the amount of $1028, a large portion of which were upon simple contract debts. At the close of the war he claimed to have on hand $2000 of his receipts above, in Confederate currency which had become valueless.

Some time in 1880, he transferred the note which is the basis of this action to his wife, who in March, 1881, brought this action against him and the executrix. He made default, but A. E. Crawford, executrix, answered, and resisted the claim of plaintiff upon two grounds. 1st. That S. A. Crawford being the payee of the note, and having been the owner during his executorship, and having had assets of the deceased debtor in his hands sufficient to pay this debt, it was by operation of law extinguished. 2d. At all events, S. A. Crawford should be required to account for the estate of the debtor, so that whatever might be in his hands should be discounted against this sealed note before any judgment should be rendered in this action.

The case although a law case was sent to a referee, who reported his conclusions as follows: 1st. As matter of fact, "that the executor had had assets in his hands sufficient to pay the debt; 2d. "That the facts show evidence of his intention to receive said assets in payment of his debts." And as matters of law; 1st. "That the debt in suit was extinguished by operation of law, the executor having had in his hands assets sufficient to pay the same; 2d. "That upon the note being transferred after it was due, it passed to the plaintiff with all the equities to which it was liable in the hands of the payee." This report was confirmed by the Circuit Judge and the complaint consequently dismissed with costs.

The appeal renews the exceptions to the Referee's report, which were overruled by the Circuit Judge. These exceptions raise several questions of fact, as well as of law; the questions of fact we cannot consider; the action, although heard by a Referee and the Circuit Judge without a jury, is yet an action *at law. It is an ordinary money demand, by summons and complaint on sealed note, and was strictly triable by a jury. In such case this court has no jurisdiction of the facts; these belong primarily to a jury subject to review by the presiding judge on motion for a new trial, but not within the powers of this court. The fact that the case was submitted to a referee did not change its character; it was still a case at law, the referee being substituted as to the facts in the place of the jury. This substitution, however, had no other effect; it certainly did not convert the case into a case in chancery with appellate privilege to this court. We must then take the facts found by the referee, as fixed and established; we have no power under the constitution to look behind them, and this would be so even if we were satisfied that they had been erroneously established, for the reason, that in cases at law our powers are expressly limited to the correction of errors of law only.

But the questions of law raised in the exceptions are subject to our review, which we will proceed to consider. 1st: Was it error in the Circuit Judge to hold that the debt in suit was extinguished by operation of law, the executor having had assets in his hands sufficient to pay the same.

The rule in such cases is laid down in Williams on Ex'rs *1187, as follows: "If a debtor makes his creditor, or the executor of his creditor, his executor, this alone does not extinguish the debt, though there be the same hand to receive and to pay; yet if the executor has assets of the debtor, it is an extinguishment because then it is within the rule that the person who is to receive the money is the person who ought to pay; the debt, in other words, is not extinct unless upon a supposition that the executor has assets which he may retain to pay himself." This is the rule in this State, as it has been repeatedly held. In Montaigne v. Keith, 2 Hill, 340, the court said: "There cannot be a doubt about the matter; the moment the defendant was in funds, the debt due himself was paid and extinguished, and would no longer bear interest."

Assuming the fact upon which the error of law is here assigned to be true in its full sense, we could not do otherwise than overrule this exception; but we cannot shut our eyes to the further fact that the assets which the referee found in the hands of the executor were Confederate money. Such being the fact, in the application of the legal principles involved in this exception, a subsidiary question of law must also be considered, to wit, whether in law Confederate currency can be held to be such assets as would in the hands of a creditor executor, extinguish his debt against the estate by operation of law, as in cases of gold or other legal tender. The referee must have so held and the circuit judge concurred.

There are two well established principles in reference to the payment of debts; 1st. Nothing is a legal tender except gold and silver, or such currency as may constitutionally be made so, and consequently no creditor can be legally required to receive payment, against his will, of a debt in anything else but legal tender currency; 2d. A creditor may receive anything whatever, oak leaves, grains of sand, or anything else in payment, if he is willing to do so, and when so received, in the absence of fraud, or deception, the claim will be satisfied beyond revival. It is needless to cite authorities in support of these propositions.

Now, Confederate currency did not constitute a legal tender, and no creditor of the estate of the deceased could have been forced to receive it in payment of his claim. Nor could the executor, occupying the relation of creditor as well as that of executor to the estate as he did, have been legally required to receive it. He had all the rights of other creditors, and could receive or reject as he saw proper. There was error in law, therefore, in holding that because the executor had Confederate money, nominally sufficient to pay his debt, that it was thereby extinguished, regardless of the fact whether he was willing to receive it or not.

The findings of fact, however, by the referee and concurred in by the circuit judge, went further. He found in substance that J. A. Crawford, executor, had agreed to receive this money. He states in the report,

"that the facts show evidence of his intention to receive said assets in payment of his debt." We do not suppose that by this was meant that S. A. Crawford intended to receive these assets in full payment, whether there was enough to satisfy his claim or not, but that he was to receive it at its nominal value, and apply so much as might not otherwise be used to his note at that value. The report of the referee is not full, and the decree of the circuit judge dismissing the complaint simply confirms the report, and we suppose that in concluding that the executor's debt had been extinguished by the assets received by him, he was not allowed any credit for amounts disposed of in payment to other creditors, especially to debts of lower rank than his own.

A creditor executor, it is true, has the right to retain funds for the payment of his own debt of equal rank with others, and generally it is his duty to apply collections first to sealed demands in preference to unsealed obligations, and if he pays debts of lower rank he will not ordinarily be allowed a credit for such payment; but this rule is not inflexible. It was held in Hinton v. Kennedy, 3 S. C. 459, "that where the administrator of an entirely solvent estate pays simple contract creditors out of their order, reserving ample funds for the payment of specialty debts, equity will relieve him from the legal consequences of the technical devastavit." This seems to be the rule, and it should be applied here. This estate was entirely solvent, but a small portion of the property had been sold to pay debts, (nothing but the cotton and a few cattle,) and we do not think that the executor should be held to have committed a devastavit because he has applied a portion of the proceeds derived from this sale to debts of a lower rank than his own, especially where the creditors were willing to receive the money. He should be credited with the full amount of his payments. Under all the circumstances, the case should be remanded.

The referee having found as matter of fact, that the executor had agreed to receive the Confederate money on his claim before its transfer to the plaintiff, the note of the plaintiff should be credited with the amount received by him, first deducting such sums as he may have paid out for the estate, and for such claims as he may have held against his brother—the credit to be made at the nominal value of the confederate money, and applied at the date of his receipts, with the right

*527

*on the part of the plaintiff to proceed with her suit for the remainder, if any.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the circuit court be reversed, and the case be remanded for a new trial under the principles herein above.

Before Cothran, J., Kershaw, September, 1881.

Action by Charlotte A. Cantey against Ann W. Whitaker, for the recovery of land, commenced December 30, 1880.

Defendant's attorneys, in argument before the jury, claimed a verdict upon the ground, among others, that plaintiff had failed to prove any title to the land in dispute, and had failed to show that the land in dispute was embraced in any of the deeds offered in evidence. The presiding Judge said that he thought it was understood that the land described in the deeds embraced the tract in controversy, and had so entered it on his notes. Defendant's counsel said there was no such understanding, and he did not admit that the deeds embraced the disputed portion of land. The Judge then said he would allow plaintiff to supply the requisite proof if she could, and at the conclusion of the argument of defendant's counsel, plaintiff called E. B. Cantey, who testified that "He knew the land described in the deeds, and that the tract occupied by defendant was embraced in them and in the land now claimed by plaintiff." His Honor noted the exception of defendant to the introduction of this *evidence, and plaintiff's counsel closed the argument before the jury. All other matters are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. J. T. Hay, T. H. Clarke for appellant.

Messrs. Chesnut & Workman, Kennedy & Nelson, contra.

August 8, 1882. The opinion of the Court was delivered by Mr. Justice McGOWAN. This was an action for a tract of land by metes and bounds in the neighborhood of the town of Camden. Some years ago the land was owned by one E. E. Adamson, from whom both parties claim. Whilst Adamson owned the land, about 1851, he gave the defendant, Mrs. Whitaker, permission to build on the "Peter Old Field (part of said land), and live there as long as he pleased." The neighbors helped Mrs. Whitaker to build a house upon it, and she has lived there continuously ever since the year 1852. She was sworn as a witness, and stated that her claim was twenty acres, which had been staked off to her by "a blazed line on two sides, a road on one side, and a branch on the other; that about six acres were under fence; that she had used the land as her own, cutting wood and preventing others from trespassing on it; and that she had paid taxes on it for a number of years, etc. She produced no paper title.

In November, 1857, Adamson sold the tract (including the land where Mrs. Whittaker lived), to James Dunlap, who, in 1861, conveyed the same to John Cantey, who being in debt, and judgments against him, the land was sold by the sheriff of Kershaw county as his property, May 24, 1881, and finally, the plaintiff, Charlotte A. Cantey, received titles for the same. In none of these conveyances was there any allusion to Mrs. Whittaker, or any reservations in favor of her or any one else. The plaintiff, finding the defendant living on and claiming title to a part of the land included within her boundaries, brought this action against the defendant to try the title.

The defendant claimed the land under the statute of limitations, and being on the stand as a witness, proposed to prove by her own testimony what was said and done at the time she *went into possession by Adamson, who is now dead. The presiding Judge excluded this testimony, holding that Adamson being dead, Mrs. Whittaker could not state communications or transactions with him as against Mrs. Cantey, the alienee of the land then owned by Adamson.

Under the instructions of the Judge, the jury returned a special verdict, giving the land to the plaintiff "with the understanding that the defendant live on the twenty acres as long as she pleases, or during her life." The judgment was entered accordingly, and the defendant appeals to this Court upon the following exceptions:

1, "That his Honor erred in excluding testimony offered by defendant as to transactions and communications had by defendant with E. E. Adamson in reference to the land in dispute herein."

8, "Because after plaintiff had closed her case and failed to prove that any of the deeds proved by her embraced the land in dispute, and after defendant's attorneys concluded their argument before the jury, in which they claimed a verdict on the ground that plaintiff had failed to prove title, his Honor allowed plaintiff to prove that said deeds did cover the land in dispute, and that by incompetent evidence; and defendant respectfully submits that his Honor erred in so doing."

As to the last ground of appeal, it is only necessary to say that the object of all judicial proceedings is to administer justice according to the facts as they exist, and although it is absolutely necessary to observe some rules of procedure, it is always very desirable that all the facts of a case should come out and be considered. In directing a trial upon circuit, the Judge in the interest of justice, must have a large discretion. We see no error of law in his allowing testimony to be offered after the case was closed and partly argued, especially as the Judge, if not the counsel, had been under a misapprehension as to whether the fact was admitted. Kairson v. Puckhaber, 14 S. C. 627, and the authorities there cited.

As the case has to go back, it would not be proper now to consider the other grounds of appeal except the first, which alleges *error "in excluding evidence offered by defendant as to transactions and communications had by defendant with E. E. Adamson in reference to the land in dispute herein." The old rule upon the subject was that no one was a competent witness who was interested in the event of the suit on the side of the party offering him. The tendency in modern times has been to enlarge the field of competency and to allow objections to go rather to the credibility than to the admissibility of witnesses.

The Code of Procedure, section 414, makes the sweeping provision that "no person offered as a witness shall be excluded by reason of his interest in the event of the action." This is the rule declared, and section 415 extends that rule even to the parties to the action, but at the same time makes some exceptions, "That parties shall not be examined in regard to any transaction or communication between such witness and a person deceased, insane, or lunatic as against a party then prosecuting or defending the action as executor, administrator, heir at law, next of kin, assignee, legatee, devisee or survivor of such deceased person," etc.

The plaintiff now owns and is suing to recover the land, which was owned by Adamson at the time of the alleged "transactions" with him, as to which it is claimed that those "transactions" gave the defendant rights, and the said Adamson being now dead and unable to make his own statement, it would seem that the testimony comes within the principle of the rule which excludes testimony as against one suing as assignee of property in question. But whilst, as it seems to us, the plaintiff as alienee is within the mischief intended to be remedied by the exception, she is not within its express terms. She is third or fourth alienee of the land from the deceased person, but she is neither "executor, administrator, heir at law, next of kin, assignee, legatee, devisee, or survivor" according to the terms of the exception, which enumerated those intended to be excepted, and this Court, whose only duty it is to declare the law, cannot amend it so that its terms will embrace a case, which we may suppose to be within the principle upon which the law was founded, but not within its express terms. Guery, Trustee v. Kinsler, 3 S. C. 426.

*In that case the plaintiff sued in the character of a trustee, succeeding by appointment the original trustee, Pearson, who was dead. The action was upon a bond given to Sarah Brown, testatrix, who had by her will appointed the first trustee. The defence was that the bond had been paid to the first trustee, and the obligor of the bond was offered to prove the payment, the person to whom the alleged payment was made being dead. The Court held that the principal obligor was competent to prove payment of the bond to the deceased trustee, "the general rule being that interested persons are competent witnesses, and the plaintiff not being a party against whom such evidence is excluded by the terms of sec. 415 of the Code of Procedure."

Chief Justice Moses, in delivering the judgment of the Court, said: "The section is in restriction of a general right, and we are not at liberty to extend it beyond its clearly expressed design. If there is doubt arising from any ambiguity of expression, it would be proper, if possible, to reconcile it with the intention of the legislature, if that could be ascertained by the means through which courts are permitted to reach it. Where, however, an exception is made by words of description, including only persons referred to as occupying particular relations, it would be transcending our authority and usurping the functions of another department to include others who, though they may be within the mischief, have not been so recognized and protected by the enactment. * * * The New York Code contains a provision of the same character, though less extensive in the relations to which it applies. It has been held by the courts of that State that its operation must be restricted to the parties named in it, and cannot be extended to embrace those who, though within its spirit, are not within its letter." Hight v. Sackett, 34 N. Y. (7 Tiff.) 447, and other authorities.

It is contended that if the evidence had been admitted it would only have proved an estate at will, and that could not have defeated the plaintiff's right to recover. We cannot tell in advance what the witness would have proved, and we do not undertake to say now what would be its proper legal effect, *but we only hold that the plaintiff did not fall within the exceptions expressly enumerated in sec. 415, and that we cannot enlarge them by judicial construction, and therefore the testimony should have been admitted for what it was worth.

The judgment of this Court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed, and the case remanded for a new trial.

17 S. C. 532

Ex parte YOWN.

[1. Deeds ⇨120.]

A deed conveyed land to "S., her heirs and assigns (for and during her natural life, should she die without issue) * * * to have and to hold the said tract unto the said S., her heirs and assigns for and during her natural life as aforesaid. Should she die without bodily issue, the said tract to revert to the children of D., deceased. But should the said S. have a child or children, then the said land to rest in them absolutely." S. died without issue. Held, that, by this deed, S. took an absolute estate, which, at her death, intestate, passed to her heirs at law.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Smith v. Clinkscals, 85 S. E. 1068.]

For other cases, see Deeds, Cent. Dig. § 440; Dec. Dig. ⇨120.]

[2. Descent and Distribution ⇨82.]

This deed purported to have been made in pursuance of a prior agreement, and such agreement recited that S., the widow of one D., and the five sons of D. by a former marriage, had agreed to divide the property, giving to "S. one-sixth in lieu of all claim of dower, the property coming to her under said agreement, she hereby agrees that she will take good care of, and if she should die without bodily heirs then she hereby agrees and covenants that, at her death, all the remaining property shall revert back to the heirs of D"; provided, the said sons took care of her while she lived if she became helpless or needy. The widow having become helpless and needy and not being assisted by the sons, held, that the condition stipulated as that upon which the land was to revert not having been performed, the fee remained in S. under this agreement, and it mattered not that the sons were ignorant of her needs.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Descent and Distribution, Cent. Dig. § 318; Dec. Dig. ⇨82.]

[3. Trusts ⇨30.]

There was nothing in this agreement or deed in the nature of a covenant to stand seized to uses.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trusts, Cent. Dig. §§ 39, 40; Dec. Dig. ⇨30.]

[4. Descent and Distribution ⇨82.]

There is nothing in the agreement that would authorize the Court to reform the deed because of accident or mistake, the agreement itself showing an intention that the fee should not be reduced to a life estate except upon a contingency which never happened.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Descent and Distribution, Cent. Dig. § 318; Dec. Dig. ⇨82.]

[5. Evidence ⇨236.]

The declarations of S. as to the nature of her estate amounted to no more than the expressions of an opinion, and were, therefore, inadmissible as evidence against her heir at law.

*Before Fraser, J., Anderson, October, 1881. The opinion states the case.

Messrs. Featherston & Benet, B. F. Whitner, for appellants.

Mr. J. L. Tribble, contra.

August 8, 1882. The opinion of the Court was delivered by Mr. Justice McIVER. John L. Davis died intestate in 1863, leaving as his heirs at law five sons, children of a former marriage, and his widow, Sallie Davis. The heirs being all of age, determined to close up the estate without administration, and, for this purpose, on August, 1863, entered into an agreement, which was reduced to writing, whereby agents were appointed to sell the estate and divide the proceeds; but one-sixth, embracing the land about which this controversy arises, does not seem to have been sold by these agents. By this agreement, the widow, upon certain conditions therein stated, agreed to share equally with the children, and to take her share for life, with remainder to the other heirs, in case she should die without issue. The material terms of this agreement are expressed in the following language: "The said Sallie Davis, the widow, agreeing to receive a child's share of said estate, in lieu of all claim of dower in said estate, the property coming to her under said agreement, she hereby agrees she will take good care of and if she should die without bodily heirs, then she hereby agrees and covenants that, at her death, all the remaining property shall revert back to the legal heirs and representatives of the before-named John L. Davis, deceased; provided, the children of the said deceased shall, on their part, faithfully carry out their part of said agreement—they, the before-named Wm., T. W., J. H., T. G., and G. W. Davis, for and in consideration of the said Sallie Davis, the widow, allowing the share coming to her as aforesaid to revert back to them at her death, do covenant and agree that, should the said Sallie Davis, by any unforeseen accident, become helpless or needy in her lifetime, they bind themselves, their heirs and assigns, to take care of her while she lives."

"In pursuance of this agreement, the five sons of the intestate, on August 26th, 1863, executed a deed to Sallie Davis for the tract of land, which (or rather the proceeds of its sale) is the subject-matter of controversy. This deed, after referring in its preamble to the above-mentioned agreement, proceeds in the following words: "In consideration of the before recited agreement, and in consideration of the sum of twelve hundred and ten dollars to us paid by Sallie Davis, have bargained, granted, sold, and by these presents do grant, bargain, sell, and release unto the said Sallie Davis, her heirs and assigns (for and during her natural life, should she die without issue) all that plantation, etc., containing one hundred and twenty acres more or less, bounded * * * To have and to hold the said tract of land unto the said Sallie Davis, her heirs and assigns, for and during her natural life as aforesaid. Should she die without bodily issue, the said tract of land to revert to the children of the said John L. Davis, deceased. But should the said Sallie Davis have a child or children, then the said land to rest [sic] in them absolutely forever."

Sallie Davis died intestate in 1880, without issue, leaving as her only heir at law her sister, the petitioner, Polly Yown, and administration of her estate was duly committed to the other petitioner, J. L. Brock. After her death, the sons of J. L. Davis commenced an action for partition of the tract of land conveyed by the above-mentioned deed to Sallie Davis, making all the heirs of J. L. Davis parties, but not making the heir of Sallie Davis a party. Under this proceeding the land has been sold, and the proceeds are now in the hands, or under the control of the Court. At this stage of the case, Polly Yown filed her petition, claiming the proceeds of the sale as heir of Sallie Davis; and J. L. Brock filed his petition, asking that so much of said proceeds as may be necessary for the payment of the debts of Sallie Davis should be paid over to him as her administrator.

The Circuit Judge held that Sallie Davis had an estate in fee simple in said tract of land, but inasmuch as the petitioners did not seek to set aside the sale or disturb the purchaser in his possession, but were content to go upon the proceeds *of the sale, he decreed that so much of said proceeds as would be necessary to pay the debts of Sallie Davis should be paid to her administrator, and that the balance should be paid to Polly Yown as her sole heir at law. From this decree the heirs of John L. Davis appeal, and the real question made is whether Sallie Davis was entitled to an estate in fee simple in said fund or only to an estate for her life.

There can be no doubt but that at the death of John L. Davis, Sallie Davis, his widow, was entitled, as one of his heirs, to one-third of his estate in fee simple. This she could surrender in whole or in part, both as to the amount of her share and the quality of the estate she had therein. It does not seem to be contested that she has consented to cut down her interest from one-third to one-sixth, and the practical question is whether she has cut down her estate therein from a fee simple to an estate for her life only, with remainder to the other heirs of John L. Davis. The appellants contend that she has done so, and for this purpose rely upon the terms of the above-mentioned deed, construed in connection with the agreement. But even if these two papers be construed together, we are unable to perceive how such a result can be reached. The most that can be said is, that the agreement indicates a willingness on the part of Sallie Davis to reduce her estate to an estate for life, in the event that two conditions shall be fulfilled: 1st, that "she should die without bodily heirs." 2d, that should she "become helpless or needy in her lifetime" that the other heirs would "take care of her while she lives."

The first of these conditions was fulfilled, she having died without leaving any heirs of her body, but the Circuit Judge finds, as matter of fact, and we think his finding is fully supported by the evidence, that the second condition was not performed. It will not do to say that the sons were never called upon to render any assistance to Sallie Davis, and did not know of her helpless and needy condition, and were, therefore, not in fault in not performing the duty required of them by this condition. The proviso upon which she consented by this executory agreement that her estate should be cut down to a life estate was, that they were to take care of her while *she lived, that is, look after her wants and see that she was properly provided for. This, the testimony shows, they wholly failed to do, and thus the condition upon which her estate was to terminate with her life wholly failed.

This, then, being the proper construction of the agreement, what is the effect of the deed construed, either separately or in the light of such agreement? Looking to the terms of the deed alone, we think it plain that it conveyed an estate in fee simple and not an estate for life merely. The words "do grant, bargain, sell, and release unto the said Sallie Davis, her heirs and assigns," are certainly the most appropriate words that could be used to create an estate in fee simple, and the subsequent words used cannot have the effect of cutting that estate down to a life estate. The words immediately following those just quoted, "for and during her natural life should she die without issue," cannot have any more force and effect than words of similar import used in McAllister's will, by which he gave to N. M. Arnold a certain tract of land "in fee simple for life," and there it was held that the devisee took an estate in fee, and that the superadded words "for life" must be "regarded as repugnant to the estate already conferred, and should be rejected." McAllister v. Tate, 11 Rich. 515 [73 Am. Dec. 119].

The words to Sallie Davis, "her heirs and assigns," in the case now under consideration, are practically the same as the words to N. M. Arnold, "in fee simple," and the additional words "for and during her natural life should she die without issue," are in effect the same as the words "for life" in McAllister's case. This case is even stronger than that, for there the question arose under a will, where greater latitude is allowed in seeking for the intention, while here the question is as to the construction of a deed, where one of the rules is that its terms must be taken most strongly against the grantor.

The same remarks will apply to the terms used in the habendum clause, "to have and to hold the said tract of land unto the said Sallie Davis, her heirs and assigns, for and during her natural life as aforesaid"—the superadded words "for and during her natural life" must be rejected as manifestly repugnant *to the estate already secured. And the words "should she die without bodily heirs the said tract of land to revert to the children of the said John L. Davis, deceased," amount to nothing more than a bungling attempt to create a limitation over by way of executory devise, which, of course, cannot be done by deed. We think, therefore, that the Circuit Judge was clearly right in the conclusion which he has reached, and that he is fully supported by the authorities cited by him. Edwards v. Edwards, 2 Strob. Eq. 101; Allen v. Fogler, 6 Rich. 54, to which may be added the case of Adams v. Chaplin, 1 Hill Eq. 265.

It is not unimportant to bear in mind that Sallie Davis was unquestionably once invested with an estate in fee; that she has never, by any conveyance, parted with that estate; and that the most she has done was to agree that such estate should be reduced to a life estate only upon the performance of a certain condition by the appellants, which they have failed to perform, and that the deed which appellants claim has, by estoppel, cut down her fee to a life estate, if construed by the light of its own terms only, must be regarded as creating in her an estate in fee, and not an estate for life merely; and even if construed in connection with the preceding agreement, it cannot, by estoppel, operate to defeat the real intention of the parties, which was that the estate of Sallie Davis was to terminate with her life only in the event that the conditions named, one of which has failed, should be fully performed.

We are unable to see how "the agreement as acted upon by the deed," can be regarded as a covenant to stand seized to uses, whereby Sallie Davis reserved a life estate to herself with remainder to the other heirs of J. L. Davis, as contended for by one of the counsel for appellants. These papers do not purport to rest, and are not in fact based upon such a consideration as is necessary to support that species of conveyance. And even were they regarded as a covenant to stand seized to uses, the construction contended for by the appellants would defeat what we have seen was the real intention of the parties.

Nor can we see that the appellants have made a case warranting the exercise of the power of the Court to reform agreements upon the ground of accident or mistake, for it seems to us that the conclusion reached by the Circuit judge leaves the estate of Sallie Davis exactly where she intended it should be left in the event of the failure of either conditions upon which it was to take a different direction. It is conceded on both sides that, if she had died leaving issue, her estate was to remain what it originally was, a fee simple, and would have descended to such issue as her heirs; and inasmuch as it would not be possible to know with certainty whether she would have issue until her death, it was necessary that the fee should continue in her. And by the terms used in the agreement, Sallie Davis practically said, I agree that my estate, which is now a fee simple, shall, at my death without issue, be reduced to a life estate with remainder to the sons of Davis, provided they will take care of me in the event of my becoming helpless or needy; but, if these conditions are not fulfilled, then my estate is to remain as it is now, a fee simple. Hence, until these conditions were fulfilled, the estate originally in her could not be cut down to any lesser estate. She has never, by any conveyance, parted with any portion of her estate, and has only agreed that it should be reduced to a life estate upon a contingency which has never happened.

The only remaining inquiry is, whether the declarations of Sallie Davis as to the nature of her estate were competent. That was a question of law upon which her declarations, even if otherwise competent, would amount to nothing more than the expression of an opinion, and were, therefore, clearly incompetent.

The judgment of this Court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

Before Hudson, J., Spartanburg, April, 1881.

Action by B. R. Smith & Co. against John E. Bryce, commenced January, 1880.

Upon the points considered by this Court, the judgment of the Circuit Court was as follows:

This action is by the plaintiffs, who are commission merchants and cotton factors of Boston, Mass., against their principal, John E. Bryce of Spartanburg, seeking to recover a balance alleged to be due them on an account stated between them. At a previous term of this Court, the case being called for hearing, his Honor, Judge Wallace, against the consent of the defendant, it appearing that a long accounting is involved in the action, referred the matter to a referee to take testimony and ascertain the balance due on the account and report the same to this Court. This work has been done by the referee. At the hearing on report of the referee at the present term, the defendant, through his counsel, the juries having been discharged, demanded a trial by jury, and protested against a trial by the Court upon the report of the referee. The plaintiffs insisted upon a trial without a jury. I take it for granted that if the question had been urged before Judge Wallace he would not have, against protest, ordered a reference. But the cause having taken this course under a previous order of this Court, *I did not feel that I should arrest its further progress and remand it to trial by jury.

Besides, the action, though in form in assumpsit, is between parties standing in a fiduciary relation, and does involve a statement of accounts. The jurisdiction of a court of equity may well be invoked to determine such an adjustment of accounts, and this view of the case possibly induced the compulsory reference. We are not disposed to hold sec. 295 of the Code as applicable to actions at law, unconstitutional as violating the right of trial by jury, but look upon it as a provision of law in furtherance of the ends of justice. It is only in actions at law containing features of equitable jurisdiction that compulsory references are allowed, and this is one of that class.

All other matters are stated in the opinion.

Mr. R. W. Shand, for appellant.

Messrs. J. S. R. Thomson, Ralph K. Carson, contra.

August 8, 1882. The opinion of the Court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McIVER. The plaintiffs, who are cotton factors and commission merchants, doing business in the city of Boston, brought this action on an account for money advanced to the defendant at divers times between October 31, 1876, and December 5, 1877, alleging that no part thereof had been paid except as stated in the complaint, to which is annexed a copy of the account as an exhibit. They also allege that on March 1, 1878, an account was stated between the plaintiffs and the defendant by which a balance of six hundred and ninety-seven dollars and five cents was found to be due by defendant to the plaintiffs, and they demand judgment for such balance with interest from March 1, 1878.

The defense mainly relied upon by the defendant was that, though it was true that the plaintiffs had advanced him large sums of money from time to time, to be used in buying cotton to be shipped to the plaintiffs for sale on commission, yet he had shipped a sufficient amount of cotton to refund these ad*vances if the same had been sold as directed by the defendant; but that plaintiff, by delaying the sale, in violation of such instructions, had caused a loss which resulted in throwing the balance against the defendant.

The case being at issue was docketed by the plaintiff's attorneys on Calendar No. 1, when an order was moved for by plaintiffs to refer the cause to a referee, on the ground that it was a case requiring the examination of a long account. Defendant, by his counsel, objected to the reference on the ground that it was not a case requiring the examination of a long account. On hearing the complaint, Judge Wallace overruled the objection, and passed the following order: "It appearing that a settlement of a long account is involved in this action, it is ordered that it be referred to Geo. W. Nicholls, Esq., as special referee, to take testimony and state all the accounts of the parties in this action and report the same to this Court."

The referee made his report, finding as matter of fact that the exhibit filed with the complaint is a correct statement of the account between the parties, and that defendant "is not entitled to any discount, set-off, or counterclaim by reason of the plaintiff's not selling the cotton immediately on arrival, or from any want of diligence in failing to secure the best price in selling said cotton," and as matter of law that the defendant is indebted to the plaintiffs in the sum mentioned as the balance due in the complaint, with interest from March 1st, 1878.

The case being still on Calendar No. 1, was not reached until after the juries were discharged for the term, and when it was taken up by consent, the defendant insisted upon his right to a trial by jury, and objected to a hearing without a jury. The Circuit Judge overruled the objection, and required the parties to proceed with the trial, to which ruling the defendant excepted. After argument, the Court rendered judgment in favor of the plaintiffs for the amount found to be due by the referee, and from this judgment defendant appeals upon various grounds. We do not, however, propose to consider any of these grounds but the first, which raises the question whether the defendant was entitled to have the case *tried by jury, inasmuch as, under our view, the case must go back for a trial by a jury, and it might be premature to consider questions upon the merits which may be presented at another trial, in a different light, and under a different state of facts.

The only question, therefore, is whether the case was such as to entitle the defendant to demand a trial by jury. To determine this question, it is only necessary to inquire whether this was a case of which the Court of Equity could have taken jurisdiction at the time of the adoption of the present Constitution, for it is not pretended that it falls within any of the other classes of cases in which the parties did not then have a right to a trial by jury; because, if it were not such a case, then clearly the defendant had a right to a trial by jury, which right is secured to him by the express terms of the Constitution, Art. I., Sec. 11. "The right of trial by jury shall remain inviolate," that is, wherever that right existed at the time of the adoption of the Constitution, such right should "remain"—continue inviolate.

It is very manifest that the Court of Equity could not have taken jurisdiction of this case, for it was nothing but an ordinary action on an open account, or, as it is claimed in one of the paragraphs of the complaint, an action upon an account stated; and regarded in either light, it is clear that it presented no ground of equitable cognizance. The remedy at law was plain, adequate, and complete, as much so as if it had been an action on an ordinary merchant's account or on a blacksmith's account.

It is quite true that the jurisdiction of the Court of Equity in matters of account was well settled, but we do not understand that it was ever supposed that a Court of Equity could take jurisdiction of every case in which it was sought to recover the amount of an account or a balance due thereon, and certainly not on an account stated, for that presupposes that the parties have already come to an accounting, and ascertained the balance due, and this would supersede the necessity for calling into action the machinery of a Court of Equity, which it was supposed was more peculiarly adapted to *taking and stating accounts between parties. To give that Court jurisdiction there must be some feature in the case peculiarly belonging to equity proceedings.

As is said by Marshall, C. J., in Fowle v. Lawrason, 5 Peters, 503: "It cannot be admitted that a Court of Equity may take cognizance of every action for goods, wares, and merchandise sold and delivered, or of money advanced when partial payments have been made, or of every contract, express or implied, consisting of various items on which different sums of money have become due and different payments have been made. Although the line may not be drawn with absolute precision, yet it may be safely affirmed that a Court of Chancery cannot draw to itself every transaction between individuals in which an account between parties is to be adjusted. In all cases in which an action of account would be the proper remedy at law, and in all cases where a trustee is a party, the jurisdiction of a Court of Equity is undoubted. It is the appropriate tribunal. But in transactions not of this peculiar character, great complexity ought to exist in the accounts, or some difficulty at law should interpose, some discovery should be required in order to induce a Court of Chancery to exercise jurisdiction."

We are unable to discover in this case anything which imparts to it any feature of equitable cognizance. There is no allegation of any complexity in the account requiring the aid of the machinery of a Court of Equity for its proper adjustment, no allegation of any difficulty in making the necessary proof before the jury, or of any obstacle in the way of a proceeding at law, no demand for a discovery, nothing to indicate that the plaintiffs have not a plain, adequate, and complete remedy at law. Indeed, the plaintiffs do not ask for an accounting, and, on the contrary, the whole frame of their complaint shows that no accounting is necessary or desirable. They simply present a plain legal demand, and demand a judgment which a court of law is quite as competent to render as a Court of Equity would be.

It is true that the language used in Sec. 295 of the Code seems to be broad enough to authorize a reference without *the consent of the parties, in any case where the examination of a long account is necessary, but this language must be construed as applying only to those cases in which a trial by jury is not secured to the parties, in order to avoid a conflict with that provision of the constitution guaranteeing that right. We think, therefore, that the defendant was entitled to have his case tried by a jury, and that the Circuit Court erred in denying him that right.

It is contended, however, by the respondents that the appellant has waived his objection to the order of reference, based upon the ground of his constitutional right to a trial by jury, inasmuch as the only ground that he took in opposition to that order was, that this was not a case requiring the examination of a long account, and not that it was a case in which he had a right to a trial by jury. It will be observed that, by the terms of the order of reference, the issues in the action were not referred to the referee to be heard and determined by him, but he was simply required "to take testimony and state all the accounts of the parties in this action, and report the same to this Court;" and as Sec. 295 of the Code, in subdivision 1 provides that the referee "may be directed to hear and decide the whole issue, or to report upon any specific question of fact involved therein," the defendant might well have supposed that the object of the order of reference was not to preclude him from his constitutional right of trial by jury, inasmuch as the order did not authorize the referee to hear and determine the issue, but simply to take the testimony, state the accounts, and report the same to the Court, and that, when the report came in, the question as to the mode of trial could be made. Accordingly, when the report was made to the Court, the question as to the mode of trial was at once raised, and we think it was in time, inasmuch as up to that time there had been no trial of any of the issues in this action.

Again, it is contended that the defense set up by the answer was an equitable one, and thereby the case was converted into an equity case. Even were this so, it would not deprive the defendant of the right to have the legal issues presented by the plaintiff's claim tried by a jury. Under the pecuiar *system of pleading and practice introduced by the Code, a case may present both legal and equitable issues, and in such an event, it has been held, in Adickes v. Lowry, 12 S. C. 108, that the proper practice is, that the issues should be separated, and each tried by its appropriate tribunal. Hence, even if it should be conceded that the answer set up an equitable defense, the defendant would not thereby lose the right to have the purely legal claim set up by the plaintiffs tried by a jury.

We are, not, however, prepared to concede that the answer must necessarily be regarded as setting up an equitable defense. While it is true that a principal might have gone into the Court of Equity for the purpose of demanding an account from his agent or factor, yet it does not follow that this would have excluded a court of law from taking jurisdiction of the question, whether all proper credits had been allowed by the agent or factor on an account upon which he had brought an action in a court of law against his principal. And this is really what the defense set up in this case amounted to.

The judgment of this Court is, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed, and that the case be remanded to that Court for a new trial.

BURNETT v. BURNETT.

(April Term, 1882.)

[1. Deeds ⇨120; Trusts ⇨140, 151.]

A father executed a deed whereby in consideration of the "affectionate love I have for my daughter B., and having special confidence in my brother C. and M. as trustees, I give to my daughter and the lawful heirs of her body the following property, or to the trustees for her and her heirs' use and benefit, ninety-two acres of land * * * reserving the use of the same during my life." Held, that the estate of the daughter was a fee-conditional, and at her death it passed per formam doni to the heirs of her body.

[2. Trusts ⇨131.]

It is regarded as a conveyance to trustees (which is doubtful), the estate both in B. and the heirs of her body would be of like quality, and there being nothing for the trustees to do, the statute would execute the uses.

[3. Trusts ⇨151.]

The heirs of the body take the land per formam doni, but subject to the debts of the first taker.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trusts, Cent. Dig. § 195; Dec. Dig. ⇨151.]

[4. Trusts ⇨616.]

The first taker had the power of alienation during her lifetime, but *she could not devise this land, and therefore a sale by her executor for the payment of her debts under a power given to him in her will was without authority.

Before Fraser, J., Spartanburg, June, 1881.

Action by J. W. Burnett and Margaret his wife, against Marcus Burnett, Matthew Burnett, William M. Kinney, and Mary his wife, and J. B. Davis, executor, commenced January 25, 1879. To the facts stated in the opinion it will be necessary to add only that William M. Kinney and Matthew Burnett were the purchasers of the land sold by Davis, as executor.

The case was referred to C. P. Wofford, Esq., as special referee, who made an able report, and the cause came on to be heard on exceptions by both sides to this report. The Circuit decree was as follows:

I concur with the referee in his construction of the deed of Mark Cantrell to Mary Burnett and also in the conclusion that the land was liable for Mary Burnett's (afterwards Mary Hammett's) debts after her death. I do not see that any other conclusion is consistent with the principles on which the cases referred to in the report are based. At the same time this Court is bound by the decision in Jones ads. Postell et al., that such an estate cannot be aliened by a devise—creating a liability for debt is an act done in the lifetime, and a devise can only take effect at the death. A devise cannot change its essential character by making it a devise to pay debts, instead of a devise for any other purpose. If the land is liable for the debts, it must be by operation of law, and must be subjected to them in the way provided by law, and not in or through the operation of a devise to executors with a power of sale. There being no valid devise, the power of sale falls with it.

The amendment to rule 55 of the Circuit Court directs that no partition of real estate shall be made without "due provision made for the payment of debts."

The possession of this land held by Matthew Burnett and *William and Emiline McKinney, under the deeds of John Bankston Davis, the executor, after notice from the other parties of their objections to the sale is such an exclusive and adverse one as ought to make them liable for rent, and ought not to entitle them for improvements made for their own purposes, and in defiance of the rights of the other children. A man could be improved out of his estate against his will and protest if such a claim were allowed.

It is therefore ordered and adjudged that the deeds executed for these lands by the executor be delivered up by Matthew Burnett and William and Emiline McKinney to the Clerk of this Court to be cancelled by him, and that the notes given to the executor for the purchase money be given up by him, and any money received on account of these purchases be repaid to the purchasers respectively. That the said two tracts of land be sold.

From this decree plaintiffs appealed on the following exceptions, alleging error:

1. In holding that the land in controversy was liable for the payment of the debts of Mary Hammett, deceased.

2. In not holding that under the deed of Mark Cantrell the children of Mary Hammett took a fee simple estate in said lands.

3. In ordering a sale of said land when there was no proof of debts more than could be paid by the other property of Mary Hammett already sold by the executor.

4. In holding that the referee could pass upon other issues than those referred to him and embraced in the pleadings.

5. In making a decree not within the purview of the pleadings, nor relevant to the issues upon which testimony was taken.

6. In holding that even if the children of Mary Hammett are liable for her debts, such liability could be enforced in this action.

7. In holding that the land described in the pleadings is assets in the hands of the children of Mary Burnett for the payment of her debts.

8. In not decreeing that the defendants, or some of them should pay the costs of this action.

*548

*9. In not holding that the plaintiffs are entitled to the relief demanded in the complaint.

Defendant, J. B. Davis, appealed on the following exceptions, alleging error:

1. In holding that the terms of the deed from Mark Cantrell to Mary Hammett did not convey a fee simple estate to Mary Hammett.

2. In holding that Mary Hammett had no authority under said deed to direct the sale of the land by her executor for the payment of her debts.

3. In holding that the deeds of J. Bankston Davis, as executor, did not convey good titles to the purchasers.

4. In holding that the land should be resold.

Mr. J. S. R. Thomson, for plaintiffs.

Messrs. Bobo & Carlisle, for defendant Davis.

August 8, 1882. The opinion of the Court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McIVER. The principal questions in this case arise upon the construction of a deed which is couched in very informal and inartificial language. Its material terms are as follows: "Know all men by these presents that I, Mark Cantrell, for the bare affectionate love I have to my daughter, Mary Burnett, and having special confidence in my brother Lanceford Cantrell and Joseph W. Martin as Trustees, I give to my daughter and the lawful heirs of her body the following property or to the Trustees for her and her heirs' use and benefit ninety-two acres of land lying * * * reserving the use of the same during my life. And if my wife, Sarah Cantrell, is a longer liver than me, she is to have the use of the Home tract of land, for her support, and choice of the negroes and mares—2 cows and other household and kitchen furniture, as my trustees for my daughter and her lawful heirs think proper, during life or widowhood. And it is my earnest desire that my trustees attend to [here some words are manifestly omitted] agreeable to the intention of this writing or conveyance."

*549

*The grantor's wife pre-deceased him, and Mary Burnett, who subsequently intermarried with one Hammett, died in 1877, leaving no issue of her second marriage, Margaret the wife of the plaintiff J. W. Burnett, and the defendants Marcus Burnett, Matthew Burnett and Mrs. McKinney being her issue by her first marriage. By her will she appointed the defendant Davis executor, directing him to sell sufficient of her personal and real estate to pay her debts. The executor sold all of her property both real and personal, including the lands conveyed by the above mentioned deed, and the object of this action is to set aside the sale of these lands and to have the same partitioned amongst the above named heirs of Mary Hammett, formerly Mary Burnett.

The first question presented is as to the nature of the estate which Mary Hammett took in the lands conveyed by said deeds. Both the referee, to whom the issues in the action were referred, and the Circuit Judge held that she took an estate in fee conditional, and we concur with them in so holding. The deed, as will be seen, is very informal, but the conveying words are to Mary Burnett "and the lawful heirs of her body." The authorities universally hold that these are the apt words, to create an estate in fee conditional, and we are unable to discover anything in the terms of this deed to take this case out of the well-settled general rule. The subsequent words "or to the trustees for her and her heirs' use and benefit" cannot have this effect, for the word "heirs" as there used must be construed as meaning the same class of heirs—heirs of the body—which had previously been designated. The same remark will apply to the words "lawful heirs" as used in the latter part of the deed. These words are not found in the habendum clause, as suggested in one of the arguments, for there is no such clause in the deed and must be regarded as used to indicate the same class of persons referred to in the conveying part of the deed.

Nor can the fact that trustees are interposed affect the question. For, even if the deed should be regarded as a conveyance to the trustees for the use of Mary and the lawful heirs of her body, about which there might be a serious question, it would not take the case out of the operation of the rule in Shelley's case. It is true that the case of Austin v. Payne, 8 Rich. Eq. 9, does hold that where the estate of the ancestor and that limited to the heirs are not of the same quality, that is, where one is equitable and the other legal, the rule in that celebrated case will not apply. But that case recognizes the doctrine that where both estates are equitable it will apply. If, therefore, the deed should be regarded as creating an equitable estate, originally, in Mary, it created the same kind of an estate in the heirs of her body, and both estates lost that character when there was nothing for the trustees to do, as the statute would then execute the uses. Bouknight v. Epting, 11 S. C. 71, and the cases there cited. The only duty imposed upon the trustees was an exercise of their discretion as to what property the wife of the grantor should be allowed the use of, in the event she survived him; but as she died before the grantor, there was absolutely nothing for the trustees to do, and hence, even if it should be regarded that the deed conveyed the estate to the trustees, the statute would execute the uses and the estates would become legal both in Mary and the heirs of her body.

Regarding then the estate as a fee-conditional, our next inquiry is whether it was liable for the debts of Mary Hammett, the first taker, in the hands of her heirs. In the case of Izard v. Middleton, Bail. Eq. 228, cited with approval in Pearse v. Killian, McM. Eq. 231, it was held that lands held in fee conditional are bound, after the birth of issue, by the lien of a judgment or decree, against the tenant in fee, in bar of the right of the issue to take per formam doni. It seems to me that the same reasoning which led to this conclusion would necessarily lead to the conclusion that land so held would be assets for the payment of debts even though not reduced to judgment; and such was the opinion of the distinguished Chancellor Harper who delivered the opinion of the Court in Izard v. Middleton. At page 235 he says: "But if there had been no decree against Mr. Izard in his lifetime, yet if the heir takes only by succession from the ancestor, and in his right, it would seem to follow that whatever would be liable *to debts in his hands must be assets in the hands of the heir; and such is the purport of the Statute 5 Geo. 2, Chap. 7." It is true that this was only a dictum, inasmuch as in that case the debt had been reduced to judgment and had become a lien on the land during the lifetime of the first taker, yet it is a dictum supported not only by the great name of that eminent jurist, but by the unanswerable reasoning employed by him in that case.

The fundamental difference between an estate in fee conditional, after the condition has been performed, and an estate in fee simple is, 1st. That in the former the course of descent is confined to a particular class of heirs, and upon failure of such heirs the estate reverts to the donor; 2d. That the holder of such an estate can only dispose of it by some act which takes effect during his life. In all other respects their qualities and incidents are the same. In a grant of an estate in fee conditional, heirs of the body are not named on account of any benefit intended for them or for the purpose of controlling or limiting the ancestor's power of disposition during his life, but simply for the purpose of prescribing the course of descent, in case no such disposition is made. In the case of a fee simple estate the law prescribes that the estate shall descend to the heirs generally, in case the ancestor makes no disposition of the estate, while in the case of an estate in fee conditional the instrument creating the estate confines the descent to a particular class of heirs. Both classes of heirs take by succession from the ancestor, and as in fee simple estates the heirs general take the estate subject to a liability for the debts of the ancestor, we see no reason why, in estates in fee conditional, the heirs of the body to whom the descent is confined should not take the estate in the same way.

Our next inquiry is as to the effect of the disposition made by Mary Hammett, by will, for the sale of the lands held by her in fee conditional. In this State it has been settled that an estate in fee conditional is not the subject of devise. Jones ads. Postell, Harp. 92. To allow such a power to a tenant in fee conditional would be to give him the power to disturb the course of descent fixed by the instrument creating *the estate, and hence it cannot consistently with the nature of the estate be allowed. The moment the first taker dies, without having alienated the estate in his lifetime, it descends to and rests in the heirs of his body, and his will, which can only take effect after his death, cannot divest the heirs of the estate. So, at common law, a joint tenant could during his life alien his estate, but he could not devise it for the reason that "no devise can take effect till after the death of the devisor, and all the land presently cometh by the law to his companion who surviveth," and the commentator remarks that Littleton "by the words post mortem and per mortem used in the text, though they jump at one instant, alloweth priority of time in the instant, which he distinguisheth by per and post. And the reason of this priority is that the survivor claimeth by the feofor, and therefore in judgment of law his title is paramount to the title of the devisee, and consequently the devise is void." Co. Litt. 180a. It follows, therefore, that Mary Hammett had no right to devise the lands conveyed by the deed from Mark Cantrell, her power of disposition ceasing with her life, and that the sale thereof made by the executor, under the directions of her will, even though for the payment of debts, was without authority.

The points raised by the plaintiff's third, fourth and fifth grounds of appeal cannot be considered by us, as there is no copy of the pleadings set out in the "Case," and we are not at liberty to assume that the Circuit Judge went beyond the scope of the pleadings in rendering his decree. He was bound by the 55th Rule of the Circuit Court to make due provision for the payment of debts before ordering the partition asked for; and the counsel for the plaintiff is in error in supposing that it did not appear that the personal estate was insufficient for the payment of the debts, for the referee distinctly reported that the debts of Mary Hammett "amounted to very nearly the value of her whole estate."

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

*BATES, REED & COOLEY v. KILLIAN & BROTHERS.

[1. Attachment *§*232, 233.]

Attachments may be dissolved upon two grounds: 1st, Where some irregularity of a fatal character appears on the face of the proceedings; 2d, Because that the allegations upon which it was issued are untrue.

Before Aldrich, J., Greenville, January, 1882.

This was a motion made by defendants at Pickens to have certain attachments upon their property, under proceedings in Greenville, vacated. The motion was supported by affidavits and was based upon the following grounds: 1st. Because the affidavit on which said attachment was issued was insufficient. 2d. Because the allegations of fraud, or that the defendants had disposed of, secreted or concealed, or were disposing of, secreting and concealing, their property with intent to defraud their creditors, contained in said affidavit, are not true. 3d. Because many other statements made in said affidavit are not true. 4th. Because said affidavit and attachment are in many other respects irregular and void.

This motion was granted, the Circuit judge holding that there was no fraud as charged in the affidavits upon which the attachments issued. From this order the plaintiffs appealed upon the following grounds:

1. Because the defendants had their option either to give the undertaking or to move to discharge the attachment, as in case of other provisional remedies, and having elected to adopt the first course, it is respectfully submitted that they waived their right to the second, and his Honor should have so held.

2. Because the attachment having been discharged upon undertaking could not be again discharged upon motion.

Messrs. Wells & Orr, for appellants.
Mr. M. F. Ansel, contra.

*August 9th, 1882. The opinion of the Court was delivered by

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. The plaintiffs, appellants, in an action for the recovery of $1942.53, alleged by plaintiffs to be due them from the defendants, attached certain property of the defendants, consisting of a stock of goods. The defendants applied under § 264 of the code for the surrender of the goods, which upon the execution of the bond required by § 265 of the code was ordered, and the property thereby discharged from the lien of the attachment. Two other attachments were afterwards issued, one of which was by the plaintiff.

Subsequently, the defendants moved to discharge all three of the attachments, upon affidavits served. The appellants resisted the discharge of the first, upon the ground that the defendants having adopted the proceeding provided in the code for the surrender of the property, and having thereby obtained possession, they had waived their right to assail the attachment on any ground, and therefore that their motion as to this attachment should be refused. The Circuit judge overruled this position and discharged all three of the attachments, including the first. The appeal questions the correctness of this ruling as to the first.

Attachments may be dissolved or defeated upon two grounds: 1st. Where some irregularity of a fatal character appears on the face of the proceedings; and 2d. Because of the fact that the allegations upon which it may issue are untrue. The dissolution in either case may be had upon motion—the first being made upon the papers, and the second upon affidavits as to matters dehors the record. These causes go to the root of the attachment, especially in the last class of cases, and when they exist the effect of their interposition is not simply to release the property but to entirely vacate and set aside the attachment proceedings.

Besides this remedy, in cases where the attachment has been irregularly issued, or issued without warrant of law, section 265 of the code supra provides for the release of the property attached, where the attachment has been legally issued and *there is no objection as to its regularity or want of observance of proper form, the effect of which provision, when adopted by the defendant, is to convert the action from one in rem to one in personam, with security by the defendant for the payment of the debt. This is done by permitting the defendant to give bond for the payment of the debt in the event that the plaintiff's action succeeds, the purpose of an attachment being to obtain security for the debt by securing a lien on property. The bond provided for is substituted in the place of this lien, and the property is released.

This proceeding is proper where there is no ground to attack the attachment for either of the causes mentioned first above. Where either of the causes exists, parties would ordinarily be presumed to know it, and no doubt would promptly avail themselves of the opportunity offered to assail the attachment, and in such case there would be no necessity to give the undertaking provided for in the Code. The property attached could be released without this additional liability. There can be no doubt but that the relief provided for in section 265 of the Code was intended primarily to meet the cases where the attachments were regular and valid, and yet where it would be a hardship to the debtor to be deprived of the use of his property during the pendency of the action. This remedy respects the rights and interests of both creditor and debtor, and while it releases the property to the use of the debtor, it gives the creditor a security in the undertaking which it requires equally as reliable as the lien which it displaces.

Now the question arises whether when the debtor avails himself of the latter remedy in the first instance, he can afterwards retrace his steps, and invoke the first; whether after having admitted the legality of the attachment proceeding by applying simply for the release of his property by giving the creditor another security, he can still assail the attachment, because it was irregularly or imprudently issued, and if successful vacate and set aside not only the attachment proceedings, but also the security undertaking which he has previously given.

This question has never been raised before in this State under our attachment laws; nor has there been uniformity of *decision upon it in other States where attachment proceedings are provided for. Mr. Drake in his work on attachments, § 318, says that in Mississippi the court seemed to consider that the execution of the bond released any technical objections to the preliminary proceedings, Wharton v. Conger, 9 Smedes & M. 510; while in the Supreme Court of the United States and that of Missouri it was held that thereafter the defendant could not take any exception to the attachment, or to the regularity of the proceedings under it. Barry v. Foyles, 1 Peters, 311 [7 L. Ed. 157]; Payne v. Snell, 3 Mo. 409. In Louisiana a different rule prevails. 14 La. 82; 1 La. Ann. 372. In Arkansas it was held that the execution of the bond did not preclude the defendant from interposing pleas in abatement, founded on irregularities in the proceeding, Childress v. Fowler, 9 Ark. 159. In Kentucky, in Hazelrigg v.

Donaldson, 2 Metc. 445, the court decided that the execution of a bond under the Code discharged the attachment by operation of law, and rendered the obligors in the bond unconditionally bound to perform the judgment of the court in the action, and that the sufficiency of the grounds for obtaining the attachment could not therefore be inquired into. And in 3 Mich. 18 it was held that the defendant in an attachment, having executed a bond to the sheriff and procured a release of the property under the Revised Statutes, is thereby estopped from applying for a dissolution of the attachment.

The authorities elsewhere, it will be observed, are conflicting, with strong reasons on either side. This being the first case in this state, we must mark out a course for ourselves. When we consider the purpose and intent of the proceeding under section 265 of the Code, we can see no good reason why the adoption of that proceeding should forfeit the right on the part of the defendant to impeach the legality of the attachments afterwards. It is true that that provision is founded on the idea that the attachment was properly issued and has secured a valid lien on the property attached, and the plaintiff is not required to release the lien except upon the condition that he is furnished with another security—and this is furnished by the undertaking which that section requires, the *consideration of this undertaking being the release of the lien already secured.

But suppose the attachment in truth and fact had been irregularly or improvidently issued, so much so as to render it invalid, had a motion been made in the first instance to vacate it, should the fact that the defendant had released the property by his bond to the sheriff cure these defects, and render that legal which under the supposition made is utterly illegal? Such should not be the result, unless for some controlling reason. The proceeding under this section is a prompt proceeding by which the defendant may at once release his property. It may be in many cases of the utmost importance to the defendant that the release should be had at once, where delay would be ruinous. Hence he is allowed to obtain the release from the sheriff, an officer near at hand, and before whom prompt action can be taken, whereas his motion to vacate must be made before a judge, sometimes at an inconvenient distance and with delay. Under such circumstances why should the defendant be expected to avail himself of this prompt relief, at the peril of legalizing the attachment?

The attaching creditor, when he has secured a legal lien, of course ought not to be required to give it up, except upon an equivalent, but at the same time, if the lien is invalid because the attachment is illegal, why should he be entitled to hold the substituted security, which he has obtained upon a condition which in fact never existed? There can be no reason except that inasmuch as the remedy under section 265 is based upon the presumption that there is no valid objection to the attachment, a defendant resorting to it is supposed to have assented to its correctness. Admitting this to be true, does it follow that a defendant should also be regarded as having thereby waived all right to impeach the attachment afterwards?

There are cases where a failure to take advantage of alleged defects or to assert rights will entail forfeiture, but this is on the principle that some right has attached to the other party in consequence of such failure which it would be inequitable now to divest, or some remedy omitted, or injury would ensue which but for the failure might have been provided against. *In such case the doctrine of estoppel should apply. But the case before the court is not a case of that character. The bond which the plaintiffs hold as security for their debt, stands in the place of the property which that bond released. Had no bond been given, if the attachment was improvidently issued, the lien which it had obtained was an invalid lien and could have been vacated at any time, in some of our sister States, even after judgment. This being so, there can be no good reason why the bond, which occupies the place of the property, should not also be released, when surrounded by the same circumstances which if present would release the property. In New York it was held that the giving up of an undertaking to obtain the return of the property attached will not preclude the defendant from moving to set aside the attachment for irregularity or on the merits. 2 Wait Prac. 184.

Our Code after providing for the surrender of the attached property as found in sections 264 and 265 concludes the latter section as follows: "In all cases the defendant may move to discharge the attachment as in the case of other provisional remedies." This language is broad and comprehensive; it includes expressly all cases. It is found as a part of one of the acts of the Legislature, and embracing, as it does, all cases of attachment, we have no power to limit or contract it to one or two classes of cases only.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

Before Kershaw, J., Newberry, November, 1880.

The opinion states the case.

Messrs. J. Y. Culbreath, G. S. Mower, for appellant.

Messrs. Suber & Caldwell, contra.

October 2, 1882. The opinion of the Court was delivered by Mr. Justice McGOWAN. This was an action for dower in a lot in the Town of Newberry. Joseph S. McMorris, the late husband of the plaintiff, being at the time seized and possessed of the lot in question, conveyed the same by deed November 2, 1852, to Edward S. Bailey for the sum of $1800, its true value, and his wife Angelina on the same day renounced in due form her right of dower in the said lot, on her husband's deed of conveyance. Bailey conveyed the land to Segwick, July 2, 1862, for $3,500, who conveyed it to William H. Webb, and he conveyed the same to himself as trustee for his wife Cordelia Webb, and his and her children. These conveyances were all regularly recorded. McMorris removed from this State prior to 1868, when the present Constitution was adopted, and died out of the State July 5, 1879.

His widow instituted this action for dower in 1880. The defence was the renunciation made and recorded as long ago as 1852. That was admitted by the plaintiff, but she insisted that at the time she signed the renunciation she was an infant under twenty-one years of age, and not bound by it.

The case was referred to the master, who admitted, contrary to the protest of the defendant, testimony as to the infancy of plaintiff when she signed the renunciation, and reported in favor of the plaintiff's claim of dower. Upon exceptions the Circuit Judge overruled them, and gave judgment in favor of *the plaintiff for three hundred dollars as dower with interest from July 5, 1879, and decreed the judgment to have a specific lien upon the lot.

The defendant appeals to this Court upon the following exceptions:

1. "Because his Honor erred in deciding that the renunciation of dower in the lot conveyed to Edward S. Baily, November 2, 1852, was not a good and valid renunciation.

2. "Because his Honor erred in holding that if the plaintiff at the time of her renunciation had attained the age required by the law of the State to enable her to renounce, it was voidable, as she was within the age of twenty-one years; whereas it is submitted that he should have decreed that, as plaintiff had attained the lawful age to contract marriage, her said renunciation at the age of twenty years was as good and valid as if she had been at the time of the full age of twenty-one years!

3. "Because if said renunciation was voidable, the long silence of the plaintiff for twenty-eight years is tantamount to its confirmation after she attained the age of majority. And as the defendant is a subsequent purchaser without notice, his defence should be sustained against the claim of plaintiff, who permitted the renunciation, regular in form, to be spread upon the public records for twenty-eight years.

4. "Because the master erred in permitting the plaintiff to introduce evidence to prove that plaintiff was an infant under twenty-one years at the time she signed the renunciation of her right of dower."

As to the last exception, we cannot say that the master erred in receiving proof as to the age of the plaintiff at the time she signed the renunciation. It is true that the certificate being in regular form and before the proper officer, it is presumed that all things were regular in reference to its execution, but we do not see that such presumption necessarily excluded proof dehors the record, such as imposition, fraud, incompetency or infancy. As the certificate of the officer made no reference to the age of the wife, there was probably a presumption that she was "of lawful age," as required by the statute, but that presumption could be overcome by evidence. *Battin v. Bigelow, Peters C. C. 452 [Fed. Cas. No. 1,108]; 2 Scrib. Dower, 284, and note.

Dower is a common law right, and as such favored. It is true that it springs out of the relation of marriage, and at first view it would seem reasonable that the age which authorizes legal marriage should be sufficient also to enable the woman married to dispose of all property and exercise all rights acquired by the marriage. But it must be remembered that by the act of marriage itself, without reference to the age of the parties, the wife falls or at least before 1868 fell, under disabilities which prevented her from exercising any right as to her property, except the power to do so was expressly given to her. The power to renounce the right of dower acquired by the marriage was no exception to the general rule. It was and is entirely a creature of statute, and therefore the first question is whether the renunciation of the right of dower by Mrs. McMorris, a married woman under the age of twenty-one years, was authorized by the law in force at the time it was executed.

We are not aware that this question was ever before made in this State. The court has not been referred to any decided case upon the subject. In some of the States, notably Alabama, Indiana and Maine, express provision has been made to the effect "that all married women, whether under or over the age of twenty-one years, are permitted to release their dower." See 2 Scrib. Dower, 284 and authorities. But no such provision has been made in this State. Our statute upon the subject is as follows: "The wife of any grantor conveying real estate by deed of release, may, if she be of lawful age, release, renounce and bar herself of her dower in all the premises so conveyed," etc.

It is not denied that Mrs. McMorris signed a renunciation in due form, but it is insisted that it does not bar her for the reason that at the time she signed it she was under twenty-one years of age. The act permitted her to renounce only on condition that she was "of lawful age." Did these words of the statute mean "of lawful age" to marry, or to convey rights in land or make any other civil contract? In the absence of any *authority to the contrary, we feel constrained to hold that the words in this statute were used in their ordinary sense, that is to say, as meaning the age at which parties generally are allowed by the law to contract, and that the renunciation of Mrs. McMorris, made by her when under twenty-one years of age, was not a compliance with the law, or in itself a bar to her recovery.

The rule, as we understand, is the same as to other acts of the infant wife, even where there is no express requirement that she should be "of lawful age." It was long a doubtful question in the English courts whether an infant female was bound by a marriage settlement which disposed of her real estate. It was insisted that as a female infant could marry, and into the consideration of marriage her real estate largely entered, the settlement of it, like the marriage, should be binding and indissoluble: but it has been finally held there that such settlement constitutes no exception to the policy of the common law, which, as a rule, avoids the contracts of infants. See Milner v. Lord Harewood, 18 Ves. 259; [Lester v. Fraser] 2 Hill, Eq. 529; 2 Kent. Com. 244.

But it is urged that an infant upon attaining majority may confirm any act done during infancy—that one of the forms of confirmation is “acquiescence from which assent may be fairly inferred;” that the plaintiff acquiesced in her renunciation for twenty-eight years from its date, and from this we may fairly infer her assent. This view would be very strong if the plaintiff during all that time had been sui juris and entitled to recover her dower, but she was a married woman and had no right to disaffirm the renunciation by claiming dower until 1880, when her husband died. While her husband lived her right had not matured. We cannot say that her silence during his life was voluntary. So long as she was unable to assert her right, no force should be attached to her seeming acquiescence.

It is further said that the plaintiff by her conduct should be estopped from now claiming her dower in this lot; that she placed upon the record the said renunciation in due form without stating her age, which she was required to do, not only by the terms of the statute, but by every consideration of good faith *and honesty, and that this conduct had an effect in inducing the defendant to purchase the lot. “Parties under disability as infants and married women certainly are not estopped unless their conduct has been intentional and fraudulent.” Big. Est. 442.

Mrs. McMorris signed the renunciation of dower on the deed of her husband, but it does not appear that she made any misrepresentations as to her age or in any way procured the sale to Bailey; she was simply silent. Nor does it appear that she had it recorded, which was probably done by the alienee. She was not only an infant at the time it was signed, but under the disabilities of coverture down to 1879. The mere silence of a married woman who knows that the husband is selling her land will not estop her from claiming the land after his death. Herm. Est. 380 and authorities. Where the husband made deed, with warranty of wife's interest therein, and she joined by clause relinquishing right of dower but not by words of grant, held that neither she nor her heirs were estopped from claiming the land even after the lapse of twenty-nine years. Ibid. 238, citing 2 Cush. 234.

This is certainly a hard case upon the purchaser, who relying upon the renunciation, perfect in form as it appeared spread upon the records, had no notice of the latent fact that Mrs. McMorris was an infant when she signed it, but we see no good defence against the claim. The plea of purchaser for valuable consideration without notice is equitable in its character, and has no proper application to a claim purely legal like that for dower. Story Eq. § 630.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

Application for mandamus in behalf of A. W. Cummings against A. H. Kirby and others, County Commissioners of Spartanburg. The opinion states the case.

Messrs. Shand &amp; Bryce, for relator.

Messrs. Bobo &amp; Carlisle, contra.

October 2, 1882. The opinion of the Court was delivered by Mr. Justice McIVER. This was an application to this Court in the exercise of its original jurisdiction, for a mandamus to compel the respondents, as County Commissioners of the County of Spartanburg, to draw their warrant on the County Treasurer in favor of the relator, for the payment of certain claims held by him against the said county, as a part of its past indebtedness.

It is not denied that, in 1872, these claims were audited and allowed by the then Board of County Commissioners of said county and have not yet been paid; nor is it denied that the Board have been authorized from year to year, since 1874, by the Legislature to levy a tax to pay the past indebtedness of the county; nor that such tax has been regularly levied and collected; nor that there are now funds in the hands of the County Treasurer applicable to the past indebtedness. The respondents, in their return, however, allege that in 1875, a succeeding Board of County Commissioners re-examined the claims held by the relator, and that they were then "found to be improper and illegal charges against the county," and proceed to specify in what particulars the said claims are illegal and improper, wherefore they have ever since refused to pay the same.

The first question, therefore, which is presented is whether a succeeding Board of County Commissioners has any authority to review and revise the action of its predecessor.

sor in audit*ing and allowing a claim against the county. No such authority is conferred by any statute, nor is such a power necessarily incident to any of the powers conferred upon the Board. We are unable therefore to discover any warrant for the exercise of such a power. It would be in conflict with all the analogies of the law to hold that one Board had an appellate power to review and reverse the action of its predecessor, and would lead to endless complication and confusion. If one Board could review and revise the action of its predecessor, there is no reason why its successor should not have the same power, and the result would be that there could be no such thing as a final determination.

It must be assumed that one set of County Commissioners is quite as likely to be competent to discharge the duties of the office as another, and quite as willing to perform those duties honestly, and there is no reason why one set of County Commissioners should assume any superiority over another. When, therefore, a claim against a county has been audited and allowed by the Board of County Commissioners, acting within the limits of their jurisdiction, their action is final unless appealed from, and stands as a quasi judgment, which can only be set aside by a proper proceeding for that purpose, upon the ground of fraud or mistake. County of Richland v. Miller, Clerk of Commissioners, 16 S. C. 236. It seems to us, therefore, that the action of the Board of County Commissioners, in 1875, in undertaking to review and reverse the action of their predecessors was wholly without authority and entirely nugatory. This being so, the relator must be regarded as the holder of claims against the County of Spartanburg, which have been duly audited and allowed by the proper authority, constituting a part of the past indebtedness of said County. Unless, therefore, there is some other obstacle in his way, he would be entitled to a mandamus to compel the Board of County Commissioners to draw their warrant on the County Treasurer for the payment of the same, provided there are funds in the hands of that officer applicable to such claims.

It is contended, however, that the relator, if he ever had a right to the mandamus prayed for, has lost it by his laches in *not prosecuting his claim before, and that it is barred by the Statute of Limitations. There is no special limitation to a proceeding by mandamus, and the Statute of Limitations does not apply to such a proceeding. The rule, however, is, that where there is unreasonable delay the Court will, in the exercise of its discretion, refuse to issue the writ. Moses Mand. 190; 1 Redf. Railw. 658 and the cases there cited. See also King v. Stainforth, 1 M. & S. 32; People ex rel. Phelps v. Delaware Common Pleas, 2 Wend. 259; People v. Seneca Common Pleas, 2 Wend. 264, and the authorities collected in a note to 2 Johns Cas. 217. In this case the relator has delayed his application for about ten years since his claims were allowed, and for about seven years since they were refused payment; and in his petition he suggests no reason for such delay. It seems that since 1874 the Legislature has from year to year authorized the levy of a tax to pay the past indebtedness of the county, and it is difficult to conceive of any good reason which would account for this extraordinary delay on the part of the relator in making this application. It is a mistake to suppose, as was argued, that there was a continuing admission of the validity of these claims of the relator, on the part of the County Commissioners, by placing them on the list of the past indebtedness of the county, for that allegation in the petition is distinctly denied in the return, which is not traversed. So too the return alleges that these claims were decided by the Board of County Commissioners to be illegal, as far back as 1875, and since that time payment of the same has been frequently refused. We are unable to discover any sufficient reason, or, indeed, any reason at all, for this extraordinary laches on the part of the relator, and therefore, in the exercise of that discretion to which such an application appeals, we feel bound to refuse the writ prayed for, especially as the return, which is not traversed and which must, therefore, be taken to be true, points out manifest errors in the accounts upon which these claims are founded.

The judgment of this Court is that the application for the writ of mandamus be refused.

Mr. Justice McGOWAN absent at the hearing.

(April Term, 1882.)

Testator by his will gave to trustees real and personal property "in trust for the sole and separate use and benefit of my daughter N. and the lawful issue of her body * * * to be and remain in the uninterrupted possession of my daughter N., and should my daughter die leaving no lawful issue of her body, it is my will and desire that the aforesaid property, both real and personal, revert back to my estate." By a second clause, testator gave certain other real and personal property to his wife for life, "and at her death to be sold, and the money arising therefrom be equally divided among all my children, share and share alike, the grandchildren to represent the interest of their deceased parent, and that portion which may be coming to such child, whose interest is secured in trust, I hereby direct my executors to pay over the same to their trustee." The property given to the widow was sold after her death, and N's share was received by her trustee, including two notes on one G. This was prior to 1868. Afterwards N's husband purchased a house and lot from G., and paid for it by a credit on one of these notes, and he then gave this house and lot to his daughter E., and then N. died intestate.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. § 1642; Dec. Dig. ⇨687.]

Before Hudson, J., Laurens, February, 1881.

In this case the Honorable T. B. FRASER, Circuit Judge, sat in the place of the CHIEF JUSTICE, who had been of counsel in the cause.

Action by Margaret H. Dunlap, S. E. Dunlap and Hattie Teague against H. W. Garlington, as trustee of Nancy Miller, Eloise W. Shell, Chancy M. Miller and W. D. Black. The opinion states the facts of the case. The Circuit decree, after a statement of those same facts, was as follows:

therefore, trust property, and is now divisible alone among the heirs of the body of Nancy. 2d. The money in the hands of the Clerk arising from the sale of the property of John Garlington, applicable to the two notes aforesaid, which John Garlington gave to Henry W. Garlington, as trustee, for his part of the purchase of the property devised and bequeathed to the testator's widow, Margaret, and which, by direction of the will, was sold after the widow's death. This money, as well as these two notes, are claimed by the heirs of the body of Nancy Miller. 3d. Whatever of the trust estate that may yet remain in the hands of H. W. Garlington, is likewise so claimed.

All this C. M. Miller denies, and claims that all that came as personality under the will to his wife, Nancy, was hers absolutely, and that he is entitled absolutely to all of the same which, in her lifetime, he reduced into possession, and that which he did not reduce to possession constitutes her intestate estate, of which he is entitled to one third, and the children the balance.

The whole controversy is to be determined by a construction of the two clauses of the will given in the complaint and quoted above. Under the devise and bequest to Nancy Dunlap (Miller), it is clear to my mind that she took a fee conditional in the realty and an absolute estate in the personality. In a deed or will that language which will create a fee conditional in realty will create an absolute estate in personality, for the simple reason that perpetuity will never be tolerated in perishable (personal) property. Nor does the fact that the conveyance is to a trustee alter the case, unless there be some special duty in and about the personal property enjoined upon the trustee in its management and final disposition, which renders it necessary that the estate and title should abide in him. In this case there is nothing of the sort, but, on the contrary, it is expressly provided by the testator that both the real and personal estate shall be uninterruptedly possessed, used, enjoyed by his daughter. I think it clear that she took the personality absolutely and free from the trust and from the attempted limitation to the heirs of her body. Henry v. Felder, 2 McC. Eq. 325; Addison v. Addison, 9 Rich. Eq. 58.

*Of the property given to Nancy, as I understand from the pleadings and from counsel, there is none in controversy, but the contest is over what fell to her share of the remainder of the gift to her mother, which at her death was, by direction of the will, sold and converted into money. Her share of this was likewise directed to be paid to her trustee. The plaintiffs contend that when paid to the trustee it was to be held by him under the same trusts and limitations as were imposed upon the devise and bequest to Nancy in the previous clause. The testator is silent on this point. He simply directs it paid to her trustee. But grant that the intention was as the plaintiffs contend, and what is the effect? Realty directed to be sold and converted into money becomes personalty, and is to be so treated. Clearly, then, all her share of the proceeds of the remainder of her mother's life estate must be classed as personalty in the hands of the trustee, and as such it vested in Nancy absolutely, as did the personalty given immediately to her.

The two notes in controversy, therefore, became absolutely the property of Nancy Miller. If before the adoption of the Constitution of 1868, C. M. Miller, her husband, had reduced these notes into his possession, they would have been absolutely his; but this I do not think he did. From the evidence, however, I am satisfied that from 1850, when he married Nancy, until her death in 1872, he was allowed by her to manage and use her personal property, and enjoy the income as he pleased; and that when he bought the town lot and took titles to himself, he did not act as trustee nor as agent of his wife, but for himself, and that he paid for the place by the credit on the notes with her full knowledge and consent, using the money as his own. Reeder & Davis v. Flinn, 6 S. C. 216 and authorities there cited, furnish sufficient to sustain this view of the law in connection with the facts of this case. The plaintiffs are, therefore, entitled to no share nor interest in this property. The balance of the two notes and what money may be in the hands of the trustee, H. W. Garlington, I hold to be the intestate estate of Nancy Miller, and distributable amongst her children and husband—

i. e., her heirs at law and distributees according to the statute—and not amongst the heirs of her body only; and it is so ordered, adjudged and decreed; and that the complaint in so far as it seeks to sell or partition the town lot sold by C. M. Miller to Eloise Shell be dismissed.

The plaintiffs brought the case to this Court upon the following exceptions;

1. That his Honor erred, it is respectfully submitted, in deciding that the property involved in this suit should be distributed among the heirs at law of Nancy Miller, and not the heirs of her body.

2. His Honor erred, it is respectfully submitted, in holding that C. M. Miller purchased and held the house and lot as his property by the consent and approbation of Mrs. Miller, when it was in testimony that he was at that time de facto trustee for her and used her trust funds in the purchase, and some of the principal at that; and to allow him to hold the property is a fraud on the rights of the heirs of her body.

3. His Honor erred further, in holding that Nancy Miller took an absolute estate in the personal property willed by her father.

Messrs. Pope & Watts, for appellants.

Messrs. J. W. Ferguson, Holmes & Simpson, contra.

October 4, 1882. The opinion of the Court was delivered by

Mr. Justice FRASER. William Dunlap departed this life in 1839, leaving in force a will which was duly admitted to probate. He left surviving him his widow, a daughter Nancy, and other children. Nancy intermarried with Ewell Black, and of this marriage were born several children, the plaintiffs, and the defendant W. D. Black. After the death of Ewell Black, Nancy intermarried with the defendant Chancy M. Miller, and to them was born one child, the defendant Eloise W. Shell. Nancy died in 1872, all her children above named and her husband, Chancy M. Miller, surviving her.

*The will of William Dunlap contains two clauses under which the controversy in this case arises. In one clause he gives to certain trustees real and personal property "in trust for the sole and separate use and benefit of my daughter Nancy and the lawful issue of her body;" and after describing the property adds: "It is my will and desire and all the aforesaid property be and remain in the uninterrupted possession of my daughter Nancy; and should my daughter die leaving no lawful issue of her body, it is my will and desire that the aforesaid property, both real and personal, revert back to my estate."

In another clause he gives certain real and personal property to his wife for life, and at her death as follows: "It is my will and pleasure that all of the property herein bequeathed to my wife be and remain in her possession during her natural life, and at her death to be sold and the money arising therefrom be equally divided among all my children, share and share alike, the grandchildren to represent the interest of their deceased parent, and that portion which may be coming to such child, whose interest is secured in trust, I hereby direct my Executors to pay over the same to their trustees."

John Garlington alone qualified as executor of the will, and H. W. Garlington alone of the persons named assumed the trust in favor of Nancy. The property, which passed to the widow of William Dunlap under the second of the above clauses, was sold at her death by the executor, and H. W. Garlington, as trustee for Nancy, received her share, and as a part thereof two sealed notes executed to him by John Garlington, one of May 31, 1862, for $3372.56, and one of March 4, 1863, for $5147.41, which were secured by a mortgage of real estate. After the death of John Garlington, the executor, his executors sold a part of his estate, and Chancy M. Miller, the defendant, purchased a lot of land known as the "Shockley house and lot," and paid for it by putting a credit on the note for $5147.41. This transaction was in January, 1870, and the amount of the credit given was $2020, being $82.91 in excess of the interest then due thereon. The balance of said two notes was established in a proceeding to settle the estate of John Garlington. The credit of $2020 on said note was signed by C. M. Miller, and the title to the Shockley place was made to him. This lot of land he subsequently conveyed to the defendant Eloise W. Shell, his daughter.

This Court concurs with the master and the Circuit Judge in the findings of fact. Chancy M. Miller at no time was trustee or assumed to act as trustee in reference to this property, and his dealings in regard to it must be construed with reference to his marital rights.

The appellants claim that this Shockley place and the balance of the two notes are distributable amongst the issue of Nancy. The Circuit Judge holds that plaintiffs, appellants, are entitled to no interest in the Shockley place, and "that the balance of the two notes is distributable amongst her children and her husband—i. e., her heirs at law and distributees, according to the Statute—and not amongst the heirs of her body." If the property in dispute is controlled by the terms of the first of the above recited clauses of the will, and if it should be held that the same was in trust for Nancy during her life, with valid remainders over, then it is clear that so much of the $2020 paid for the Shockley place as was interest on the note on which that amount was credited was received by the husband with the knowledge and consent of the wife, and became absolutely his property. Hill Trust, 425; Charles v. Coker, 2 S. C. 136; Reeder & Davis v. Flinn, 6 S. C. 216.

All this property, however, must be regarded as personalty, the real estate having been sold under the directions of the will.

The words create an executed trust, and Nancy would have taken in real estate a fee conditional, and "words which convey only a life estate or a conditional fee in land gives an absolute estate in personal property." Carr v. Porter, 1 McC. Ch. 60; Bedon v. Bedon, 2 Bail. 248; Daintry v. Daintry, 6 T. R. 307; Henry v. Felder, 2 McC. Ch. 339; Addison v. Addison, 9 Rich. Eq. 68.

The second of the above clauses, however, by which this property was conveyed, does not expressly refer to the first, and the *only circumstance which indicates that they are to be construed together, and the terms of the first to control the gifts under the second, is the direction in the second to pay over certain shares to trustees, who are named in the first clause. This of itself would not be sufficient to annex the terms of the gift under the first clause to the gift under the second, where the second is itself silent. It is by no means clear, however, that they would be consistent with each other even if the limitations claimed to have been created by the first are held to be valid. Under the first the limitations would have been to "issue of her body," a term of very much larger import, and including classes of persons not embraced by the word "grandchildren," to whom the property was given under the second clause in the event of Nancy's death before her mother.

The true construction of this second clause is that the gift is to Nancy absolutely, and if she should die before her mother, whose death is the period of distribution, then her children, the grandchildren of testator, are substituted in her place, and they take absolutely. Issue are not necessarily grandchildren.

The words used are not sufficient to create a life estate only in Nancy, or even an estate over which her husband could have no control. There should have been unequivocal evidence of "an intention to exclude the husband from all control. The mere gift to a trustee is not enough." Perry, Trusts, §§ 648, 649.

This Court therefore concurs with the Circuit Judge in the conclusion that the complaint be dismissed so far as it seeks a sale or partition of the town lot sold by C. M. Miller to Eloise W. Shell, and in the judgment of the Circuit Court as to the balance of the funds. If an administrator of Nancy Miller, deceased, should be a necessary party, the proper order can be made by the Circuit Court before the distribution of the fund.

It is therefore ordered and adjudged that the exceptions be overruled, the judgment of the Circuit Court affirmed, and the appeal dismissed.

*BOWEN v. ATLANTIC AND FRENCH BROAD VALLEY R. R. COMPANY.*MAJOR v. THE SAME.

(April Term, 1882.)

[1. New Trial ⇨40.]

Where incompetent testimony is received without objection at the trial, no ground is thereby afforded for a motion for a new trial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see New Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 62-66; Dec. Dig. ⇨40.]

[2. Eminent Domain ⇨219.]

On appeal to the Circuit Court from the assessment of damages for a right of way to a railroad company, an issue was framed and submitted to a jury in the Circuit Court in words "how much compensation is the appellant entitled to for the right of way through his lands." Held, that the submission was sufficiently specific to justify the jury, in accordance with the terms of the statute, in estimating not only the value of the land taken, but also such special damage as the construction of the road through his land would cause to the land-owner.

[3. Eminent Domain ⇨255.]

There would seem to be no error in permitting witnesses to give general estimates of the damages, but no objection to such testimony having been made at the trial, it cannot be raised here.

[4. Eminent Domain ⇨102.]

The Circuit Judge committed no error in charging the jury that in estimating the special damage done to the land-owner by the condemnation of a right of way through his lands, they might consider inconvenience of a permanent nature, the rattle of the train, blow of the whistle, smoke of the engine, etc.

Before Aldrich, J., Pickens, January, 1882.

Reese Bowen against the Atlantic and French Broad Valley Railroad Company and Elizabeth Major against the same. The opinion states the case, but the charge of the judge to the jury in the Circuit Court should be given in full. It was as follows:

"The law of this case, to which you are to apply the facts, is contained in the act regulating the construction of these great highways of travel and trade. The legislature recognizing the vast importance of developing the resources of the State, has conferred upon these railroad corporations great privileges. They are allowed to pass over the freehold of a citizen, raze his homestead to the ground, or dig up the soil which covers the bones of his ancestors, his wife and his children, the only compensation being the value of the land covered or subverted, and the actual damage which the proprietor may sustain. While this policy is rendered necessary for the convenience of the community and the development of the common interest of the whole people, we must not lose sight of the fact that it may, in individual cases, operate as a great hardship. Hence the legislature has wisely left it to the jury to say what is the actual damage each proprietor has sustained, by the condemnation of his land for the purposes of the highway. As I said yesterday in the trial of the Bowen case, before the jury, there is a difference of opinion between witnesses and counsel as to what is actual damages. On the one hand it is contended that actual damages is only that which can be measured by dollars and cents, the market value per acre of the land, while on the other hand it is insisted that a continuing inconvenience which puts the proprietor to hourly and daily annoyance is actual damage, which will be measured by the jury according to the circumstances attending each particular case. If the railroad runs through your house, where your ancestors lived and died, your children were born, and which is hallowed by all the associations that cluster around the hearthstone and linger under the roof-tree, is the actual damage only the property destroyed? And shall it be said if the railroad runs in front or rear of your home, disturbing your family night and day, with the scream of the whistle, the smoke of the engine, the rattle of the train, destroying the garden your wife and daughters have spent years in tending and beautifying, that the only damage then is the value of the land? I think not. You may as well say that a picture painted by Rubens, or a statue modelled by our own Powers, has no actual value, because the one is a mere square of canvas, in which is painted in beautiful colors, with artistic skill, a poetic idea; the other a mere block of marble out of which is chiselled an exquisite figure of the ideal man or woman.

And so when bottom land has been brought into cultivation, it is not the cost of the ditch obstructed, or the value of the soil that has been subverted, but the injury done to the whole tract by interrupting the drainage and interrupting the free passage over the field. So when a field is divided by an embankment or an excavation, you will not only consider the value of the land over or through which the road is constructed, but the actual loss to the proprietor, in perpetuity, in cultivating his crops, hauling in and out, the loss of time in shortening his rows, and like continuing inconveniences. If such a continuing inconvenience can be estimated in money, that is the actual damage the proprietor has sustained. In making that estimate you must exercise your judgment as reasonable, conscientious, honest men, considering the road as completed. You are not to consider or suppose a trestle instead of an embankment, but render your verdict for a completed road. Your inquiry is not what is the general benefit to the whole State and county, but what is the actual damage to the individual claimant?

So you will perceive that while these great enterprises are to be fostered and encouraged, because they develop the resources of the State and contribute largely to the prosperity, convenience and happiness of the people, yet they do sometimes injure individual interests and destroy the enjoyment of individual property. I know of cases on the Port Royal and Savannah and Charleston Railroads where the drainage of valuable plantations, effected by a large outlay of money, has been entirely destroyed by the construction of these roads. The road should not be stopped for this, but the individual owner should be compensated. To say the market value of the acres used by the road is the actual damage is merest mockery.

And so I charge you that a railroad which puts a proprietor to perpetual inconvenience in the management of his affairs, or continually disturbs the peace of his family, is actual damage, which can be measured by the circumstances attendant on each case, to be determined by the testimony of witnesses familiar with the facts and location. Speculative damages cannot be accorded. You are not to pay a claimant the value of his whole plantation because a railroad runs through it, but you are to allow him the value of the land occupied, and compensation for the actual inconvenience to which he is subjected. The law makes you judges of the facts, as reasonable men, always keeping in mind the public interest and the individual *right. You are not to favor the corporation because it is conferring a great public benefit, nor are you to enrich the proprietor from a mere sentiment, or because the corporation is able to pay, but you are to dispense abstract justice as between man and man."

Mr. R. A. Child, for appellant.

Messrs. Norton, Keith & Hollingsworth, contra.

October 6, 1882. The opinion of the Court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McIVER. These two cases involve the same questions, and will be considered together. They were proceedings originally instituted by the appellant here for the purpose of acquiring the right of way over the lands of the respondents, under the provisions of the Act of 1868, incorporated in Chap. LXIII. of the General Statutes, p. 352. The respondents here not being satisfied with the verdict of the jury organized by the Clerk of the Court, under section 76 of that chapter, appealed to the Circuit Court, when the following issue was made up and tried in that Court, to wit: "How much compensation is the appellant, Reese Bowen, entitled to for the right of way through his lands, which have been condemned and taken by the Atlantic and French Broad Valley Railroad Company?"

From the judgment rendered on the verdict found upon that issue, the Railroad company appealed to this Court upon the following grounds: "1. Because his Honor erred in allowing the actors to prove special damage when no such damage was contained in the issue submitted to the jury. 2. Because special damage cannot be proved without a special allegation in the pleadings of such damage, and his Honor erred in allowing such proof, when no allegations of special damage had been anywhere made in the pleadings. 3. Because his Honor erred in allowing witnesses to testify that if it was their land they would not have the railroad to pass over it for $——. 4. Because his Honor erred in allowing the witnesses to testify that the actors had been damaged $—— without requiring them to state *specially the damage. 5. Because his Honor erred in charging the jury that any inconvenience of a permanent nature, however small, was special damage, and might be considered by them in making up their verdict. 6. Because his Honor erred in charging the jury that the rattle of the train, the blow of the whistle, the smoke of the engine, etc., were special damage, and might be considered by them in making up their verdict. 7. Because that under the issue submitted, the jury could only consider the compensation to be paid the actors for the right of way, that is, the actual value of the land taken up by the railroad, and his Honor erred in charging them that they could bring in a verdict for special damages. 8. Because the damages given by the jury are excessive."

It does not appear that any objection was made to any of the testimony offered at the trial, and therefore such of the grounds of appeal, to wit, the first, second, third and fourth, as are based upon objections to the competency of testimony, cannot be sustained. The rule is well settled that where incompetent testimony is received, without objection, at the trial, it will afford no ground for a motion for a new trial. State v. Ran- kin, 3 S. C. 448 [16 Am. Rep. 737]; Burris v. Whitner, 3 S. C. 512; Powers v. McEachern, 7 S. C. 299. This rule is not only based upon direct authority, but has the support of reason also; for, as is well said, in Burris v. Whitner, supra, "It would be unfair to allow a party to postpone his objection as to competency until after the testimony has been given; for, in that case, he would be enabled to retain the evidence if it enured to his advantage, and to exclude it if it made against him. Such speculative advantages are discountenanced by the courts."

The Act of 1878, 16 Stat. 698, does not affect this rule; for that act simply allows exceptions to be taken "to the rulings of the presiding judge," at any time within ten days after the rising of the Court; but where incompetent testimony is received without objection, the Judge makes no ruling, and there is therefore no room for an exception. In Fripp v. Williams, Birnie & Co., 14 S. C. 508, the rule has been recognized and applied since the passage of the Act of 1878; and it has also been recognized in Thompson v.

Brannon, 14 S. C. 549. It is clear, therefore, that even if the testimony assailed in the first four grounds of appeal were incompetent, appellant has lost the opportunity of availing itself of the benefit of any of these grounds, by failing to object to the testimony when it was offered.

But, as will presently be seen, we do not regard the testimony as incompetent. The appellant contends that, under the issue submitted to the jury, they were restricted in their inquiries to the question as to what was the value of the land actually appropriated and used as a right of way, and that they could not give any damages beyond this, and hence that testimony tending to show any other damage was incompetent. The issue which the jury were called upon to determine was, how much compensation was the land-owner entitled to for the right of way taken by the railroad company, not merely for the land taken. Their inquiry, therefore, was, what would compensate the land-owner for the injury done to him by allowing the railroad company to take and use the right of way in question?

The mere naked value of the strip of land over which the road-bed was constructed would in most if not in all cases afford very inadequate compensation for the injury done; and hence to determine the amount of compensation it would be necessary to consider other elements than that of the naked value of the land. This was, manifestly, the idea of the legislature, for by the express terms of the act under which this proceeding was instituted, provision is made for estimating the amount of compensation not only by reference to the value of the land actually taken, but also by reference to the special damage which the land-owner may sustain by reason of the construction of the road through his lands. The Act, in effect, defines the term "compensation" to be the value of the land together with such special damage as may be sustained by the land-owner, by reason of the construction of the road through his lands.

In section 77, the jury are required to determine the question of compensation by inspecting the premises and taking testimony "in reference to the construction of the proposed *highway, and the quantity of land which shall be required therefor; and irrespective of any benefit which the owner may derive from the proposed highway, and with respect alone to the quantity and value of the land which may be required, and to the special damage which the owner may sustain by reason of the construction of the highway through his lands, they shall ascertain the amount of compensation which shall be made to the owner thereof." The only legitimate construction of this language is that the jury in ascertaining the amount of compensation must disregard any benefit that may accrue to the land-owner from the construction of the road, and base their estimate not only upon the value of the land taken, but upon that and such special damage as the owner may sustain by reason of the construction of the road through his land.

Hence when the issue submitted to them in this case required them to determine "how much compensation" the land-owner was entitled to for the right of way, they should, in accordance with the terms of the act, have looked not only to the value of the land taken, but also to such special damage as may have been done to the land-owner by reason of the construction of the road through his lands, and there was no necessity for the order to specifically direct them to estimate the special damage, inasmuch as the direction to determine the amount of compensation necessarily included an inquiry into the special damage. The testimony as to the special damage was, therefore, in our judgment entirely competent, and absolutely necessary to enable the jury to determine properly the issue submitted to them. The objection that the testimony as to special damage consisted of general estimates, without specifications as to the particular items of damage, not having been made at the trial cannot avail the appellant at this stage of the case. Besides, we do not think it can be said that the testimony upon the subject consisted only of general estimates, for most of the witnesses did go into details; and it was for the appellant, by his cross-examination, to test the correctness of such general estimates as were made. Indeed, we do not see how damages of this character could be ascertained in any other way than by the introduction of such testimony as was adduced in these cases; and this kind of testi*mony seems to have been received with approval in the cases of the G. & C. Railroad Company v. Partlow, 5 Rich. 428, and White v. Charlotte & So. Ca. Railroad Co., 6 Rich. 47. We do not understand that the Judge charged the jury exactly as is alleged in the fifth and sixth grounds of appeal. As we understand the charge, it was, in effect, that the jury were not to confine their inquiry simply to the value of the land taken, but that they might take into consideration the several matters alluded to in these grounds of appeal, and give, in addition to the value of the land, such special damage as in their judgment would compensate the land-owner for the injury done to him by the taking of the right of way; and in this we see no error.

The eighth ground of appeal cannot be sustained. Whether damages are excessive depends upon a consideration of the facts, and with these we have no power to interfere. This has been distinctly determined, and must be regarded as definitely settled. Brickman v. South Carolina Railroad Company, 8 S. C. 173; Steele v. C. C. & A. R. R. Co., 11 S. C. 589.

The judgment of this Court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court in both of the cases above stated be affirmed.

ISELL v. DUNLAP &amp; WARD.

(April Term, 1882.)

[1. Payment ⚡8.]

Defendants being sued by plaintiff for his wages as their overseer paid the amount of this indebtedness to the sheriff to be applied to a junior execution, which had lost its active energy. Held, that this gave defendants a valid defence to the action, as payment. Code, § 319.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Payment, Cent. Dig. ⚡26; Dec. Dig. ⚡8.]

[2. Agriculture ⚡11.]

An overseer is not an agricultural laborer within the meaning of the act giving laborers a lien on crops, or within the meaning of the Homestead acts.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Agriculture, Cent. Dig. ⚡22; Dec. Dig. ⚡11.]

[3. Payment ⚡38.]

The money having been paid by defendants to be applied to a certain execution, the plaintiff cannot object to the application to such execution, although it be junior and without active energy.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Gray, Sullivan & Gray v. Putnam, 51 S. C. 102, 28 S. E. 149.

For other cases, see Payment, Cent. Dig. §§ 99-103, 128; Dec. Dig. ⚡38.]

[4. Payment ⚡8.]

The payment to the sheriff was not a counter-claim, which therefore had to be in existence at the time of action brought, and of which plaintiff was entitled to notice, but was properly pleaded as payment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Payment, Cent. Dig. §§ 17, 18, 20, 21, 24-27; Dec. Dig. ⚡8.]

Before Wallace, J., Kershaw, February, 1882.

*The opinion fully states the case.

Mr. W. M. Shannon, for appellant.
Messrs. Leitner & Dunlap, contra.

Mr. Justice McIVER. The action in this case was commenced on January 19, 1882, to recover a balance due plaintiff for his wages as overseer for the defendants during the year 1881.

The defence was payment, and to establish it the defendants offered in evidence a judgment and execution in the case of Cowles v. Isbell, dated February 7, 1876, and the sheriff's receipt on the execution in his office in favor of Cowles, which was in the following words: "Received February 10, 1882, from Dunlap & Ward two hundred and twenty dollars, to be applied to above-named judgment and execution against J. D. Isbell, said Dunlap & Ward being debtors of said J. D. Isbell, and paying said amount on said judgment and execution." The plaintiff then offered in evidence a judgment and execution in favor of Koopman & Summer, dated January 15, 1869, against Isbell, we presume, though it is not so stated in the "Case."

The case was, by consent, heard by the Circuit Judge without a jury, and he, after hearing argument, held: 1. That an overseer could not claim a lien on the crop for his wages, under the terms of the act giving laborers a lien. 2. That his wages were not exempt from levy under an execution. 3. That the sheriff had a right to receive and apply money, as was done in this case, to a junior execution in his office after its active energy had expired. 4. That the sheriff's receipt held by the defendants was not in the nature of a counter-claim, and did not require notice before the same could be offered in evidence; and that it was not necessary that the receipt should have been in existence at the time of the commencement of the action, as in case of a counter-claim. 5. That the claim of the plaintiff was completely paid and satisfied by the sheriff's receipt on the execution. The plaintiff appeals upon grounds which question each one of the above-mentioned rulings.

We agree with the Circuit Judge that an overseer cannot be regarded as an agricultural laborer, within the meaning of the act giving to such laborers a lien on the crops made by them, or within the meaning of the Homestead acts exempting the products of such persons from levy and sale. An overseer is one who is employed, not to labor himself, but to overlook and direct the labor of those who are employed to do the manual work of planting, cultivating and gathering a crop, and it would be a confusion of terms to call such a person a laborer. Whether the relation of master and servant exists between an employer and his overseer is a totally different question, and need not be considered here; and hence we are unable to perceive the relevancy of the case of Daniel v. Swearengen, 6 S. C. 297 [24 Am. Rep. 471], relied on by the appellant.

But even if it should be conceded that an overseer has a lien on the crop for his wages, and that his wages are exempt from levy under an execution, we do not see how such a concession could benefit the appellant. The amount due to the plaintiff by the defendants has not been levied on by the sheriff under an execution in his office, but the sheriff has simply, as the agent of the plaintiff, received and receipted for the money due to the plaintiff by the defendants, under the authority of section 319 of the Code. That section reads as follows: "After the issuing of execution against property any person indebted to the judgment debtor may pay to the sheriff the amount of his debt, or so much thereof as shall be necessary to satisfy the execution, and the sheriff's receipt shall be a sufficient discharge for the amount so paid." Hence it was wholly immaterial whether the execution upon which the money was paid had lost its active energy, or whether it was the junior or senior execution in the office, for the sheriff did not obtain the money by virtue of his power to levy, but he simply received it when offered voluntarily by a person indebted to the judgment debtor, and his receipt is declared by the act to be "a sufficient discharge for the amount so paid."

shall be paid upon the oldest execution in the office; and whether it was the duty of the sheriff to make the application to the oldest execution, as he would be required to do when he levied and sold under a junior execution, or whether the payment made by the person indebted to the judgment debtor is to be regarded as a voluntary payment made by the judgment debtor himself, in which case he could require the sheriff to apply the money to any execution he might select, even though it should be junior to all others, is a question which does not concern the present plaintiff, and is not presented by the record. We therefore concur with the Circuit Judge that the fact that the payment was made on a junior execution which had lost its active energy cannot affect the present inquiry.

The only remaining question is whether the payment to the sheriff should have been regarded as a counter-claim, of which notice should have been given by the pleadings, and which should have been in existence at the time of the commencement of the action, in order to render it available as a defence. We are unable to discover any element of counter-claim in the transaction.

We understand section 319 of the Code to declare, in effect, that the payment to the sheriff, by one indebted to a judgment debtor, on the execution against such judgment debtor, is the same thing as the payment to the judgment debtor himself—that the receipt of the sheriff is in fact the receipt of the judgment debtor. If so, then, clearly, the defence in this case was properly pleaded as payment and not as a counter-claim, and it cannot be subjected to any of the incidents of the latter.

The judgment of this Court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

NOTES OF CAUSES

Decided during the Period Comprised in this Volume, and not Reported in full.

17 S. C. *585

*No. 1177. MASON v. WINSMITH, November Term, 1881.

[1. Costs ⇨71.]

The judgment in Mason v. Winsmith, 10 S. C. 314, was conclusive of the case, and entitled defendant to the costs of appeal and also to costs in the Circuit Court, and such right to the Circuit Court costs was not waived by defendant in redocketing the case on calendar 1, nor by taxing up at first only the costs of the appeal and receiving payment of them.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Costs, Cent. Dig. § 298; Dec. Dig. ⇨71.]

[2. Dismissal and Nonsuit ⇨37.]

The Circuit Judge cannot permit a plaintiff to discontinue his action after issue joined, except upon payment of costs; and in this case the defendant was entitled to his costs without any order of discontinuance.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Dismissal and Nonsuit, Cent. Dig. § 72; Dec. Dig. ⇨37.]

Opinion by MCGOWAN, A. J., March 18th, 1882. J. Winsmith, for appellant; J. S. R. Thomson, contra.

No. 1178. BUTTZ v. COUNTY OF CHARLESTON, November Term, 1881.

[1. Coroners ⇨4.]

The appointment of deputy coroners and deputy coroners' constables for Charleston County under the Act of 1879 (17 Stat. 50) should be made in writing; or, at least, the evidence of such appointment should be in writing and furnished to these officers.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Coroners, Cent. Dig. § 3; Dec. Dig. ⇨4.]

[2. Assignments ⇨100.]

The assignee of the accounts of these officers for the salaries fixed by the act, where the assignment was made before audit by the Board of County Commissioners, took the claims subject to all the legal defences that might have been set up against the original holder; as, e. g., that the officers had not been in office for the time charged, or had not properly performed their duties.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Assignments, Cent. Dig. § 177; Dec. Dig. ⇨100.]

[3. Assignments ⇨15.]

*The salary stopped when the officer resigned, and his assignee could acquire no right to a salary for a longer term, notwithstanding notice of the resignation was not filed in the proper office until a later date.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Assignments, Cent. Dig. § 23; Dec. Dig. ⇨15.]

Opinion by SIMPSON, C. J., March 20th, 1882. S. J. Lee, for appellant; J. E. Burke, contra.

No. 1179. LAWRENCE v. WOFFORD, November Term, 1881.

On appeal from an order discharging a rule on the sheriff to show cause, etc., the following points were decided by this court:

[1. Execution ⇨326.]

The sheriff's endorsements showing that two executions in his office of different dates were levied the same day upon personal property of the judgment debtor, the proceeds of the sale were applicable pro rata to the two executions.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Execution, Cent. Dig. § 969½; Dec. Dig. ⇨326.]

[2. Execution ⇨348.]

A levy is prima facie evidence of satisfaction, but this presumption may be rebutted; and therefore, where it appears that the property formerly levied upon is the identical property here levied upon and sold, the presumption of satisfaction arising from the former levy is rebutted.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in National Bank of Newberry v. Kinard, 28 S. C. 109, 5 S. E. 464.

For other cases, see Execution, Cent. Dig. § 1088; Dec. Dig. ⇨348.]

[3. Execution ⇨140.]

The presiding judge, who was himself to pass judgment upon the facts, committed no error in declining to receive the testimony of the deputy sheriff, who was produced by relator to prove that he (the deputy) had no recollection of making the levy under the other execution, as stated in the sheriff's endorsement of levy on that execution.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Execution, Cent. Dig. § 340; Dec. Dig. ⇨140.]

Opinion by SIMPSON, C. J., March 20th, 1882. J. Winsmith, for appellant; D. R. Duncan, contra. Appeal dismissed.

No. 1192. BUTTZ v. CHARLESTON COUNTY, November Term, 1881.

D. H. Buttz, as assignee of two claims against the County of Charleston for salary due to a deputy coroner and his constable from December, 1879, to July 1880, presented these claims to the Board of County Commissioners, in November, 1880. This assignment bore date July 26th, 1880. In December, 1880, one Collins presented an assignment of earlier date than plaintiff's, for these same claims. The Board approved the claims, and declared Collins to be the proper owner and holder thereof. Plaintiff appealed to the Court of Common Pleas, where the case was tried de novo before his Honor, Judge Kershaw, and a jury. The verdict sustained the action of the Board, except in an immaterial matter not here involved. On plaintiff's appeal, held:

[1. Appeal and Error ⇨1088; Counties ⇨205.]

The case having been tried de novo, exceptions to the action of the Board of County Commissioners are not pertinent to the inquiries presented to this court.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 4287; Dec. Dig. ⇨1088; Counties, Cent. Dig. § 333; Dec. Dig. ⇨205.]

[2. Counties ⇨205.]

There being two rival claimants of the accounts, it was absolutely essential that the Board and the court should determine to whom the money was due. And if the Board erred in determining this question without giving to the claimants the opportunity of being heard, the appellant here can take no exception to such error by the Board, as he was fully heard at the trial de novo on Circuit.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Counties, Cent. Dig. §§ 328-334; Dec. Dig. ⇨205.]

Judgment affirmed. Opinion by Mr. Justice McIVER, April 11th, 1882. S. J. Lee, for appellant; J. E. Burke, contra.

No. 1194. OLIVER v. SALE, November Term, 1881.

[1. Evidence ⇨183.]

What proof of loss of a written contract is sufficient to permit secondary evidence of its contents is to a large extent a question of fact to be decided by the judge, and his discretion will not be disturbed except in very rare cases. The rule laid down in 1 Greenleaf on Evidence, § 558, approved, and Floyd v. Mintsey, 5 Rich. 372, cited. In this case, the witness testified that he was the custodian of the paper and that it had never gone out of his possession; that he had thoroughly searched his office and could not find it; but afterwards said he would not swear positively that the paper had never gone out of his office or that he had never given it to any one. His Honor, Judge Kershaw, then permitted proof of its contents.

[2. Appeal and Error ⇨1033.]

In action on a contract by which the plaintiff was to publish a newspaper in the interest of a party at a municipal election, the defendants being a self-constituted Board of such party, held, on defendants' appeal, that the Circuit Judge did not invade the province of the jury or otherwise err in charging that the defendants were not liable severally but jointly or not at all, if the contract was made with the Committee for the Board; and that if such were the terms of the contract and some of the defendants are not bound because they were in utter ignorance of the matter, had not heard it discussed and did not recognize it afterwards, then the verdict must be in favor of all the defendants

No. 1195. SULLIVAN v. SULLIVAN MANUFACTURING COMPANY, November Term, 1881.

[1. Appeal and Error ⇨1000.]

The findings of a jury upon issues submitted to them in a chancery case, indorsed, approved and confirmed by the Circuit Judge after mature consideration, and supported by some of the testimony in the case, cannot be reversed by this court, especially where the testimony bearing upon the matters at issue was, in part, contained in books of account not before this court.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 3927; Dec. Dig. ⇨1000.]

[2. Assignments for Benefit of Creditors ⇨161.]

The correctness of these findings, which negatived charges of fraud in an assignment for the benefit of creditors, are not counterbalanced by presumptions of fraud deducible from the facts that the president of the assigning corporation was a creditor, and in part preferred, and that the books were badly kept, and that the president made no statement of this indebtedness to himself in his tax returns (it being shown that he was largely in debt), and that by good management money could have been made instead of lost.

Decree of Hudson, J., affirmed. Opinion by Mr. Justice McIVER, April 11th, 1882. Perry & Perry, for defendant, appellant; Earle & Wells, M. F. Ansel, contra.

No. 1200. COWAN v. NEEL, November Term, 1881.

This was an action by the holder of two junior judgments to recover from the sheriff of Abbeville County the proceeds of the sale of the judgment debtor's lands, sold under plaintiff's executions, and the assignee of two senior judgments was made a party defendant. A jury trial was waived and the case was tried by Kershaw, J. His findings of fact were that the two senior judgments were obtained by confession in 1855 and 1856, renewed without objection and by consent of the judgment debtor in 1869, destroyed by fire in 1872, and restored under legal proceedings with the debtor's consent in July, 1878, previous to which time they had been assigned to B. P. Neel, as trustee for the judgment debtor's wife; that the *plaintiff's judgments were obtained in May and June, 1878, and the executions were soon afterwards levied on the debtor's lands, which were sold and purchased by B. P. Neel, trustee. The judgment was that the complaint be dismissed, and on plaintiff's appeal to this court, the judgment was affirmed. Held:

[1. Appeal and Error ⚡1008.]

That this court has no power to review the findings of fact by the Circuit Judge.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 3956; Dec. Dig. ⚡1008.]

[2. Judgment ⚡795.]

That without considering the effect of a simple admission, or whether any one other than the judgment debtor could claim the benefit of a presumption of payment from lapse of time, the clear admission of the debt here given made a new starting point of time from which the presumption ran; and the lien continued while the judgment was a subsisting valid obligation.

Opinion by Mr. Justice FRASER (sitting in the place of Mr. Justice McGOWAN), April 14th, 1882. S. C. Cason, for appellant; M. P. DeBruhl, contra.

No. 1206. SLOAN v. WESTFIELD, November Term, 1881.

1. This was an appeal from a decree of Kershaw, J., approving and adopting certain findings of fact by a jury on issues ordered out of chancery. This court approved these concurrent findings, and dismissed the appeal.

[2. Account Stated ⚡7.]

Also held, that under sections 192 and 199 of the Code, judgment might be rendered on an account stated, although no allegation of an account stated was made in the complaint.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Account Stated, Cent. Dig. § 49; Dec. Dig. ⚡7.]

[3. Account Stated ⚡4.]

Defendant having failed to demand an itemized account as provided for in section 181 of the Code, he cannot complain of the verdict or decree upon the ground that the account sued upon was not itemized.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Account Stated, Cent. Dig. §§ 14, 15; Dec. Dig. ⚡4.]

Opinion by Mr. Justice FRASER (sitting in the place of the CHIEF JUSTICE), April 20th, 1882. J. W. Stokes, T. Q. Donaldson, M. F. Ansel, for appellant; Earle & Wells, contra.

No. 1210. LAMAR v. WALKER, November Term, 1881.

[1. Judgment ⚡800.]

One of the obligees of a bond secured by confession of judgment, having purchased from the judgment debtor a tract of land covered by the lien of the judgment, and afterwards reconveyed it to a stranger with general warranty, the lien was, by operation of law, discharged as to the purchasing obligee, but whether it would be discharged as to his co-obligees, doubted.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. §§ 1410-1425; Dec. Dig. ⚡800.]

[2. Judgment ⚡800.]

But all the other lands of the judgment debtor having been subsequently divided out among all the obligees, and notes interchangeably given and received to equalize shares, and these lands then sold by the sheriff to perfect titles, and bid in by the parties to whom previously allotted respectively, the obligees could not enforce their judgment for the deficiency against the tract sold as above to one of the obligees, as the judgment creditors thereby lost their equity of requiring their co-obligee, who had released the lien upon the tract for which he received full value, to permit them to be made equal, out of the other lands, before he received any more; and therefore they could not then proceed against the stranger-purchaser who held his vendor's warranty, as by their own consent this vendor (their co-obligee) had received that which should have gone to them.

No. 1212. DAVIS v. FOWLER, November Term, 1881.

Appeal and Error [§994, 1008.]

This was a case in chancery involving the genuineness of the signature to a note, and if genuine, whether the signature was obtained by fraud, deceit or undue influence. The Circuit Judge, Wallace, held that it was a valid and binding obligation, and on appeal his decree was affirmed. The Court uses this language: "This Court is very unwilling to disturb the finding of the Circuit Judge where the question is as to how much reliance can be placed upon the integrity or intelligence of a witness who can be present in the Circuit Court and not in this."

Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3904, 3955; Dec. Dig. [§994, 1008.]

Appeal and Error [§819.]

Motion by defendant to suspend the hearing of the appeal in this case (see ante, p. 514), to enable it to make a motion in the Circuit Court for a new trial upon the ground of *newly discovered evidence. Motion refused, this court holding that such motion was addressed to its discretion and would not be granted, as it appeared that such evidence would not induce the Circuit Judge to grant a new trial, it being parol cumulative, and only the opinion of one witness as to the amount of goods on hand at the time of the fire; moreover, the affidavit showed that the evidence was discovered after the trial, but it did not appear to have been before appeal taken, nor did the affidavit show that it was unknown to the officers of the defendant company at the trial, or could not have been discovered by them by the use of due diligence. This court says that a very strong case must be made to warrant the court in granting a new trial on newly discovered evidence, when such evidence is cumulative and resting in parol.

No. 1220. COTHRAN v. KNOX, April Term, 1882.

1. Reference [§97.]

Referee made his report, which was generally approved by the Circuit Judge, but it was "recommitted to the referee" for reformation in certain specified particulars. On appeal to this court, no modification was directed of this part of the decree, but certain further corrections in the items of the account were ordered (13 S. C. 496). After remittitur filed, the original referee made the changes directed without notice to counsel. Held, that in this there was no error.

No. 1228. ROBERTSON v. SHARPTON,
April Term, 1882.

[1. Estoppel ⇐38.]

Where one sells land with warranty to which at the time he has no title and afterwards acquires a title, he is estopped by the first deed from saying that he had no title at the time of the sale. Reeder ads. Craig, 3 McC. 411.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Richardson v. Atlantic Coast Lumber Corp., 93 S. C. 258, 75 S. E. 371.

For other cases, see Estoppel, Cent. Dig. § 99; Dec. Dig. ⇐38.]

[2. Ejectment ⇐111.]

Plaintiff brought action to recover a tract of land described by metes and bounds and alleged to have been purchased by defendant from one J——. The defendant asserted title to the land described by the same metes and bounds as in the complaint. An issue was submitted by consent to the jury as to the ownership of the land included in those same metes and bounds. As matter of fact, this land was not the land purchased from J——. The verdict was for plaintiff for “the land in dispute.” Held, that the verdict was sufficiently certain and definite, and that the judgment was valid, notwithstanding the false description in the complaint of a purchase from J——.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Ejectment, Cent. Dig. § 332; Dec. Dig. ⇐111.]

[3. Trial ⇐350.]

An issue in the words, “Is plaintiff entitled to the possession of the following described land,” does not refer questions of law to the jury, but only an issue of fact to be determined by the jury under instructions from the court upon the law of the case.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. § 832; Dec. Dig. ⇐350.]

[4. Equity ⇐379.]

When all equitable features have been eliminated from a case, reducing it simply to an action for the recovery of real property, it is properly triable by jury, and there is no necessity for framing the issues to be submitted. It is not conceded, however, that mere want of formality in framing or submitting an issue to be submitted in a case in chancery, would invalidate the judgment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Equity, Cent. Dig. § 801; Dec. Dig. ⇐379.]

Appeal from judgment by Cothran, J., dismissed. Opinion by Mr. Justice McIVER, July 7th, 1882. Norris & Folk, for appellant; B. W. Bettis, contra.

No. 1236. JONES v. CATHCART COMPANY, April Term, 1882.

Under bill for the settlement of an estate, a tract of land was bid off for the Clerk of Court, who was conducting the sale. He took possession, but never complied with the terms of *sale, and it seems that no report of this sale was ever made to the court, but if made was never confirmed, and no deed was ever executed. Such clerk afterwards sold this land, and by successive conveyances it passed to the defendant here, who, at the time of his purchase, had notice of the defect in the title. Under order subsequently passed in the original action, this tract was resold, and purchased by the plaintiff here, who then brought this action for the recovery of this tract of land. The trial was had before Pressley, J., and a jury. The verdict was, “We find for the plaintiff titles to the land in dispute and twelve bales lint cotton, weighing four hundred pounds each, or four hundred and eighty dollars damages.” Defendant appealed. Held:

[1. Judicial Sales ⇐58.]

That the presiding judge did not err in charging the jury that the clerk's title failed if he in any way failed to pay in full for his purchase.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judicial Sales, Cent. Dig. § 114; Dec. Dig. ⇐58.]

[2. Ejectment ⇐13.]

A legal title will always prevail over an equitable one unless the equity is so complete as to entitle the equitable claimant to a conveyance paramount to the opposing legal title.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Ejectment, Cent. Dig. §§ 56-58; Dec. Dig. ⇐13.]

[3. Trial ⇐194.]

A charge to the jury, that the balance claimed by the clerk from the estate was too small to pay off his bid on the land, taken in connection with the entire charge, was not a charge upon the facts in violation of Art. IV. § 26 of the Constitution.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 413, 436, 439-441, 446-454, 456-466; Dec. Dig. ⇐194.]

[4. Trial ⇐329.]

The verdict, though not in exact form, was substantially a finding of the land in dispute for the plaintiff and $480 damages, and was sufficiently responsive to the issues involved.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. § 775; Dec. Dig. ⇐329.]

Judgment affirmed. Opinion by Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON, July 15th, 1882. W. S. Monteith, L. F. Youmans, for appellant; J. H. Rion, contra.

No. 1242. ROSS v. LINDER. LINDER v. ROSS, April Term, 1882.

[Arbitration and Award ⇐57.]

A tract of land was partitioned between two tenants in common by commissioners selected by themselves for that purpose. A difference afterwards arose between them as to the exact location of the dividing line, which difference was submitted by them to arbitrators, who, without attempting to locate this dividing line, awarded a new partition with a dividing line of their own location. The action first above entitled was then instituted to set aside the award, and the second action *was brought for damages for a breach of the arbitration bond. The referee sustained the award, but his report was overruled by the Circuit Judge (Fraser) upon the ground that the award exceeded the terms of the submission, and he adjudged that the award be set aside, and dismissed the action for damages. On appeal to this court the Circuit decree was affirmed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Arbitration and Award, Cent. Dig. § 281; Dec. Dig. ☞ 57.]

Opinion by Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON (Mr. Justice McGOWAN absent at the hearing), July 27th, 1882. J. S. R. Thomson, for appellant; Bobo & Carlisle, contra.

No. 1247. JACOBS v. BUSH, April Term, 1882.

This was an action for the partition of a tract of land in the possession of defendant Bush, who had purchased the same at a prior sale under partition proceedings in the Court of Probate. Bush believed that he had purchased a good title, but at the trial conceded the invalidity of his title, and set up in this proceeding, by consent, a claim for betterments. The referee fixed the enhanced value by reason of the improvements at $275, and found that all rents and profits were exclusively due to the improvements, and therefore defendant should not account for rents. This report was confirmed by the Circuit Judge (Hudson), who directed a sale of the land, and out of the proceeds that the costs and expenses of sale and the costs of plaintiffs' attorneys be paid, then $275 to defendant (out of which defendant's costs be paid), the remainder distributed to the tenants in common. From this decree plaintiffs appealed, but the decree was confirmed in all respects, except that the enhanced value by reason of the improvements was reduced to $187.50, this court holding:

[1. Partition ☞ 85.]

That this was a proper case for the application of the betterment act. Gen. Stat. ch. cxxi. §§ 1-7.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partition, Cent. Dig. § 238; Dec. Dig. ☞ 85.]

[2. Appeal and Error ☞ 1022.]

That there was no evidence to fix the enhanced value of the land at a sum greater than $187.50. In this connection the court uses the following language: "Under the decided cases in this State upon this subject, the finding of the referee thus concurred in by the presiding judge must stand, unless there is an entire absence of testimony to sustain it or the manifest weight is opposed to it. True, this court could arbitrarily overrule this finding or the findings below of any court, and this being a court of last resort, the parties would have no *alternative but to submit. This court, however, recognizes the fact that it is not a law unto itself; on the contrary, that well-established principles should govern here as elsewhere. In fact, because this court is a court of last resort affords an additional reason why we should be the more careful not to disregard settled principles, even by inadvertence. These remarks are made because we feel constrained to overrule the Circuit Judge as to the value of the betterments allowed, and to show that we have not done so without due regard to previous decisions and precedents."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 4015; Dec. Dig. ☞ 1022.]

[3. Partition ☞ 86.]

That the rents and profits being entirely due to the improvements, were properly disallowed; the principles announced in Scaife v. Thomson, 15 S. C. 337, being also applicable to a case like this, and it being expressly provided for in the betterment law, supra.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Lumb v. Pinckney, 21 S. C. 475.

For other cases, see Partition, Cent. Dig. § 247½; Dec. Dig. ☞ 86.]

[4. Costs ☞ 13.]

The costs were within the discretion of the Circuit Court.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Costs, Cent. Dig. § 21; Dec. Dig. ☞ 13.]

Opinion by Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON, July 31st, 1882. J. S. R. Thomson, Evans, Bomar & Simpson, for appellants; Bobo & Carlisle, contra.

No. 1257. CARRERE v. WHALEY, April Term, 1882.

Action by the administrator of a deceased partner against the survivor for account and relief. The referee reported an account stated on a certain day showing balance due by the defendant, charged certain other items of later date, and rejected a counterclaim of defendant as entirely unsupported by the evidence, and recommended judgment against the defendant for $314.61. This report was approved and confirmed by the Circuit Judge, and the case was brought to this court on appeal. Held:

[1. Account Stated ☞ 11.]

That an account stated is prima facie correct, but may be opened and re-examined by a court of equity, if shown to be erroneous by reason of accident, fraud or undue advantage taken.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Account Stated, Cent. Dig. § 63; Dec. Dig. ⚡11.]

[2. Account Stated ⚡1.]

Doubtful whether the memoranda produced here amounted to an account stated.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Account Stated, Cent. Dig. §§ 1-8; Dec. Dig. ⚡1.]

[3. Partnership ⚡300.]

That there was error in charging the partnership (a law firm) with the entire fee collected in a case commenced during the lifetime of the deceased, but prosecuted and terminated afterwards.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partnership, Cent. Dig. § 696; Dec. Dig. ⚡300.]

[4. Appeal and Error ⚡1022.]

Certain findings of fact overruled as being without evidence to sustain them or manifestly opposed to the weight of the evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4015-4018; Dec. Dig. ⚡1022.]

No. 1258. WALLACE v. CAMPBELL,
April Term, 1882.

[Executors and Administrators ⚡225.]

This was an action to marshal the estate of John Campbell, deceased, for sale of land in aid of assets, etc., instituted in the Court of Probate for York County, October 1st, 1879, by the administrator of Campbell.

Creditors were called in, and the following claims were presented:

1. Sealed note signed by the intestate as surety, dated January 18th, 1855, due at twelve months, with four credits endorsed, the latest bearing date January 8, 1859. The note was given for purchases made by the widow of an intestate at the estate sale. The widow died in 1862, and John Campbell, the surety, died in 1872.

2. Administration bond of A. and B. in the estate of C., signed by Campbell as surety, bearing date December 26th, 1854. In 1866, B. then insolvent, made a return which stated that the administrators were in default to the amount of $1171.56, and this sum with interest was claimed here. A. died insolvent during the war.

3. Administration bond of C. in the estate of his son D., signed by Campbell as surety in 1837. C. made his first and last return in 1838. C. died in 1854 intestate, possessed of a considerable estate. In 1866, B., surviving administrator of C., made a return stating a balance due by C. to the estate of D., and how the same should be paid. This claim was presented by some of the distributees of D., they being also distributees of C.

The Probate Judge held that these claims were stale, barred by laches and lapse of time. His decree was confirmed by the Circuit Judge (Cothran), and, on appeal, by this court.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. §§ 618, 640; Dec. Dig. ⚡225.]

REPORTS OF CASES

ARGUED AND DETERMINED IN THE

SUPREME COURT OF SOUTH CAROLINA

JUSTICES OF THE SUPREME COURT DURING THE PERIOD COMPRISED IN THIS VOLUME.

Hon. WILLIAM D. SIMPSON, Chief Justice.
Hon. HENRY McIVER, Associate Justice.
Hon. SAMUEL MCGOWAN, " "

18 S. C. *1

*TOMPKINS v. TOMPKINS.

(April Term, 1882.)

[1. Executors and Administrators ⇨125.]

Cotton belonging to an estate was put into the hands of factors by one executor, and afterwards shipped and sold by direction of the other executor, and the proceeds were drawn partly by one and partly by the other. Held, that each was chargeable only with the amount by him received.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Hyatt v. McBurney, 18 S. C. 215.

For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. § 522; Dec. Dig. ⇨125.]

[2. Wills ⇨731.]

A testator advanced $5,500 to make the one-third cash payment on a tract of land purchased by his sons. In his will, supposing himself to own a one-third interest in this land, he declared in the ninth clause that "upon the payment of $5,500 to my estate, or the accounting therefor in the division of the residuum by my sons, F. and R., I will, devise and bequeath unto them and their heirs forever, all my interest, being the one-third part of a tract of land," &c. In the eleventh clause, the testator canceled all debts due by his sons, except * * * and also a *debt of $5,500 against my sons, F. and R., mentioned in the ninth clause of my will." Held, that the original debt was canceled by the will, and the debt excepted in the eleventh clause did not arise, F. and R. having declined to take the land.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. § 1795; Dec. Dig. ⇨731.]

[3. Reference ⇨65.]

Objection to testimony as incompetent, under section 415 of the code, comes too late where first raised in exceptions to the referee's report.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Reference, Cent. Dig. §§ 97, 98; Dec. Dig. ⇨65.]

[4. Partnership ⇨255.]

A partnership between testator and his son having been dissolved by the death of the former, his estate is chargeable with its proportion of all losses properly traceable to the effort to fulfill contracts binding at the time of dissolution and to expenses incurred in the legitimate effort to wind up the partnership matters, but not for losses resulting from new business.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partnership, Cent. Dig. § 558; Dec. Dig. ⇨255.]

[5. Payment ⇨14.]

A merchant's account, contracted during the war, not being shown to have been made with reference to Confederate money as a basis of value, should not be scaled.

[6. Executors and Administrators ⇨88.]

Interest might properly be allowed by a court of equity on an open account due by testator to his executor, where interest is charged on the executor's accounts with the estate and upon the accounts between the several parties.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. §§ 393, 393½, Dec. Dig. ⇨88.]

[7. Appeal and Error ⇨1022.]

Finding of fact by referee and Circuit judge affirmed.

[8. Executors and Administrators ⇨118.]

In the absence of evidence showing that Confederate money and bonds could have been made available for purposes of the estate, executors are not chargeable with such assets which were left by testator and came into their hands only a few months before the termination of the war.

[9. Executors and Administrators ⇨88.]

And the debts by specialty being large and the assets apparently insufficient for the payment, a simple contract claim of one executor was not extinguished by Confederate money in testator's hands at his death in May 1864, and received by the other executor in September following.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. §§ 393, 393½, Dec. Dig. ⇨88.]

[10. Executors and Administrators ⇨203.]

A. and B. were equally liable as sureties for the payment of a note, and A. paid it, using in part (less than half), money of B. A. died, and, by his will, bequeathed this note to C. upon conditions which C. refused to perform. Held, that B. had no right to recover from A.'s estate the amount of B.'s money so used by A.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. § 731; Dec. Dig. ⇨203.]

[11. Executors and Administrators ⇨89.]

In the absence of evidence showing that notes, &c., of an estate administered just after the war, could, by proper diligence, have been collected, the executors are not liable for such of these notes as were produced at the trial uncollected, the executors testifying that they had tried to collect them and failed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. § 394; Dec. Dig. ⇨89.]

[12. Executors and Administrators ⇨278.]

Executors are entitled to credit for the payment of an informal judgment rendered against themselves as executors, the debt itself being undisputed.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Parks v. McDaniel, 75 S. C. 10, 54 S. E. 801, 117 Am. St. Rep. 878.

For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. §§ 1099-1101; Dec. Dig. ⇨278.]

[13. Executors and Administrators ⇨104.]

In stating an executor's accounts, the payments made in each current year should be deducted before striking a balance to bear interest for the year in which said payments were made.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Nicholson v. Whitlock, 57 S. C. 42, 35 S. E. 412.

For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. §§ 423-432; Dec. Dig. ⇨104.]

[14. Executors and Administrators ⇨303.]

A legatee receiving cotton which he sold for gold in 1865, as a part of his interest in the estate, is properly chargeable with the value of the gold in currency at that time, all the other transactions of the estate having been had in currency.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. §§ 1229-1242, 1245; Dec. Dig. ⇨303.]

*3

[15. Executors and Administrators ⇨104.]

*Executors held liable for interest after a decree requiring them to account, they not having shown that the funds were kept on hand unemployed to meet the results of the accounting.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. §§ 423-432; Dec. Dig. ⇨104.]

[16. Executors and Administrators ⇨500.]

When an executor is required to account before the Court of Equity, it is no longer necessary for him to account before the ordinary, and, therefore, his failure to do so does not deprive him of his right to commissions.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. § 2136; Dec. Dig. ⇨500.]

[17. Executors and Administrators ⇨500.]

For a failure to make returns since the adoption of the General Statutes of 1872, an executor did not forfeit his commissions, there being no law imposing such forfeiture.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. §§ 2131-2139; Dec. Dig. ⇨500.]

[18. Executors and Administrators ⇨495.]

An executor is entitled to commissions on funds that practically passed through his hands.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. §§ 2089-2106, 2108; Dec. Dig. ⇨495.]

[19. Appeal and Error ⇨1022.]

A finding of fact by referee, overruled by Circuit judge, approved.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4015-4018; Dec. Dig. ⇨1022.]

20. An omission by referee and Circuit judge as to a matter of fact, corrected.

[21. Appeal and Error ⇨266.]

[On appeal from the confirmation of a referee's report on final settlement of an executor's accounts, the objection that interest was allowed on an open account against the estate is unavailable, where no exception was taken in the lower court.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 1555; Dec. Dig. ⇨266.]

[22. Witnesses ⇨180.]

[Where objection is taken to the competency of a witness to testify in an action, and said objection is made too late, it is unnecessary to consider whether it could have been sustained if taken at the proper time.]

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Witnesses, Cent. Dig. § 727; Dec. Dig. ⇨180.]

Before Aldrich, J., Edgefield, March, 1881.

Action by J. G. Tompkins, Lucy G. Tompkins and R. A. Tompkins, a minor, against S. S. Tompkins and J. W. Tompkins, as executors of the last will of James Tompkins, deceased, James L. Tompkins and F. A. Tompkins, commenced April 23d, 1877, for settlement of the estate of James Tompkins and for an accounting by the executors. J. G. Tompkins, a son of H. W. Tompkins, was assignee of Lucy G. Tompkins, who was assignee of H. W. Tompkins, and Lucy G. Tompkins, widow, and R. A. Tompkins, an infant, were distributees of R. Augustus Tompkins, deceased, a son of testator.

James Tompkins died in May, 1864, leaving a will, the ninth and eleventh clauses of which were as follows:

9th. Upon the payment of the sum of $5,500 to my estate, or the accounting therefor, in the division of the residuum by my sons, Franklin A. and R. Augustus Tompkins, I will, devise and bequeath unto them and their heirs forever, all my interest, being the one-third part of a tract of land in the State of Texas, county of Brazoria, and whereon my son Henry W. Tompkins now resides, and the remaining two-thirds of which are owned respectfully by my sons Henry W. of the one part, and Franklin A. and R. Augustus Tompkins of the other part.

11th. By the above bequests, I have attempted to equalize the advancements heretofore made to my children, and if any of the above negroes, given to any of my sons or grandsons, *should die before they are received, except those given my son James L., my desire is, and I do direct, that my executors substitute one of equal value for any son's negro or negroes so dying, from my negroes not herein specially disposed of. I have also included in the estimate of advancements all notes and debts due me by any of my children, which I hereby declare canceled; excepting, however, the $6,000 and the debt against Tompkins & Macmurphy, in the fourth clause of this, my will, which are to be paid by my son, James L. Tompkins, as therein directed, and also a debt of $5,500 against my sons, Franklin A. and R. Augustus Tompkins, mentioned in the ninth clause of my will.

S. S. and J. W. Tompkins were appointed executors. They were then in the Confederate army, but returned to their homes in September, 1864, and qualified. The inventory and appraisement were filed in February, 1865. Testator's heirs were his widow, Huldah; his sons, Stephen S., James L., Henry W., John W., Franklin A. and R. Augustus Tompkins, and a grandson, S. J. Tompkins. Henry W. Tompkins died in 1867, intestate, leaving a widow, Lucy G., and an infant son, R. A. Tompkins. Mrs. Huldah Tompkins died in 1868, intestate, and S. J. Tompkins died intestate in 1871, and his share in the estate of his grandfather and grandmother passed by assignment of his distributees to the plaintiff, R. A. Tompkins. The estate was very considerably in debt, and, but for several very favorable compromises made by the executors, would have been insolvent. As it turned out, however, the debts were nearly all paid, and much valuable land was saved to the estate.

The facts bearing upon the points decided are generally stated in the opinion. To such statement should be added that there was no objection taken at the reference to the testimony of J. W. Tompkins as to his transactions with his deceased father; and that the sale of the White House place was a transfer to a creditor made under a power in the will in compromise of a large claim at twenty-five per cent. agreed to in consideration of certain services rendered by one of the executors. The case was referred to John R. Abney, Esq., to take the testimony and state the accounts. He reported, inter alia, as follows:

*On February 27th, 1864, the testator took up a note held by the bank of Hamburg against Tompkins & Macmurphy, principal, and James Tompkins and J. W. Tompkins, sureties, by paying thereon the sum of $18,406.02. It is in testimony that the testator used $5,355 of the money of J. W. Tompkins in taking up said note. In the fourth clause of the testator's will he bequeathed said note to J. L. Tompkins, upon the condition that he pay for the claim testator has in it, in cotton, at seventy-five cents per pound. The said J. L. Tompkins does not think he ought to pay said claim in full, and urges that the testator was indebted to him by reason of his being a part owner of the Texas land with F. A. and R. A. Tompkins; and H. W. Tompkins who owed J. L. Tompkins a large sum of money for advances, and, also, by reason of J. L. Tompkins having a separate account of $56.70 against the testator. As to the first discount, I do not think it should be allowed, since there is no evidence of the testator's being interested in the farming operations on said place; but as to the second, I think it proper to allow it, unless the said J. L. takes said claim strictly under the will. I think the said J. L. can either take under the said clause or refuse to do so. And, under the circumstances, I think it proper to require him to account for and pay the $18,406.02 according to the value of said amount in good currency, as regulated by our statute. By applying the statute the amount would be reduced down to currency of the present day, and the account would stand as follows: * * *

Under the ninth clause of testator's will, a bequest or devise is made to F. A. and R. A. Tompkins, which is conditional. In such cases the right of election exists, and, in my opinion, fairness and equity would be done by permitting them to decline to assume the indebtedness therein imposed on them, and to leave the matter as it stood previous to the will. Then, if that be done, the next question is, to whom did the place belong? From the testimony it appears that no title-deed had ever been drawn. H. W. Tompkins admits that he was to be one of the purchasers, but says that he had no showing. In equity, I don't think that makes any difference. The others do not appear to have designed excluding him from the benefit of

*the trade, and I apprehend that his name would have been in the deed of conveyance had the credit portion of the purchase-money been paid. If, then, he was a part owner, what portion did he own? I think it clear that it was one-third; and, furthermore, I think it equally clear that the claim which James Tompkins had over the land was an equitable mortgage in its nature. Each of the three sons were to own one-third when the land was paid for, and the credit portion was to be paid out of the proceeds of the farms on the place, in which farms the brothers were equally interested. I, therefore, think that each of them should pay one-third of the $5,500 advanced by the testator for the payment of the cash portion of the purchase-money, and their accounts for that would stand as follows: * * *

It will be seen above that I have computed interest from January 1st, 1860. From F. A. Tompkins' testimony it appears that the $5,500 was loaned about that time, or before.

Tanning Business—In July, 1863, the testator and his son, J. W. Tompkins, entered in a partnership for the purpose of carrying on a tannery. This firm was dissolved in January, 1864, and the stock, &c., sold for $10,710 net. This amount was used for the purpose of taking up the Hamburg bank note against J. L. Tompkins, hereinbefore mentioned; and as J. W. Tompkins was entitled to one-half of the $10,710, the said J. L. Tompkins is due him $701.50, as may be seen by referring back to the account of J. L. Tompkins with the testator's estate for the amount paid in taking up said note.

In January, 1864, a new firm was organized for the purpose of tanning. It was composed of James Tompkins, J. W. Tompkins, and one Price, and styled Price & Tompkins. The business continued to be carried on after the testator's death, and was discontinued in the latter part of 1866. But before its ending, Price went out of the firm and transferred his interest to the estate of the testator and J. W. Tompkins, upon a settlement had with him. After Price had gone out of the firm there were liabilities against the firm, which J. W. Tompkins claims to have paid out of his own money. This being

*the case, the estate is indebted to him for one-half of the amount so paid. The said firm also owed J. W. Tompkins $72, and James Tompkins $152. The accounts would be as follows: * * *

The firm obtained a patent from the United States government for tanning, which belongs to the testator's estate. I recommend that the patent and two notes, which also belong to the firm, be sold, and the proceeds applied in a settlement between them.

Mercantile Business—In January, 1858, James Tompkins and J. W. Tompkins formed a mercantile partnership, which lasted for two years. At its termination, the firm owed James Tompkins $207.07, and, therefore, J. W. Tompkins owed the testator one-half of said sum. The accounts stand as follows: * * *

The assets consisted of goods, notes and accounts, on which only $20 was collected. I recommend that the said notes and accounts be sold, and the proceeds thereof applied to the settlement of the above account. The testator's interest in the goods was bought by J. W. Tompkins, and about the same time J. W. Tompkins, being in the shoe business with one Jennings, also purchased Jennings' interest, and consolidated the two branches of business. The account of testator has been offered in evidence. At the end of each current year, from 1861 to 1864, both inclusive, I have scaled the account down according to the schedule regulating the value of Confederate money. The accounts stand as follows: * * *

Overseeing Account—J. W. Tompkins claims that the testator was due him $600 for services rendered in overseeing the testator's plantation during the late war. I don't think, however, that it has been shown to be due even upon an implied contract. The circumstances existing at the time the services were rendered, or evidenced by the letter of James Tompkins to the comptroller general, appear to have given the government a voice in the premises, and the implied contract thereby proved, tends to show that such services were given on *the part of the government as in the nature of a gratuity.† I, therefore, do not think that the claim should be allowed.

It is impossible now to make a complete statement of the accounts, as the land is not yet sold, and the choses in action on hand uncollected are also to be disposed of; but the foregoing accounts are in full compliance with the order under which I was appointed, and are sufficient to render a full settlement easily effected so soon as all the assets of the estate are sold and the proceeds collected. The plaintiffs contend that J. W. Tompkins, executor, is liable for certain, if not all, of the deficit in the account of S. S. Tompkins, executor, but it does not appear tenable ground in view of the testimony and the law. See Gates v. Whetstone, 8 S. C. 244 [28 Am. Rep. 284].

In making a full settlement of the estate of the testator, the share of H. W. Tompkins will be charged with all liabilities, just as if it had not been assigned. The assignee took the said share subject to such charges as were proper against H. W. Tompkins. See Code, § 135. I recommend that the land be sold on salesday in November. * * *

I further recommend that the creditors of the testator's estate, who have not been paid, be called in to prove their claims, or be required to file the same.

To this report the plaintiffs filed the following exceptions:

1. Because the referee erred in holding the estate of testator liable to J. W. Tompkins in the sum of half the amount of the liabilities of the firm of Price & Tompkins, to wit, the sum of $1,268.42.

2. Because the referee erred in holding that the estate of testator is indebted to J. W. Tompkins in the sum of $1,127.61 on account of the tannery.

3. Because, in respect to the tannery, the report is, in other respects, erroneous.

4. Because the referee erred in allowing J. W. Tompkins an interest in the Tompkins & Macmurphy note, paid by testator.

5. Because the referee erred in holding J.

*9

L. Tompkins in*debted to the estate of testator only in the sum of $1,717.42 on account of the Tompkins & Macmurphy note, and because, in other respects, in reference to the said note of Tompkins & Macmurdy, the report is clearly erroneous.

† This was an exemption from service in the Army to act as overseer for his father.—REPORTER.

6. Because the referee erred in holding H. W. Tompkins indebted to the estate of testator in the sum of $4,271.60, or in any other sum, on account of the sum of $5,500 advanced by testator for the purchase of a tract of land in Texas.

7. Because the referee erred in holding the estate of testator indebted to J. W. Tompkins in the sum of $3,939.23, on account of the mercantile business.

8. Because the referee erred in allowing J. W. Tompkins commissions on the proceeds of the sale of the White House place in 1873, to wit, on the sum of $3,716.18, when the said sum did not pass through his hands.

9. Because the referee erred in allowing J. W. Tompkins credit for the sum of $2,700, claimed to have been paid by him on account of the judgment of Jennings, Smith & Co., in the year 1876, the said judgment not being authorized by law, and being, if authorized by law, irregular, null and void, and because, if paid, was not paid out of individual funds.

10. Because the referee erred in allowing S. S. Tompkins credit for the sum of $7,662.93, claimed to have been paid out in 1869, whereas, in that sum is included the payment of the identical Jennings, Smith & Co. judgment, embraced in the exception next above.

11. Because the referee erred in not holding J. W. Tompkins equally and jointly liable with S. S. Tompkins for the amount of the proceeds of the sale of one lot of cotton in Liverpool, to wit, the sum of $11,923.

12. Because the referee erred in allowing the executors any commissions after the year 1866, no annual returns having been made after that time.

13. Because the referee erred in not holding the executors responsible for the notes and accounts on hand at the death of testator, no evidence being introduced showing them to have been worthless or doubtful, and no effort having been made to collect all of them.

*10

*14. Because the referee erred in holding the executors liable for the sum in Confederate treasury notes on hand at the death of testator, to wit, the sum of $15,535, of which only the sum of $1,700 was charged to S. S. Tompkins.

15. Because the referee erred in not holding the executors liable, to some extent at least, for the sum of $9,550.90 in Confederate bonds, on hand at the death of testator, in 1864.

16. Because, if the estate of testator was indebted to J. W. Tompkins on account of the mercantile business in the sum of $3,939.23, or in any other sum, the referee erred in not canceling it by the Confederate money on hand at the time of testator's death.

17. Because the referee erred in allowing

J. W. Tompkins to testify to the transactions between him and his testator as to the mercantile account, and because the said account was barred by the statute of limitations.

18. Because the referee erred in allowing defendants to amend without giving plaintiffs an opportunity to reply.

19. Because, in regard to the mercantile business, the referee erred in not giving the amount in Confederate money that was reduced, nor the rate of the reduction, to gold.

20. Because the referee erred in allowing J. W. Tompkins credit in gold for the sum of $95.90 on account of taxes paid for P. L. Tucker, in 1865, when the amount was paid in Confederate money, and should have been reduced to gold, according to law.

21. Because the referee erred in not adjusting the rights of the parties amongst themselves, in obedience to the order of reference.

22. Because the report of the referee is, in other respects, contrary to the evidence and the law.

Exceptions of J. W. Tompkins—

1. Because the referee erred in not deducting the payments made in each current year before striking a balance.

2. Because the referee erred in not charging to the estate the amount found due this defendant for money furnished by said J. W. Tompkins to pay the Tompkins & Macmurdy note, *testator having appropriated the note and disposed of it by his will.

*11

3. Because the referee erred in not allowing this defendant compensation for services rendered as overseer.

4. Because the referee erred in reducing this defendant's accounts against the testator, as if the charges were made in Confederate currency, when the items charged in said accounts were charged at gold prices.

5. Because the referee erred in not allowing this defendant his part of the account of H. W. Tompkins due Jas. Tompkins & Son, and in not charging testator's share of said account against the said H. W. Tompkins.

6. Because the report of the referee is contrary to law and evidence in other respects.

Exceptions of S. S. Tompkins—

1. Because the referee erred in not deducting the payments made by the defendant for each current year before striking a balance to bear interest for the years in which said payments were made.

2. Because the referee erred in charging this defendant and F. A. Tompkins with the nominal value of the currency received by them for cotton instead of the value of such currency in constitutional money at the time received; and, further, because he demonetized gold in his statement of the account of R. A. Tompkins for cotton sold by him, though it was but the logical consequence of his mode of charging this defendant and F. A. Tompkins.

3. Because the referee erred in charging this defendant with interest, after the order of Chancellor Lesesne for him to account, on the money, received by him during and after the year in which said order was made. See Clark v. Tompkins, 1 S. C. 119.

The Circuit decree was as follows:

This case was heard on exceptions to the report of Mr. John R. Abney, referee. The report is very long—seventy-seven pages—containing evidence, accounts and conclusions of law and *fact. When a case is referred in which matters of fact are to be ascertained and accounts balanced, the findings of the referee, like the verdict of a jury, are conclusive on the court, unless the findings of fact are contrary to the evidence, or the statements of the account show error on their face. The exceptions to the report number thirty-one in all; hence, the labor of investigation has been much more difficult than that of decision.

*12

Mr. James Tompkins, an eminent and wealthy citizen of Edgefield, departed this life in May, 1864, leaving of force his last will, by which he appointed his two sons, the defendants, his executors. He, with his sons, had been engaged in mercantile pursuits, a tannery, the purchase of land and various moneyed transactions. Hence, as will be seen by the report, the referee had much labor in sifting the testimony and adjusting the accounts. The main subject of controversy, however, was the sale of one hundred and thirteen bales of cotton in Liverpool. From that sale J. W. Tompkins received $1,775, and S. S. Tompkins $10,148.47. It is contended the executors are jointly liable for this amount. The referee was directed to take testimony, state the accounts between the executors and the estate, and between the parties; to ascertain the amounts due by the executors, and each of them, to the parties respectively; to report at what time and upon what terms the real estate should be sold, and any special matter. The referee has laboriously performed that duty.

The deceased was reputed to be a man of wealth, and doubtless, but for the misfortunes of the war, his estate would have been amply sufficient to meet all its liabilities, but, like many other estates, it proved to be insolvent. His son and executor, S. S. Tompkins, whom I have known from his early manhood, a gentleman of irreproachable character and of the highest integrity, seems to have had the chief management of the estate, and I have no doubt has acted throughout with an eye single to the best interest of all concerned. He is evidently very sensitive on the subject of his management, but I do not think has cause of uneasiness, for his frank explanation and the earnestness he has displayed throughout must disarm the most censorious and convince the most suspicious that his every effort *has been to preserve his father's memory, advance the fortunes of his children and make the best settlement in his power for the creditors. I think it is but simple justice to give this expression of opinion here, because, from the feeling displayed by Mr. Tompkins at the hearing, he is greatly moved, as I am sure no one will suspect him of improper motive or conduct.

I repeat, the main discussion was on one exception, which applies to the sale of one hundred and thirteen bales of cotton in Liverpool. This question is, I think, settled by the case of Gates v. Whetstone, 8 S. C. 244 [28 Am. Rep. 284]. In that case all the preceding authorities on the liabilities of co-executors are very well grouped, and the rule is announced that "in this State the courts have not held an executor liable for the acts of his co-executor to which he has not contributed in some direct and active way, so as by his interference to afford not only countenance, but coöperation." The facts on which the referee has based his findings are briefly these: This cotton was stored on one of the plantations of the testator. Incendiary fires were so frequent that Mr. S. S. Tompkins became solicitous for its safety, and suggested to his brother, J. W. Tompkins, co-executor, the propriety of removing it to Augusta. In this Mr. J. W. Tompkins acquiesced; had the cotton hauled to the river, and it was shipped to Augusta.

After the war, the factors who had the cotton in charge, shipped it to Liverpool and sold it. An account was opened by the factors with the executors, who were credited with the amount of the sales. Mr. S. S. Tompkins drew $10,148.47, and Mr. J. W. Tompkins $1,775. Mr. S. S. Tompkins says: "The cotton was sold by my individual order, and not by concurrence of my co-executor." Mr. J. W. Tompkins says: "When I drew the $1,775, I was under the impression that I had individual funds in the hands of the factors; at that time I did not know the cotton had been sold; did not learn it until 1868 or 1869; the shipping of the cotton was the act of my co-executor; when I drew the $1,775, I supposed it would be charged to my individual account, and not to me as co-executor." There is a good deal of testimony on this head, but these are the salient points of the evidence of the executors, the actors in *this transaction; they both appear to speak with frankness and candor, I think. Mr. S. S. Tompkins says: "I do not recollect if I consulted my brother about the shipment of the cotton, but I have no doubt he would have acquiesced if I had."

*14

I have looked over the evidence carefully, and my conclusion is, that it establishes the following facts: 1. That J. W. Tompkins agreed with S. S. that the cotton was not safe on the plantation; that it should be sent to Augusta, and he superintended the removal and shipment. 2. That he did not know of the shipment to Liverpool and sale. 3. That he did not know the proceeds of the sale were credited to him and his co-executor. 4. That when he drew the $1,775 he supposed he had funds of his own, in the hands of the factors, to pay it. 5. That he was not consulted by his co-executor when he drew the balance, nor did he know what disposition he made of the money. 6. That he lived in Cokesbury; that his father had entire confidence in his brother, his co-executor; that he was the older and a lawyer and that he desired to leave the whole management of the estate in his hands, being unwilling to qualify as executor.

Now, I cannot see how J. W. Tompkins has "contributed in some direct and active way, so as by his interference to afford not only countenance, but coöperation." He did not know when the cotton was shipped to Liverpool and sold. He did not know that the proceeds of the sale were in the hands of the factors, and credited to him and his brother, as executors. When he drew for the $1,775, he expected the drafts to be paid out of his individual funds. He did not know that his co-executor drew the balance, or what he did with it. How, then, can it be said that he contributed actively and directly to the act of his co-executor? I see no reason to disturb the finding of the referee on this fact, and the exception is overruled.

As to the first exception, this is also a question of fact. It was stated in the argument that no exception was taken as to the competency of J. W. Tompkins as a witness, nor does it appear by the report that such exceptions were made at the reference. If this be so, the fact was fully established by the proof, and there is no error in the finding. The exception is overruled. *Query: Without deciding the objection as to the competency of the witness, is it not too late to make the exceptions after the coming in of the report? It is like objecting to the verdict of a jury on evidence that was permitted to go to them without challenge at the trial.

Second exception. The referee has found that a contract was to be performed at the death of the testator; the death dissolved the copartnership as to all future contracts, but I see no error in the finding of the referee as to the contracts existing at the time of the death. This exception is overruled. And so are the third, fourth and fifth exceptions. If the referee was satisfied from the evidence that this payment was made with partnership funds, I see no error in the finding, and these exceptions are overruled. The sixth and seventh exceptions embrace questions of fact and matters of account; the referee had the witnesses and books before him; he had a much better opportunity to judge what was the truth and right of the case than I have, and I will not disturb his findings. The exceptions are overruled.

The eighth exception must be sustained. If the money did not pass through the hands of the executor, J. W. Tompkins, he incurred no liability, and I do not see on what principle the referee allows commissions. It was the result of a compromise of a debt in which no money passed; simply an exchange of papers. The ninth exception must be overruled. It was no part of the inquiry referred to the referee, to try the validity of the judgment. It was found that the executors paid it in good faith; they regarded it as a valid claim, and it was certainly binding on the estate until it was set aside. The tenth exception must be sustained; it seems to be evident that the referee has committed an error here.

The twelfth exception is overruled. When I was commissioner in equity, the practice was general where an estate was taken into the Court of Equity on a bill for account, the returns to the court of ordinary ceased, because, while the accounting was going on before the commissioner, there was no necessity to undergo the expenses of another before the ordinary. Commissions were always allowed. The nineteenth exception must be sustained in part. I can very well see how, in view of the universal calamity that had befallen the country, and the state of public opinion in Edgefield, the executors may have concluded there was no use to incur the expense and trouble of trying to collect these old debts; they reason, if the juries interpose no obstacle, the stay law will prevent, and probably the referee shared this opinion. But there should have been an inquiry; some, if not all, may have been collected. Nor do I think it right to charge the whole to the executors. Let there be a further inquiry.

The fourteenth, fifteenth and sixteenth exceptions must be sustained; the value of Confederate money and securities that came into the hands of the executors was a proper charge against them, and should have been allowed. As to the seventeenth exception, I am in doubt if the code applies; the books were the evidence, not the witness, J. W. Tompkins. These books were as much evidence against one partner as the other. All were equally bound by them; the entries of one were the entries of the other; each had the right to correct errors or mistakes, and if one partner allows a charge made against him in his lifetime without complaint or objection, it seems hard and unjust, the moment the breath leaves the body, the books—his books—shall not prove that account. It was as much his act as the act of his partner, and it is the account, the silent witness, that speaks, not the surviving partner. The exception is overruled.

The eighteenth, nineteenth and twentieth exceptions I cannot determine; the report does not furnish me sufficient evidence to form a satisfactory judgment. The nineteenth and twentieth are denied; these must go back for further inquiry. I am sorry that severe indisposition prevented me from writing out my opinion when the argument was fresh in my memory; it was due to the earnestness, zeal and ability with which it was pressed, but my state of health, during the court and the succeeding court in Columbia, prevented. It is ordered that the report go back to the referee, or some other, as Mr. Abney is out of the county, if the counsel desire, to be reformed on the principles herein announced.

*17

*From this decree plaintiffs and the two defendants first named appealed upon the following exceptions:

Plaintiffs' exceptions—

1. Because his Honor, the presiding judge, erred in deciding that the estate of James Tompkins, deceased, is insolvent.

2. Because his Honor, the presiding judge, erred in deciding the matter of fact that J. W. Tompkins simply superintended the removal and shipment of one hundred and thirteen bales of cotton, whereas, it appears from the evidence of J. W. Tompkins himself, that the said J. W. Tompkins actually took possession of the said cotton, had it entirely within his own control, and removed and shipped it upon his own responsibility.

3. Because his Honor, the presiding judge, erred in deciding as matter of fact that J. W. Tompkins did not know of the shipment of said cotton to Liverpool and the sale thereof.

4. Because his Honor, the presiding judge, erred in deciding that J. W. Tompkins, did not know that the proceeds were credited to him and his co-executor.

5. Because the court erred in deciding that when J. W. Tompkins drew the $1,775 he supposed he had funds of his own in the hands of the factors to pay it.

6. Because his Honor erred in deciding that J. W. Tompkins "was not consulted by his brother when he drew the balance, nor did he know what disposition he made of the money."

7. Because his Honor erred in deciding that J. W. Tompkins "lived in Cokesbury; that his father had entire confidence in his brother, his co-executor; that he was the older and a lawyer, and that he desired to leave the whole management of the estate in his hands, being unwilling to qualify as executor."

8. Because his Honor erred in not holding J. W. Tompkins equally and jointly liable with S. S. Tompkins for the amount of proceeds of the sale of said lot of cotton sold in Liverpool, to wit, the sum of $11,623.

9. Because his Honor erred in deciding the estate of testator is liable to J. W. Tompkins in the sum of one-half the amount of the liabilities of the firm of Price & Tompkins, to wit, the *sum of $1,268.42, and also in deciding that this was a question of fact.

*18

10. Because his Honor erred in deciding that the estate of testator is indebted to J. W. Tompkins in the sum of $1,127.61 on account of tannery business.

11. Because his Honor erred in overruling the third, fourth, fifth, sixth, seventh and ninth exceptions taken by plaintiffs to the referee's report.

12. Because his Honor erred in deciding that the twelfth and seventeenth exceptions to the referee's report, submitted by plaintiffs, must be overruled.

Executors' exceptions—

1. Because his Honor erred in holding the executors accountable for any sum for the notes and accounts not collected, the same, or receipts of attorneys therefor, having been produced at the reference and proven uncollectable by the executors, and in the absence of any proof showing that the said notes and accounts, or any of them, were collectable or solvent.

2. Because his Honor erred in holding said executors liable for anything on account of Confederate treasury notes and bonds on hand at death of testator, the proof showing that the testator had invested his ward's funds in them, and executors regarded them as belonging to another trust. See Clark v. Tompkins, 1 S. C. 119.

3. Because his Honor erred in not ruling upon and sustaining the joint exception of said executors to the referee's report, the following being said exception, viz.: Because the referee erred in not deducting the payments made in each current year, before striking a balance to bear interest for the year in which said payments were made.

J. W. Tompkins' exceptions—

1. Because his Honor erred in not considering and sustaining the defendants' exceptions to the report of the referee herein.

2. Because his Honor erred in sustaining the plaintiffs' eighth exception to the report of the referee, the proof being that the defendant effected the compromise through his individual influence, and borrowed a large sum of money individually to make the compromise.

*19

3. Because the Circuit judge erred in sustaining the plaintiffs' sixteenth and nineteenth exceptions to the said report of the referee, and in recommending the twentieth exception to said referee.

Exceptions of S. S. Tompkins—

1. Because his Honor erred in sustaining plaintiffs' exception No. 10, objecting to the credit given to S. S. Tompkins in 1869, of $7,662.93, there being no evidence to impeach any of the vouchers or the validity of any of the debts paid, except the admission of the defendant, S. S. Tompkins, that the sum of $1,500 of that sum was paid by his co-executor, and properly credited to him by the referee.

2. Because his Honor erred in not considering and sustaining this defendant's second exception to the referee's report, to wit: "Because the referee erred in charging this defendant and F. A. Tompkins with the nominal value of the currency received by them for cotton instead of the value of such currency in constitutional money at the time received; and, further, because he demonetized gold in his statement of the accounts of R. A. Tompkins for cotton sold by him, though it was but the logical consequence of his mode of charging this defendant and R. A. Tompkins."

3. Because his Honor erred in not considering and sustaining the defendant's third exception to the referee's report, to wit: Because the referee erred in charging this defendant with interest after the order of Chancellor Lesesne for him to account on money received by him during and after the year in which said order was made. See Clark v. Tompkins, 1 S. C. 119.

July 12th, 1882. The opinion of the court was delivered by *McIVER, A. J. James Tompkins departed this life on May 9th, 1864, having first duly made and executed his last will and testament, whereby he appointed his two sons, the defendants, S. S. and J. W. Tompkins, executors. Owing, however, to the fact that these executors were both absent in the Confederate service, they did not qualify until September 25th, 1864, and the appraisement of the estate was not made until February 14th, 1865, a very short time before the termination of the recent war.

This action was commenced on April 25th, 1877, for the purpose of obtaining from the executors an accounting, and effecting a final settlement of the estate of the testator. The referee, to whom it was referred to take and state the accounts of the executors, as well as between the several parties, made his report, to which all parties filed exceptions, and the case came before the Circuit judge to be heard on said report and exceptions, and from his decree all parties have appealed. Without stating in detail the various grounds of appeal, we propose to consider the several questions which we understand are raised by the various grounds of appeal.

The first, and one of the most material questions in the case is, whether the executor, J. W. Tompkins, should be made liable to account for anything more of the proceeds of the sales of certain cotton belonging to the estate which had been sent to Liverpool, than the amount which actually went into his hands. It seems that the testator left, at the time of his death, on his plantation, a considerable lot of cotton, something over one hundred bales, and the executors, fearing that it would be lost or destroyed if allowed to remain there, on account of the disturbed and unsettled condition of things in this State at the close of the war, determined that it should be shipped to Augusta, Georgia, and the executor, J. W. Tompkins, superintended the removal and shipment.

Some time afterwards, it was shipped to Liverpool by the directions of the other executor, S. S. Tompkins, and sold, and the proceeds of the sale were placed to the credit of the estate on the books of Warren & Co., factors and commission merchants of Augusta. Of these proceeds, J. W. Tompkins drew, at different times, and in different amounts, sums amounting in the whole to $1,775, with which he has been charged; and the balance of the proceeds, amounting to something over $10,000, was drawn by the other executor, S. S. Tompkins; and the question is, whether J. W. Tompkins shall be charged, in his account as executor, with the whole amount, or only with the amount actually drawn by him.

It is well settled that one executor is not liable for funds which went into the hands of his co-executor, unless it is made to appear that he has paid them over to his co-executor, or has joined in the misapplication of them, or has joined in a receipt, or done some other act which enabled his co-executor to receive the funds. Atcheson v. Robertson, 3 Rich. Eq. 137 [55 Am. Dec. 634]; Gates v. Whetstone, 8 S. C. 246 [28 Am. Rep. 284], where the authorities upon this subject are collected. We see no evidence in this case of any act done by J. W. Tompkins which enabled his co-executor to receive the proceeds of the sales of the cotton. Either of the executors had the authority to order the cotton shipped and sold, and when the proceeds of the sale were placed to the credit of the estate, either of the executors had the right to draw on such proceeds, and one could not prevent the other from so doing. We are, therefore, unable to perceive any ground upon which J. W. Tompkins can be made to account for that portion of the proceeds of the sales of the cotton which was drawn by the other executor.

The next question is, whether any of the parties can be made liable to the estate for the sum of $5,500 advanced by the testator to make the cash payment on the Texas lands. In the view which we take of this matter, it is not important to determine which of the sons of testator were interested in the purchase of these lands, or in what proportions they were interested. The testator evidently supposed, when he made his will, that, whatever may have been the original scheme, or who were the parties to it, the eventual arrangement was that he was to have a one-third interest, his son, H. W. Tompkins, a third, and that the remaining third belonged jointly to his sons, Franklin A. and R. Augustus Tompkins. It turned out, however, that *no title had ever been obtained for these lands, nothing having been paid on the purchase-money, except the amount advanced by the testator to make the cash payment, and that the land was surrendered to the vendor, Smith.

Whether this would have given the testator a claim on those of his sons for whom he advanced the money, need not be considered, for any such claim was released by the express terms of the eleventh clause of the will, in which the testator, after stating that, by the preceding bequests, he had attempted to equalize the advancements previously made to his children, uses this language: "I have also included in the estimate of advancements all notes and debts due me by any of my children, which I hereby declare canceled, excepting, however, the $6,000 and the debt against Tompkins & Macmurphy in the fourth clause of this, my will, which are to be paid by my son, James L. Tompkins, as therein directed; and, also, a debt of $5,500 against my sons, Franklin A. and R. Augustus Tompkins, mentioned in the ninth clause of my will." If, therefore, any indebtedness existed on the part of any of the sons, to the testator, growing out of the advance made by him to meet the cash payment on the Texas lands, such indebtedness is expressly canceled by the terms of the eleventh clause of the will.

It is argued, however, that the indebtedness of $5,500, on the part of the two sons, Franklin A. and R. Augustus, is expressly excepted, and that they, therefore, remain liable to the estate for the same. We do not so understand it. The debt against them, which is excepted, is the debt which the testator supposed he was creating against them by the terms of the ninth clause of his will, and not the indebtedness growing out of the original transaction. Hence, we do not see how any charge can be made against any of the sons for any indebtedness which any of them may have incurred to the testator by reason of his having advanced the money for the cash payment on the Texas lands, because all such indebtedness is canceled by the express terms of the eleventh clause of the will. Nor do we see how any charge can be made against Franklin A. and R. Augustus Tompkins by reason of the debt mentioned in the ninth clause of the will, because no such debt could arise unless these two sons accepted *the devise given by the ninth clause, which, of course, they have not done, and 10 will not do, as the thing devised turns out not to be the property of the testator.

The next point made is that J. W. Tompkins, under section 415 of the code, was not competent to testify as to any transactions with the testator. This objection came too late, and, therefore, it is unnecessary to consider whether it could have been sustained, even if taken at the proper time.

Our next inquiry is, whether the claim of J. W. Tompkins against the estate for one-half of the losses resulting from the tanning business can be sustained. The facts presented in the record are not sufficient to enable us to determine this question. The original partnership between the testator and his son, J. W. Tompkins, for the purpose of carrying on the tanning business, seems to have been formed in 1863, and was dissolved in January, 1864, when a new partnership was formed, composed of the testator, his son J. W. Tompkins, and one Price.

This partnership was, of course, dissolved on May 9th, 1864, by the death of the testator, but the business was continued after that time by the survivors, the allegation being that the partnership was then under large contracts with third parties which it was bound to perform. Price subsequently transferred his interest in the partnership to the estate of the testator and the other partner, J. W. Tompkins, and retired from the concern. The business of the partnership, when finally wound up, resulted in a loss of something over $1,200, for one-half of which the surviving partner, J. W. Tompkins, claims that the estate is liable to him, he having paid the liabilities of the firm.

The partnership was dissolved on May 9th, 1864, by the death of the testator, and the rule is, that after that time the surviving partner could continue the business only so far as was necessary to settle existing demands and complete transactions begun, but unfinished, at the time of the dissolution, but no further. As is said in Gow Part. 231: "From the nature of a partnership, engagements may be contracted which cannot be fulfilled during its existence, exposed, as it is, to sudden and arbitrary terminations; and the consequence, therefore, must be, that, for the purpose of making good outstanding engagements, *of taking and settling all the accounts, and converting all the property, means and assets of the partnership, existing at the time of the dissolution, as beneficially as may be for the benefit of all who were partners, according to their respective shares and proportions, the legal interest subsists, although, for all other purposes, the partnership is actually determined.

In this case it does not appear how the losses were incurred, whether in fulfilling contracts existing at the time of the dissolution, and in a legitimate effort, to wind up the affairs of the partnership, or whether they were the result of new business undertaken after the dissolution. There must, therefore, be an inquiry as to this point, and so much of the losses as are properly traceable to the effort to fulfill contracts existing at the time of the dissolution, and which the partnership was bound to perform, or to expenses incurred in a legitimate effort to wind up the affairs of the partnership, will constitute a legitimate partnership debt, and the estate will be chargeable with its proper proportion thereof. But so far as such losses resulted from any new business undertaken after the dissolution, they are not chargeable to the estate of the testator.

There seems to have been one item charged twice by the referee against the estate of the testator, viz.: The amount ($72) claimed to have been paid by J. W. Tompkins for one month's board of six hands, inasmuch as it appears in the general tan-yard account, and is also made a separate charge against the estate. This, also, will be inquired into and rectified if it has, in fact, been twice charged.

The next point is as to the mercantile account claimed by J. W. Tompkins as a charge against the estate. The correctness of this charge depended largely upon a question of fact, and we see no reason for interfering with the conclusion of the referee, concurred in by the Circuit judge, except as to the matter of scaling this account. It does not necessarily follow, that a contract should be scaled because it was made during the war. The question is, whether the contract was made with reference to Confederate States' notes as a basis of value, and, until that is made to appear, there is no ground for applying the scale fixed by the act. We see no evidence in this case that this *account was contracted with reference to Confederate States' notes as a basis of value, and, on the contrary, the inference would be, from the prices charged for many of the articles, that it was not.

It is urged, however, that interest on this account should not have been allowed. There is no exception raising this distinct point, and it is not, therefore, properly before us. We may say, though, that while it is true that open accounts do not bear interest, yet sometimes equity allows interest upon demands, as to which interest is not recoverable at law, upon the principle that it would be inequitable to withhold it. Pettus v. Clawson, 4 Rich. Eq. 103. We can, then, very well understand why the referee and the Circuit judge should have thought that it was but just and equitable to allow it in this instance, inasmuch as interest had been charged upon the accounts of the executors with the estate, as well as upon the accounts between the several parties.

As to the claim for overseers' wages, we see no reason for interfering with the finding of fact by the referee concurred in by the Circuit judge.

The next question is, whether the executors should have been charged with the Confederate bonds and Confederate treasury notes on hand at the death of the testator. It will be observed that these assets were not money in the legal sense of the term, and should, therefore, be treated as any other personal property. It must also be remembered that, owing to the condition of things existing at the time of the testator's death, the currency of the war, and the absence of the executors in the Confederate service, together with the disturbed and unsettled condition of things generally, these assets did not come into the hands of the executors until a very short time before the end of the war, when they lost what little value they may have previously had. It seems to us, therefore, that if these assets became valueless in the hands of the executors without any fault upon their part, and without some evidence that they were used, or could have been used, for the benefit of the estate, the executors should not be charged with them.

As has been said, they did not come into the hands of the *executors until a very short time before the war terminated, and there is no evidence that, within that short time, they could have been used in payment of debts of the estate, or otherwise made available. Indeed, in the condition in which the country then was, it is not at all likely that they could have been so used; and even if they had possessed the legal attributes of money, it would, perhaps, have been hazardous for the executors to have appropriated such money to the payment of any particular debt, when the estate seemed inevitably doomed to insolvency, before they had taken time to look around and ascertain the rank and amount of the heavy debts due by the estate.

It is urged, however, that, at least, the claims now presented by the executor, J. W. Tompkins, should have been extinguished by the Confederate treasury notes on hand. But these assets went into the hands of the other executor, and he certainly would not have been justified in applying them to simple contract claims of his co-executor, when he knew that there were very heavy outstanding specialty claims against the estate, with every prospect that the assets of the estate would prove insufficient for the payment of its debts. We see no ground, therefore, for charging the executors, or either of them, with the Confederate bonds or notes left by the testator, especially when the executor who was principally active in the management of the estate, and who, according to the testimony, was possessed to the fullest extent of the testator's confidence, testifies that he understood that these assets were investments made by his father, of the funds of his wards, and did not really belong to the estate.

Our next inquiry is, whether the estate should be held liable to J. W. Tompkins for the amount furnished by him to the testator to take up the note of Tompkins & Macmurphy to the bank of Hamburg. It seems that the testator and J. W. Tompkins were the sureties of Tompkins & Macmurphy on a note to the bank of Hamburg, and that, a short time before his death, the testator took up this note, using for that purpose some money belonging to J. W. Tompkins, not amounting, however, to one-half of the sum paid on the note. How this could give J. W. Tompkins any claim against the estate of the testator, we are at a loss to conceive. He and the testator were *both liable to the holder of the note for the full amount of it, and, as between themselves, each was liable for one-half, and unless J. W. Tompkins furnished more than one-half of the amount used in taking up the note, he could have no claim against the estate of the testator.

It is contended, however, that inasmuch as the testator, by his will, undertook to dispose of the note, the transaction must be regarded as a loan by J. W. Tompkins to the testator of the amount advanced by him, and, therefore, that the estate is liable to refund to J. W. Tompkins the amount borrowed from him. It is true that the testator does undertake, by his will, to give to his son, J. L. Tompkins, one of the firm of Tompkins & Macmurphy, the note in question, but the bequest is upon the condition "that he account or pay to my estate for the sum paid by me and interest, in fair cotton, at seventy-five cents per pound." This gave to J. L. Tompkins the right of election, and, as he has not and, we are given to understand, will not accept the bequest upon that condition, it necessarily fails, and the matter stands as if no such bequest had been made, and leaves the transaction as it originally stood, by which the testator was entitled to a claim against Tompkins & Macmurphy for the amount paid by him as their surety, and J. W. Tompkins was entitled to a similar claim against Tompkins & Macmurphy for the amount advanced by him for the purpose of taking up the note.

The next question to be considered is, whether the executors should be held liable for the uncollected notes and accounts due the testator at the time of his death. These assets were produced or accounted for by receipts of attorneys with whom they had been lodged for collection, and the evidence on the part of the executors is, that they tried to collect them, but were unable to do so. There is no evidence that any one of them could, by proper diligence, have been collected; and, in the absence of such evidence, and under all the circumstances surrounding this case, the condition of the country, and the disasters resulting from the war, we do not see any sufficient ground to warrant the conclusion that these uncollected assets should be charged against the executors. As was held in Pettus v. Clawson, 4 Rich. Eq.

*92, before an administrator should be charged with notes marked by the appraisers on the inventory as good, there should be some proof of their collection or of negligence in collecting; and the same doctrine would apply to executors. To have required proof that the debtors had been sued to insolvency, or to have taken up each one and offered evidence as to his insolvency, would have involved an expense to the estate, which, in our judgment, would not have been justified.

The next question is as to the credits allowed for the payment of the judgment in favor of Jennings, Smith & Co. We see no error in the conclusion reached by the Circuit judge in reference to this matter. Even though there may have been technical informalities in the judgment, yet there is no evidence that the debt on which the judgment was recovered was not a valid claim against the estate, which has been extinguished by the executors, and they, therefore, should have credit for the amount paid by them. There does, however, seem to have been a mistake in crediting $1,500 of this amount to the executor, S. S. Tompkins, which he admits to be an error; and the Circuit judge has fallen into an error in sustaining plaintiffs' tenth exception to the referee's report in toto, while it should have been sustained only as to the $1,500 erroneously credited to S. S. Tompkins, there being no evidence assailing any of the other credits allowed.

The next question is as to the mode of stating the accounts of the executors, it being alleged, in their behalf, that the referee erred in not deducting the payments made in each year before striking a balance to bear interest. The position taken by the executors is correct, and is fully sustained by the case of Pettus v. Clawson, 4 Rich. Eq. 92.

Our next inquiry is, whether there was any error in ascertaining the amounts chargeable to R. A. Tompkins and F. A. Tompkins on account of cotton received by them from the estate in 1865. R. A. Tompkins received two bales of cotton on July 24th, 1865, and sold them for $215.16, in gold; and F. A. Tompkins received two bales on November 24th, 1865, which he sold for $443.90, in currency. In adjusting the accounts of the several parties, the referee converted the amount, for which *R. A. Tompkins sold his two bales, into currency, by adding thereto the premium on gold, thus ascertaining the amounts chargeable to these parties by the same standard of value. In this we see no error. The other transactions between the parties, and the dealings of the executors with the estate, since the termination of the war, were, doubtless, made in currency, and not in gold: and, hence, it seems to us fair and equitable that the amounts with which R. A. Tompkins and F. A. Tompkins were chargeable for this cotton should be ascertained by the same standard of value.

Next, it is contended by the executors that they should not be charged with interest after the order of Chancellor Lesesne was made, in the case of Clark v. Tompkins, 1 S. C. 119, requiring them to account. If it had been made to appear that the executors had collected in the assets of the estate, and retained the same in their hands unemployed to meet any balance that might be ascertained on the accounting ordered, there would have been good ground to claim an exemption from liability for interest; but as this has not been made to appear, we do not see any ground upon which the position taken by the executors can be sustained.

The next question is, whether the executors were entitled to commissions after 1866, when they ceased to make annual returns to the ordinary. There is no doubt but that, by the terms of the act of 1789 (5 Stat. 112), an executor forfeited his right to commissions by a failure to make the returns required by that act (Lay v. Lay, 10 S. C. 208); but we have always understood the rule to be, that, when an executor or administrator is required to account before the Court of Equity, it was no longer necessary for him to make returns to the ordinary, inasmuch as a court of superior jurisdiction had assumed the duty of taking the account.

In this case it appears that these executors were required to account before the Court of Equity by an order passed in the case of Clark v. Tompkins, 1 S. C. 119, which case seems to have been heard in June, 1867, and although it does not distinctly appear when the bill was filed, it must, necessarily, have been in the latter part of 1866 or early in the year 1867. This, we think, rendered it unnecessary for the executors to make annual returns to the ordinary after that time, and their failure to do so should not deprive them of their right to commissions. In addition to this, the act of 1789 was repealed on February 10th, 1872, by the adoption of the General Statutes, and the provision inserted therein, in lieu of the act of 1789, contains no clause by which an executor or administrator loses his right to commissions by a failure to make annual returns; and, therefore, in any event, the executors would be entitled to commissions since 1872. Davidson v. Moore, 14 S. C. 266.

In regard to the commissions allowed by the referee on the proceeds of the sale of the White House place, the Circuit judge seems to have fallen into an error of fact in saying that no money passed through the hands of the executor, for, as we understand the testimony, the proceeds of the sale did, practically, pass through the hands of the executor. We think, therefore, that the Circuit judge erred in sustaining the exception relating to this matter.

The only remaining error alleged is the omission to charge the assignees of H. W. Tompkins with the amount of an account due by him to James Tompkins & Son. This matter seems to have been overlooked, both by the referee and the Circuit judge. From the testimony before us, this seems to be a proper charge against the assignees, and the accounts should be rectified accordingly.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be modified so as to conform to the principles herein announced, and that the case be remanded to that court for such further proceedings as may be necessary to carry into effect the views herein presented.

*HOLMES &amp; DURHAM v. NATIONAL BANK OF WILMINGTON.

(April Term, 1882.)

[1. Banks and Banking ⇨ 234, 275.]

Action for breach of contract may be brought in the courts of this State against a national bank established in another State.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Banks and Banking, Cent. Dig. § 1061; Dec. Dig. ⇨ 234, 275.]

[2. Banks and Banking ⇨ 278.]

There is nothing in the acts of Congress, relating to these banks, that prevents an attachment from issuing in such action before judgment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Banks and Banking, Cent. Dig. § 1068; Dec. Dig. ⇨ 278.]

[This case is also cited in Central R. & Banking Co. v. Georgia Const. & Investment Co., 32 S. C. 344, 11 S. E. 192, without specific application.]

Before Mackey, J., Charleston, April, 1881.

This was an action by Holmes & Durham against the First National Bank of Wilmington, in the State of North Carolina, commenced in October, 1879. The opinion states the case. The order of the Circuit judge was as follows:

National banking associations are the creatures of Congress, and are fiscal agents of the government. Bank of Bethel v. Pahquioque Bank, 14 Wall. 383 [20 L. Ed. 840]. They have such powers only as Congress thought proper to give to them, and are subject to such liabilities only as the national government has chosen to impose upon them. Osborn v. Bank, 9 Wheat. 738 [6 L. Ed. 204]; Commercial Bank of Cleveland v. Simmons, 10 Alb. L. J. 155 [Fed. Cas. No. 3,062]. The evident intent of the acts creating them is to free them as much as possible from any embarrassment in the fulfilment of their functions. They have full power to contract as bodies corporate, and any contract may be enforced against them as well in the Circuit and District Courts of the United States as in the State, county and municipal courts, provided the action, suit or proceeding is brought in the place in which they are located.

The motive of this restriction is evident. If a national bank can be compelled to answer suit in a locality other than its place of business, absence of its officers, removal and detention of its books may be enforced, and its business operations, and, consequently, its utility, as one of the financial agents of the government, may be greatly hampered, if not entirely suspended. This construction of the act of Congress is sustained by courts

*in this country of the highest rank and of unquestionable authority. Crocker v. Marine National Bank, 101 Mass. 240; Chesapeake Bank v. First National Bank, 40 Md. 269; Cadle v. Tracy, 11 Blatchf. 101 [Fed. Cas. No. 2,279]. The first ground of demurrer is sustained.

The second ground of demurrer is in the terms of the act of Congress, and it is also sustained. Revised Statutes, § 5242 [U. S. Comp. St. 1913, § 9834].

This case came up to be heard on demurrer to the complaint. After argument of counsel thereon and consideration thereof, it is ordered, adjudged and decreed that the demurrer be sustained, and the complaint be dismissed.

From this order the plaintiffs appealed upon exceptions raising the precise points decided by this court.

Mr. T. M. Mordecai, for appellant.

Messrs. Simonton & Barker, contra.

August 1st, 1882. The opinion of the court was delivered by SIMPSON, C. J. The defendant, a national banking association in Wilmington, N. C., created under an act of Congress, has been made a party in this action by attachment of its funds in the hands of a national bank located in Charleston. The action proper is an action for an alleged breach of warranty in the sale of certain chattels and personality by the defendant to the plaintiffs, and the attachment is an incident thereto.

The defendant demurred to the action upon two grounds: 1. That the court was without jurisdiction over the defendant, for, that, under the act of Congress, it is liable only to suits and actions and proceedings brought against it in the State, county or city in which it is located, to wit, in the State of North Carolina, county of Brunswick and city of Wilmington, and nowhere else. 2. That it cannot be proceeded against by attachment, because, under the acts of Congress no attachment can issue against such corporations before final judgment in any suit, action or proceeding in any State, county or municipal court. Both of these grounds were sustained by the Circuit *judge, who dismissed the complaint. The appeal involves the consideration of these grounds of demurrer.

It is conceded that if the defendant was an ordinary foreign corporation, that the objections made to the action could not be sustained. It is, however, contended that the defendant is a corporation created by act of Congress, and being, in some degree, a financial agent of the United States, that its powers, duties and liabilities are dependent upon the acts which gave it existence, and, under these acts, it cannot be sued except in the State where it is located. In view of this position, the first inquiry to be made is, what provisions have been made on this subject by Congress in the acts creating such associations.

The first act on the subject of national banks is the act of June 3d, 1864, styled "an act to provide a national currency, secured by a pledge of United States bonds, and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof." 13 Stat. at L. 99. In section 8 of this act, it was enacted that any association formed under this act shall, from the date of its organization, be a body corporate, having power to adopt a corporate seal, to make contracts, sue and be sued, complain and defend, in any court of law and equity, as freely as natural persons.

Section 52 of this act provides "that all transfers of the notes, bonds, bills of exchange and other evidences of debt owing to any association, or of deposit to its credit; all assignments of mortgages, sureties, or real estate, or of judgments, or decrees in its favor; all deposits of money, bullion or other valuable things for its use, or for the use of any of its shareholders or creditors, and all payments of money to either, made after the commission of an act of insolvency, or in contemplation thereof, with a view to prevent the application of its assets in the manner prescribed by this act, or with a view to the preference of one creditor to another, except in payment of its circulating notes, shall be utterly null and void." Section 57 provides "that suits, actions and proceedings against associations under this act, may be had in any circuit, district or territorial court of the United States held within the district in which such association may be established, or in any State, county or municip-pal court *in the county or city in which said association is located, having jurisdiction in similar cases."

On March 3d, 1873, this act was amended, and especially section 57 above, by adding thereto the following proviso: "And provided further, that no attachment, injunction or execution shall be issued against such association or its property before final judgment in any such suit, action or proceeding in any State, county or municipal court." 17 Stat. at L. 603 [U. S. Comp. St. 1913, § 6537].

On June 27th, 1866, Congress passed an act to provide for the revision and consolidation of the statute laws of the United States, 14 Stat. at L. 74. The commission appointed under this act, having reported, an act was passed December 1st, 1873, in conformity thereto, known as the Revised Statutes of the United States. In this general act, section 57 of the act of 1869, as amended by section 3 of the act of 1873 was left out as a whole, and section 3 was added to section 52, and made section 5242 of the Revised Statutes. Section 5596 of the Revised Statutes [U. S. Comp. St. 1913, § 10593] repealed all parts of acts not contained in said revision, and made the sections of the revision applicable thereto, to stand in the place of such repealed provisions. In 1875, an act was passed (18 Stat. at L. 320) correcting errors in the Revised Statutes, by which act section 57 of the act of 1864, left out in the previous consolidation, was restored and made a part of section 5198 [U. S. Comp. St. 1913, § 9759] which is now as follows: "That suits, actions and proceedings against any association under this title may be had in any circuit, district or territorial court of the United States held within the district within which such association may be established, or in any State, county or municipal court in the county or city in which said association is located, having jurisdiction in similar cases."

Thus it will be seen that when this action began, section 5198 above, and the proviso to section 57 of the act of 1864 inhibiting attachment before judgment, were of force, the substance of which, for a proper understanding of the question involved, will now be repeated. Section 5198 provides that these associations may be sued in any circuit, district or territorial court of the United States held within the district where the association is established, or in any State, county or municipal court in the *county or city where it may be located, having jurisdiction in similar cases. And section 5242, which is the section rendering transfers of notes * * * in contemplation of insolvency * * * void by proviso attached thereto, inhibits attachments against these associations before judgment.

Now, the question is, whether, with these two provisions of force, this suit can be maintained in a State court not in the State where the bank is located. This will depend upon the construction which must be given to these two provisions. And, first, was it the intent of section 5198 to confer exclusive jurisdiction upon the courts therein named? and, secondly, does the proviso to section 5242 apply to all suits, or only to such suits as might arise in consequence of the attempted transfers of notes * * * made in contemplation of insolvency, which are inhibited in that section, and to which section this proviso is attached?

The eighth section of the act declares that every banking association formed and organized in pursuance thereof, shall be a body corporate, possessed with the usual powers of corporations, to wit, to make contracts, to sue and be sued in any court of law and equity, as a natural person. If the act had stopped at this section, the question presented here could hardly have arisen, as, doubtless, the jurisdiction of the State courts would have been universally conceded when the action was properly brought in accordance with State laws. Did the subsequent section of the original act, section 57, now section 5198 of the Revised Statutes, conflict with section 8? It certainly did not in express terms. It is true that jurisdiction is conferred on the courts therein named, but not in language which expressly makes that jurisdiction exclusive. The language employed is, that suits, actions and proceedings against such associations may be had in said courts. The word "may" is a permissive word, not mandatory and not necessarily exclusive.

There being no express negation, then, of jurisdiction to the State courts generally, the next question is, has jurisdiction been taken away by implication? It has been held in some courts that the jurisdiction of a State court cannot be taken away by implication. Teall v. Felton, 1 N. Y. 537; S. C., 2 Hill N. Y. 164; 26 Wend. 192. The subject-matter involved in this action *is an ordinary common law matter—breach of contract. The Circuit Court certainly had jurisdiction of this. The defendant is an artificial being, invested with the rights and privileges, and subject to the liabilities of a natural person, and, ordinarily, should stand before the courts as to jurisdiction over its person as other individuals occupying the same position. Our laws have made provision for making such beings parties to actions under certain conditions where their rights are involved, or their obligations are to be enforced, and in the absence of all express exclusion of jurisdiction by the acts of Congress creating them, the implication should be very strong to divest the State courts of their usual functions in such cases. It should be a necessary implication.

The argument is, that the enumeration of certain courts in the act was wholly useless, unless a restriction was intended; that these courts would have had jurisdiction without this special grant in common with other courts, and, therefore, the only purpose of conferring it expressly must have been to confer it exclusively. This argument has much force, but it is not conclusive. The implication arising from it does not appear to be of that strong controlling character sufficient to paralyze the arm of the State courts, and to render these associations free from State control, enabling them to delay and defraud creditors, and, as was said by Church, C. J., "involving an amount of expense and injustice which we cannot attribute to the intention of the law-making power."

The decisions in other States are not uniform on this question. The two most prominent cases in which the question has been discussed, are the cases of Crocker et al. v. Marine National Bank of the City of New York, 101 Mass. 240 [3 Am. Rep. 336], and the case of Cooke v. State National Bank of Boston, 52 N. Y. 97 [11 Am. Rep. 667]. These cases reached directly opposite conclusions; Gray, J., in Massachusetts, holding that, by force of the act of Congress, such associations could be sued only in the county or city where the association was established, and Church, C. J., in New York, that an intent to take away jurisdiction from the State courts should not be deduced from the doubtful and ambiguous language employed in the act of Congress. The question has never *been made squarely in the Supreme Court of the United States. The nearest approach to it was in the case of Casey v. Adams, 12 Otto 66 [26 L. Ed. 52], but the decision there is not strictly in point, and the respondent's counsel admits frankly that the decisions in the other States are in conflict.

In the absence of any case in our own courts, of direct decisions in the Supreme Court of the United States, and in the conflict between the cases in the courts of the States, the respondent, falling back upon general principles, takes the position that these associations are financial agents of the government, established by act of Congress for that purpose; that, as such, they are exempt from all control of the State authorities, except so far as may be permitted by Congress. He refers to Van Allen v. The Assessors, 3 Wall. 589 [18 L. Ed. 229], in which Chase, C. J., the author of the system, discussed fully the character of these banks and the purpose of their creation.

No doubt they were intended as financial agents of the government, and, being created by act of Congress, they should be entirely free from the legislation of the States; that is, the States could not add to or diminish their powers and duties by adverse legislation or cripple them in any way in the exercise of their legitimate functions; but it does not follow that they are to be regarded as wholly exempt in every respect from responsibility to State laws. This would be giving them a much higher position than any other citizen of the United States. This is not necessary to their usefulness or value as financial agents of the government, and they are not entitled to that position. They have power to contract in the several States, to sue in the State courts, and there can be no reason why they should be exempt from State process when they breach their contracts. There should be reciprocity. In our opinion, the demurrer upon the first ground should have been overruled.

The proviso to section 5242 prohibiting attachment proceedings against these associations before judgment rendered, we think, applies to the suits arising out of the matters referred to in that section. The purpose of this proviso being to prevent discrimination between creditors in cases of insolvency or bankruptcy, and this not being a case arising under that section, there *was no foundation for the demurrer on that ground. Robinson v. National Bank, 81 N. Y. 392 [37 Am. Rep. 508]. The question of the power of Congress to strip the State courts of jurisdiction in such cases, involving, as in this case, simply a common law cause of action, is not necessarily involved, and, therefore, we have not considered it.

*38

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed and the case be remanded for a new trial.

5. In re Fifty-four First Mortgage Bonds, 15 S. C. 304, qualified by McGowan, A. J.

Before Fraser, J., Richland, December, 1881.

Petition by E. B. Benson & Co. in re Gibbes v. Greenville and Columbia Railroad Company, and the State, ex relatione the Attorney-General, v. same. The petition was based upon a contract made by letter, and which is fully stated in the opinion.

*39

*The Circuit decree, after a statement of the facts repeated in the opinion, was as follows:

Under orders, in such cases, receivers are sometimes allowed to do certain specific acts; but, in this case, there is no limit, except, as I construe the order, that which is furnished by a wise discretion, subject to the order of this court. No unlimited power was ever claimed, and none was conferred by the order. I take it that every contract was made subject to the supervision of the court, and that no wrong is done even at this late day, if the approval of the court is withheld from a contract which has in it no substantial merit. The authority in High Rec. 392, and Jones Railr. Sec., § 498, rest on the same case, and I find no other for allowing a payment of rebates in a receiver's account. It is an unfair discrimination amongst shippers, and I do not think proper, especially when made by an appointee of the court. I cannot concur in the opinion expressed by the witness that such contracts are necessary. The interest of a great common carrier, like a railroad company, is best subserved by fair and equal rates of freight, which are open to all. The question is a new one in this State, and I am not willing, in this case, under a loose construction of Judge Melton's order, to give the approval of the court to a contract which I think is against public policy, and could not have been of any real benefit to the property under the control of the court, and has no equity. The exceptions are, therefore, sustained, and it is, therefore, ordered and adjudged, that the petition be dismissed with costs.

The exceptions of petitioners raise the questions of the validity of the contract and the right to payment out of the receiver's fund.

Messrs. J. S. Muller, J. T. Sloan, for appellants.

Mr. James Conner, contra; cited 90 U. S. 252; 52 N. H. 448; 62 Pa. 230; 7 Vr. 407.

August 8th, 1882. The opinion of the court was delivered by *Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. The appellants, Benson & Co., filed a petition in the court below in re the above stated causes, praying payment of a certain claim for $608 as rebate freight on six hundred and sixty-eight bales of cotton shipped over the Greenville and Columbia railroad by the petitioners, from Anderson Court House, during the cotton season of 1877-78. This claim was founded upon an alleged contract between the petitioners and the president and directors of said railroad company acting as receivers under the order of June 18th, 1872, known as Judge Melton's order, and the petition prayed payment out of the "receivers' fund." The contract relied on by the petitioners is not denied, nor is it denied that the petitioners have fully performed their part thereof.

The contract is fully set out in the petition. In substance, it is as follows: The petitioners were engaged in buying cotton. They purchased largely in Hartwell, Georgia, and, with the view to induce them to ship their cotton, bought at that place, over the Greenville railroad instead of down the Savannah river, Thomas Dodamead, the then superintendent of the said road, proposed that if they would ship all cotton purchased during the season of 1877-78, in Hartwell, by way of Anderson, S. C., over said road to Charleston or Augusta, they, the said president and directors, would transport said cotton at the regular rates, the freight to be paid at the regular rates by the consignees, with the understanding, however, that the petitioners should have refunded to them, at the close of the season, the sum of one dollar per bale so shipped to either point above mentioned.

This proposition was accepted by the petitioners, and a contract made accordingly, and, as has been stated, was acted upon by petitioners to the extent of shipping the six hundred and sixty-eight bales mentioned above over the road during the cotton season specified. At the end of the season, the agent at Anderson, C. H., made out a statement of the number of bales shipped under the contract with Mr. Dodamead, the superintendent, with vouchers for the amount due, who approved the same in regular form for payment and forwarded it to the treasurer's office to be placed to the credit of Benson &

Co. The claim, *however, was not paid, because, as Mr. Dodamead says: "The funds on hand were not sufficient, every available dollar being used to pay interest on debt of road instead of being applied to current expenses."

Mr. Dodamead further testified in this connection, that such a debt as this one, to wit, rebate on interchange of freights, should have a preference to all other debts, as they are essential to the successful competition of railroads over freights. He said that they were competing with the Savannah river transportation, and the benefit of this particular transaction to the business of the road was, that it brought cotton to the road which would not have otherwise come; besides that, the persons who hauled their cotton, also bought their supplies there, and the road got the benefit, not only of the freight in the cotton down, but also on the return supplies.

In the latter part of the year 1878, the railroad property passed out of the hands of the president and directors, heretofore receivers, into the possession of a second receiver appointed under an order of Judge Pressley, made to that end, and, the claim of the petitioners still remaining unpaid and refused, this petition was filed on November 2d, 1881. At the December Term of the court for Richland county, the master to whom the petition had been referred to take testimony touching the claim, and to report thereon to the court, submitted his report, embracing the facts herein above stated, with a recommendation that the claim be allowed, and paid out of the fund known as the "receiver's fund."

At the hearing below, Judge Fraser, upon exceptions to the master's report, dismissed the petition with costs, holding, substantially, that the contract was without equity, was against public policy, could not have been for the real benefit of the company, was an unfair discrimination between shippers, and was not proper, especially when made by an appointee of the court. From this decree of Judge Fraser, the petitioners have appealed, and the appeal, though founded upon several exceptions, really brings up but a single question, to wit: Are the petitioners entitled to payment out of the receiver's fund in priority to mortgage bondholders?

*It is admitted that this contract was made prior to the act of 1878 (16 Stat. 784), regulating the matter of freights and charges on railroads and preventing rebates. It will be also conceded that there is nothing in the charter of this company which forbade such a contract. In the absence of statutory regulations then controlling the action of the company, it being a common carrier, we must look to the common law for the principles which are to govern in such a case.

What does the common law say as to questions like this? The leading principle of the common law, as applicable to common carriers, is that they are bound to carry for all, and for a reasonable remuneration from each. In Johnson v. Pensacola and Perdido Railroad Co., 16 Fla. 623, Mr. Justice Westcott, in discussing a similar question to the one involved here, has collected many authorities bearing upon this point, and the conclusion which he reaches is: "That as against a common or public carrier, every person has the same right; that in all cases where his common duty controls, he cannot refuse A, and accommodate B.; that all the entire public have the right to the same carriage for a reasonable price at a reasonable charge for the service performed, and the commonness of the duty to carry for all does not involve a commonness or equality of compensation or charge; that all the shipper can ask of a common carrier is, that for services performed, he shall charge no more than a reasonable sum to him."

This conclusion is sustained by numerous authorities, both English and American. Peek v. North Staffordshire Railroad Company, 10 H. L. 511; Bastard v. Bastard, 2 Show. 82; Harris v. Packard, 3 Taunt. 264; Citizens' Bank v. The Nantucket Steamboat Company, 2 Story 35 [Fed. Cas. No. 2,730]; [Chicago B. & Q. R. Co. v. Iowa] 4 Otto 155 [24 L. Ed. 94]; 1 Chitty Cont. 684. In Fitchburg Railroad Company v. Gage, 12 Gray 393, the Supreme Court of Massachusetts held that a "railroad corporation is not obliged, as a common carrier, to transport goods and merchandise for all persons at the same rate," the common law rule being that equal justice shall be done to all parties. "But the equality which is to be observed in relation to the public and to every individual consists in the restricted right to charge in each particular case of service a reasonable *compensation and no more." If the carrier confines himself to this, no wrong can be done, and no cause afforded for complaint.

In the eighth edition of Story Bailm., § 508, it is stated that "at common law, a common carrier of goods is not under obligation to treat all customers equally. He is bound to accept and carry for all, upon being paid a reasonable compensation. But the fact that he charges less for one than for another is only evidence to show that a particular charge is unreasonable, nothing more. There is nothing in the common law to hinder a common carrier from carrying for favored individuals at an unreasonably low rate, or even for gratis."

As extracted from these authorities, and many others which might be cited, the extent of the common law rule seems to be, not that carriers shall transport for all parties at the same rate of compensation, otherwise their contracts are illegal and void, but that they shall transport at reasonable rates to all. A difference in charge does not per se invalidate the contract as inequitable and against public policy; but to have this effect, there must be an element of unreasonableness in the charge itself, as applied to the services rendered, between the parties to the contract and without comparison to the charges against others.

Independent of statutes and provisions in their charters restricting corporations within certain limits, they stand in the community as other individuals invested with the power to contract and be contracted with, and the validity of their contracts depends upon the same principles which govern in contracts between natural persons. It is too vague to say, in general terms, that the contract is inequitable and against public policy, and, therefore, not enforceable. To be void on such grounds, it must run counter to some known principle of equity or contravene some well-established doctrine of public policy forbidding it.

We do not know that this contract was obnoxious to any of these objections; nor, in the face of the testimony of the experienced superintendent who gave it, can we say that it was unnecessary. The cotton which he brought to the head of his road at Anderson, C. H., was grown in the State of Georgia, at a distance from Anderson. The Savannah River, running between Anderson and Hartwell, was its natural outlet to market, and, no doubt, afforded cheaper transportation. With these obstacles in the way, it required some inducement to be held out so as to bring this cotton to the Greenville road. And so long as the charges against others were not unreasonable, and in no way increased by the rebate offered to it, what ground is there for the courts to interfere? It is the province of the court to enforce contracts, not to destroy them.

But the main question in the case is, should this claim be paid out of the "receiver's fund." In the present unsettled state of the law as to what expenses may be properly chargeable to income in the hands of a receiver operating a railroad or other enterprise taken possession of by the court at the instance of mortgage creditors it is difficult to lay down any inflexible rule by which every claim may be tested and determined. In the early history of such cases, these charges were at first confined to such expenses as were necessary to the preservation of the property. But the doctrine has been progressive, gradually enlarging until now many items of expense which, at first, would have been excluded, would be allowed, and justly so. If creditors, through the aid of the courts, will oust corporations of their property, take possession and operate the enterprise preparatory to an ultimate sale, through their agents, and for their own benefit, all the necessary and incidental expenses should certainly be paid, and the doubt in my mind is, not whether they should be chargeable to the earnings alone, but whether the corpus also should not be liable.

But to recur: What character of expenses will be allowed? It is said in Jones Railr. Sec., § 498, "That all outlays of a receiver of a railroad, made in good faith, in the ordinary course of the management and operation of it, or so made with the view to advance and promote the business of the road and make it profitable and successful, are fairly within the limit of discretion necessarily allowed him. Thus," he continues,

"payments made by him as rebatement of freights to shippers in order to secure custom and increase the business of the road, being in the nature of drawbacks, such as are usual with transportation companies, are properly within his discretion," referring to Cowdrey v. Railroad Company, 1 Woods 331 [Fed. Cas. No. 3,293].

In High Rec., we find the following (section 392): "The duties of the receiver of a railway entrusted with the management and operation of the road, being very different from, and far more responsible than those of a passive receiver, appointed merely to collect and hold money, a somewhat wider discretion is allowed him in the matter of expenditures necessary to operate the road. And it may be said in general, that all outlays made by him, in good faith, in the ordinary course of the business of the road, with the view to advance and promote its interests, and to render it profitable and successful, may be allowed in passing his accounts; such outlays may include, not only keeping the road and its buildings and rolling stock in repair, but also procuring such additional accommodations and stock as the necessities of the business may demand, always referring to the court or master for advice when any considerable outlay is required. Thus, the charge for rebate on freights for horses and wagons, for the delivery of freight, for drayages and wharfage, for office room, for advertising the accommodations of the road, and for interest paid a bank for loans of money, have been allowed."

It is true these authorities are not, in themselves, binding upon this court, but they come from distinguished text writers, and are worthy of consideration, especially as the principles announced are founded in good sense, and rest upon high equity. At all events, as was said by Mr. Justice Bradley, in the case of Cowdrey v. The Railroad Company, supra, "Whatever objection to these rebatements might be made by the State, or by the planters and others who did not obtain like favorable terms, it does not lie in the mouths of the creditors, who reap positive benefits from the arrangements, to complain of it." And especially in this remark pertinent in this case, when it is remembered that the receivers here were appointed at the instance of the creditors under an order which invested them with almost unlimited power and authority, the exercise of which, in its widest range, they stood by and permitted, without objection or protest, for a period of five or six years.

In the case of Ex parte Brown & Wife, 15

S. C. 532, this *court held that the order of June 18th, 1872, not only constituted the president and directors receivers in the general sense, but conferred upon them "sweeping powers to conduct and carry on the business of the company." In the Fifty-four Bond Case, 15 S. C. 304, pronounced before Ex parte Brown, the same construction was given to this order. The authority of High and Jones may not be controlling, but the two cases referred to above are from this court, and we cannot disregard them. The principles held in those cases, and under which the claims set up therein were allowed, vindicate fully the claim of the petitioners here, both in point of authority and in the substantial justice which underlies it. We think the Circuit judge was in error in dismissing the petition.

It is the judgment of this court that the Circuit decree be reversed and that the case be remanded, so that the amount found due by the master may be decreed to the petitioners to be paid out of the "receiver's fund."

Mr. Justice MCGOWAN. I concur in the result; but as the reference to the Fifty-four Bond Case, may be construed as approving all that is there said, I think it proper, in order to prevent confusion hereafter, to say that I do not agree with some things said in that opinion, especially the statement that "large discretion is allowed him (the receiver) in the financial manipulation of the assets." In my view, a receiver is not the agent of the company so as to bind it by his contracts, but simply the officer of the court. His new administration is separate and distinct from that of the company, and, without the express orders of the court, he has no right to touch the general finances of the company, but is limited to the income which arises from operating the road while under his control.

Judgment reversed.

18 S. C. *47

*PEARSON v. CARLTON.

SAME v. FOWLER.

(April Term, 1882.)

An intestate died in March, 1862. In July, a bill was filed for partition of his lands, and, by order passed in September, the widow was allotted one-third of the land, and the remainder was ordered to be sold; and the sale was made in October. An infant heir, A., was not a party to the proceedings; an heir, B., who had been made a party, died in August intestate and unmarried; and a child, C., was born to the first intestate after the sale. The purchase-money was paid and became worthless before distribution. Held—

[1. Partition ⇨95.]

That A. was not bound by any of these proceedings, and was, therefore, here entitled to have partition of the lands purchased so as to obtain his share thereof as a distributee of the intestate, and also as a distributee of B.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partition, Cent. Dig. § 314; Dec. Dig. ⇨95.]

[2. Dower ⇨112.]

That the allotment to the widow was not binding upon A. as a distributee of the intestate and of B.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Dower, Cent. Dig. §§ 235, 317, 318; Dec. Dig. ⇨112.]

[3. Tenancy in Common ⇨28.]

That the purchaser must account to A. for his share of the rents and profits.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Tenancy in Common, Cent. Dig. § 77; Dec. Dig. ⇨28.]

[4. Descent and Distribution ⇨27.]

That C. was entitled to the same rights as A.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Descent and Distribution, Cent. Dig. § 78; Dec. Dig. ⇨27.]

[5. Partition ⇨114.]

That there was no error in requiring the widow to pay her own costs in this action.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partition, Cent. Dig. §§ 440-449; Dec. Dig. ⇨114.]

[6. Descent and Distribution ⇨27.]

A child born alive after the death of an intestate father is one of the children left by such father, and, as such, is capable of inheriting under our statute of distributions.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Descent and Distribution, Cent. Dig. § 78; Dec. Dig. ⇨27.]

[7. Partition ⇨109.]

That such child is not bound by an allotment or sale in partition made before its birth, nor is it remitted to the proceeds of a sale so made.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partition, Cent. Dig. §§ 375-397; Dec. Dig. ⇨109.]

[This case is also cited in Ex parte Worley, 49 S. C. 60, 26 S. E. 949, as an instance of disregard of rule prescribed in section 2322, Rev. St.]

Before Hudson, J., Spartanburg, April, 1881.

These were two actions commenced by James T. Pearson on March 7th, 1878; one against Elizabeth Carlton, Anna Waddill and others, distributees of James Carlton, deceased, and the other against J. M. Fowler, Sanford Brockman and others, the same defendants as in the other case, except Elizabeth Carlton. The opinion states the facts of the case.

The Circuit decree, after a statement of facts, was as follows:

In regard to the unborn infant, Anna Waddill, we feel much perplexed. She was no party to that bill, nor could she be made *such; and yet she was then heir to her father, and entitled, upon birth, to a share of the estate. It is passing strange that, in this hasty partition, the condition of the widow was not noticed, and that a living heir, James T. Pearson, was overlooked. There would be no difficulty nor hardship in the matter if the land had been allotted to the other heirs, and was still in their hands. They could be decreed to contribute to this posthumous child out of their shares until she be made equal. Even if the fund were on hand undistributed she could get her share after a re-adjustment. But the fund, though still in court, or in the hands of the commissioner, and undivided, is utterly worthless. She had no voice in the suit by which this was brought about, and should not suffer from this calamity which the other heirs are called on to bear.

*48

We feel constrained to hold that she is still entitled to her share of her father's land, although it has, in part, passed into the hands of a bona fide purchaser. The same rule, of course, must apply to the plaintiff, James T. Pearson, who was then in esse, but not a party. But how far can these two children disturb their mother's share of land, allotted to her as and for her thirds? The widow's share is fixed, and is not varied or affected by the number of children; be the same few or many, she takes under the statute her one-third in value of the land. That one-third has been duly allotted to her, and she has been for nearly twenty years in the quiet possession thereof. We do not think that this child and grandchild can be allowed to disturb her possession, unless they can show that the allotment to her was excessive. If this can be successfully done, then out of the excess they should be allowed to take their shares respectively; and of the sum of money which she was ordered to pay for equality of partition, and which she has not paid, they must have their shares.

Of the lands purchased by J. M. Fowler, the said Anna Waddill and James T. Pearson are entitled to demand partition, and likewise an accounting for rents and profits. He is entitled to all said lands, and to the use and occupation, rents and profits thereof, except such portion of land and rents or rental as shall be ascertained to belong to these claimants. Whether he will have any rents and profits or rental to account for will depend upon whether he has derived rents and profits from more than his share of the land, or whether he has actually used more than his share thereof. The correct rule by which he will be held to account is laid down in the case of Jones v. Massey, 14 S. C. 292.

Fowler (and Brockman who has bought of him) will be held to account only for the rents, issues and profits, use and rental of whatever portion of the land, over and above Fowler's share, which has actually yielded rents and profits or rental income. Against the claims of James T. Pearson and Anna Waddill to a part of this land, and the rents, issues and profits thereof, the defendants, Fowler and Brockman, are entitled to a fair and reasonable offset for the enhancement of the value of the land by reason of betterments made and erected under the honest belief that their titles were good against all the heirs-at-law of James Carlton, deceased. These offsets can be adjusted either by a separate action under the statute, or may be adjusted in this action in the partition of the land, and accounting for rents and profits. It is therefore ordered, adjudged and decreed:—

1. That Mary R. Godfrey and William Godfrey, her husband; Sarah Pearson and her husband, Green L. Pearson; and Francis Wood and Thomas Wood, her husband, are entitled to no relief in this action, the said wives being bound by the original partition in 1862.

2. That a writ in partition do issue, directed to five commissioners, selected according to the practice of this court, commanding them, or a majority of them, to make partition of the lands of James Carlton, described in the pleadings as being in the possession of J. M. Fowler, (and under him, in part possessed by Sanford Brockman,) so as to allot to James T. Pearson, the plaintiff herein, and Anna Waddill, one of the defendants herein, their respective shares thereof as heirs-at-law of James Carlton, deceased, and of his son, John Carlton, deceased, and the balance to J. M. Fowler, and Sanford Brockman, who claims a part under said Fowler.

3. That the same commissioners do view the tract allotted to the widow, Elizabeth Carlton, and ascertain whether the same be more than her one-third in value of the lands of James Carlton, of which he died seized, and $23.90 in excess, as was reported by the commissioners in partition in 1862. That they, in making this estimate, have reference to the value of said lands in 1862, at the date of the division, and make due return of their action in the premises to the next term of this court.

4. That Elizabeth Carlton do pay the said $23.90 and interest into this court, and, that when paid in, the said J. T. Pearson and Anna Waddill do receive their respective shares of the same.

5. That it be referred to C. P. Wofford, Esq., to take an account of the rents, issues and profits, or rentals of the lands in the possession of J. M. Fowler and Sanford Brockman, according to the principles of this decree; and also of the betterments and improvements made and erected thereon by the said Fowler and Brockman, and that he do adjust and balance the accounts and offsets, and make report of his actings in the premises, with leave to report special matter.

It is further ordered that the parties herein do pay their own costs, respectively.

Exceptions were filed to this decree and appeal taken to this court.

Messrs. Bobo & Carlisle, for appellants.

Messrs. J. S. R. Thomson, R. K. Carson, contra.

August 8th, 1882. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McIVER. James Carlton died intestate in March, 1862, and in July, 1862, a bill was filed in the Court of Equity by certain of his heirs, alleging that the personal estate in the hands of the administrator was sufficient for the payment of his debts, and praying for partition of his real estate. The administrator answered, saying that he had assets sufficient for the payment of the debts, and consenting to the partition. To this bill the plaintiff, who was then an infant of tender years, and the only child of a deceased daughter of the intestate, was not made a *party. John Carlton, a son of the intestate, who was a party to the bill, died intestate in August, 1862, leaving, as his heirs-at-law, the other parties to the bill and the plaintiff, James T. Pearson, as well as the defendant, Anna Waddill, who also claims to be one of his heirs.

No notice was taken of the death of John Carlton in the proceedings then pending for partition, and on September 6th, 1862, an order for a writ of partition to issue was made. In pursuance of this order the writ was issued, to which the commissioners made a return, allotting a tract of land to the defendant, Elizabeth Carlton, the widow of the intestate, as her one-third of the real estate, which, exceeding in value her share by the sum of $23.90, she was directed to pay that amount (to the other heirs, we presume, though it is not stated to whom,) for the purpose of equalizing the partition. The remainder of the land was recommended to be sold, and, accordingly, on the same day, to wit, September 6th, 1862, an order for the sale was made, and in pursuance of this order the balance of the land was sold on October 6th, 1862. At this sale the defendant, Fowler, became the purchaser, complied with the terms of sale, took titles, went into possession, and, subsequently, conveyed a portion of the land to his co-defendant, Brockman. Three days after this sale the widow of the intestate gave birth to a child, the defendant, Anna Waddill, who claims, as a posthumous child of the intestate, to be one of his heirs, and, as such, entitled to a share of his estate.

These actions were brought by the plaintiff; one for the purpose of obtaining his portion of the tract of land allotted to the widow, and the other for his portion of the land bought by the defendant, Fowler, at the sale for partition, and for rents and profits. The defendant, Anna Waddill, in her answer, sets up a claim for her share in the said lands as one of the heirs of the intestate. The Circuit judge held that, so far as the land allotted to the widow was concerned, she could not be disturbed in the possession of it, unless, upon an inquiry which he directed, it should be ascertained that it exceeded in value her share of the estate, in which event, the plaintiff and the defendant, Anna Waddill, would be entitled to their shares of such excess, as well as to *their shares of the amount which the widow was directed to pay for the purpose of equalizing the partition. He also held that these parties were entitled to their shares of the land bought by defendant, Fowler, at the sale for partition, and now claimed by him and his co-defendant, Brockman; and that these defendants should account for the rents and profits of so much of the land over and above their share as actually yielded rents and profits, subject to a deduction for improvements made by them. It was also adjudged that the plaintiff and the defendant, Anna Waddill, were also entitled to their shares of the share of John Carlton, who died pending the proceeding for partition. Finally, it was decreed that the parties herein pay their own costs respectively.

From this judgment the defendants, Fowler, Brockman and Mrs. Carlton, appeal on the following grounds: Because the Circuit judge erred—1. In refusing to dismiss the complaint in the case first above stated. 2. In requiring the defendant, Elizabeth Carlton, to pay her own costs. 3. In requiring a re-assessment of the land assigned to said defendant, Elizabeth Carlton, as her distributive share of the real estate of her deceased husband. 4. In holding that the plaintiff and Anna Waddill were entitled to any share in the premises so assigned. 5. In holding that the defendants, J. M. Fowler and Sanford Brockman, should account for the rents and profits of the land purchased by the said Fowler at the partition sale of the real estate of James Carlton, deceased. 6. In holding that the defendant, Anna Waddill, is entitled to any share in the land purchased by the said Fowler as aforesaid. 7. In holding that the defendants, J. M. Fowler, Sanford Brockman and Elizabeth Carlton, were bound to account to the plaintiff and Anna Waddill for the interest of the latter in the share of John Carlton, deceased, in said premises. 8. In holding that the premises described in the complaint were subject to partition.

We propose, first, to consider the claims of the plaintiff. We do not see how it can be questioned that he has a right to have partition of the lands in question. He was confessedly one of the heirs of the intestate, James Carlton, and he was not made a party to the proceedings for partition—was an infant at the time *and has only recently attained the age of twenty-one years. He was, therefore, not bound by those proceedings, and his rights stand as if no such proceedings had ever been instituted; for if there is anything settled, it is that judgments bind only the parties to the proceedings in which they are obtained and their privies. Indeed, it does not seem to be seriously denied that he has a right to demand partition of the land purchased by the defendant, Fowler, and to have his share thereof set apart to him.

It is contended, however, that inasmuch as the share of the widow would have been one-third anyhow, no matter what may have been the number of the children, and inasmuch as only one-third of the real estate was allotted to her, that the plaintiff has no cause of complaint against her, as that amount would have been allotted to her even if the plaintiff had been a party to the proceedings for partition. But it must be remembered that persons interested in the subject-matter of litigation are required to be made parties for the purpose of enabling them to be heard at every step taken therein, and as this plaintiff has not yet had an opportunity of being heard as to the propriety of the partition which has been made, he still has that right. It may be that, through collusion, mistake or negligence of the other parties, the land allotted to the widow exceeded her share, or that the partition was open to objection upon some other ground, and the plaintiff undoubtedly has a right to have the whole matter inquired into; and most unquestionably he has a right to demand from the widow his portion of the amount which she was directed to pay for the purpose of equalizing the partition. This being so, it follows, necessarily, that there was no error in requiring the defendant, Elizabeth Carlton, to pay her own costs; on the contrary, the provision of the Circuit decree, in that respect, is perhaps, more favorable to her than she would have had a right to demand.

The next inquiry is, whether there was any error in requiring the defendants, Fowler and Brockman, to account for rents and profits. Although there seems to be some conflict of decision elsewhere as to the liability of one tenant in common to account to his cotenants for rents and profits of the premises held in *common, yet, in this State, the rule is too well settled to admit of controversy, that, when one tenant in common occupies and uses more than his share of the common property, he is liable to account to his cotenant for the rents and profits of so much of the common property as he has occupied and used in excess of his share. Scaife v. Thomson, 15 S. C. 338, and the authorities therein cited. The plaintiff, never having been divested of the title to his share in the land bought by Fowler at the sale for partition, was, unquestionably, tenant in common, and, as such, entitled to an account for rents and profits as directed by the Circuit judge.

Next, as to the plaintiff's claim for his portion of the share of his deceased uncle, John Carlton, in the intestate's estate. John Carlton was originally one of the parties to the proceeding for partition, and had he lived until the decree for partition and sale thereunder was made, his interest would undoubtedly have passed to the purchaser at such sale. But, pending that proceeding, and before any decree for partition, he died intestate, leaving the plaintiff, who was not a party to such proceeding, as one of his heirs-at-law, and no notice whatever was taken of his death in the further conduct of that case. Of course, when John Carlton died intestate, his interest in the real estate of his deceased father at once descended to and became vested in his heirs-at-law, of whom the plaintiff was one, and any subsequent sale of the estate, under a proceeding to which the plaintiff was not a party, could no more divest the interest of the plaintiff in the share of his deceased uncle than it could divest his interest in the estate of his grandfather. It is clear, therefore, that the plaintiff was entitled to claim, not only his share as one of the heirs of his deceased grandfather, but also his share as one of the heirs of his deceased uncle, John Carlton; and there was no error in the judgment below in this respect.

Finally we are to consider what is the only real question in the case, the claim of the defendant, Anna Waddill, the posthumous child of the intestate. Under a rule which was rigidly observed by some of the former chancellors of this State, this question could never have arisen; for, according to that rule, a bill for partition of the real estate of an intestate would not *have been entertained until after the lapse of twelve months from the death of such intestate. If this wholesome rule had been observed when the application was made for the partition of this estate, the parties would, probably, have been saved the expense of this litigation. But although this was a rule governing the practice of some, at least, of the former chancellors, on circuit, yet it was not based upon any statutory provision like that forbidding the distribution of the personal estate of an intestate "till after one year be fully expired after the intestate's death," (2 Stat. 524; Gen. Stat. 455,) nor did it have the sanction of any decision of a court of last resort, so far as we know. We cannot, therefore, undertake to say that the failure to observe this salutary rule invalidated the partition now under consideration.

The question, therefore, of the right of a posthumous child to inherit from his deceased father, is, so far as we are informed, for the first time distinctly presented for decision in this State. The rule, elsewhere, seems to be well settled, that a posthumous child inherits from his deceased father just as if he had been born in the lifetime of such father, and had survived him. In 4 Kent Com. 412, it is said: "Posthumous children inherit, in all cases, in like manner as if they were born in the lifetime of the intestate and had survived him. This is the universal rule in this country. It is equally the acknowledged principle in the English law; and for all the beneficial purposes of heirship, a child in ventre sa mere is considered as absolutely born." So in 3 Washb. Real Prop., bk. 3, ch. I., § 2, p. 16, it is said: "Posthumous children inherit in the same manner as if they had been born in the lifetime of their father, and were surviving heirs: and this doctrine is universally adopted in the United States. And this relates back to the conception of the child, if it is born alive."

In Wallis v. Hodson, 2 Atk. 115, the intestate died in December, 1724, "and, at his death, left issue, Towers Wallis, his only child, an infant, who died within a week after his death, and the defendant, Elizabeth, his widow, enceinte with the plaintiff, who was born on May 22d following;" and the question was whether the posthumous child could take any portion of the *deceased son's estate. Held, that she could; Lord Hardwick saying: "The principal reason I go upon in the question is, that the plaintiff was in ventre sa mere at the time of her brother's death, and, consequently, a person in rerum natura, so that both by the rules of the common and civil law, she was, to all intents and purposes, a child, as much as if born in the father's lifetime." In Lancashire v. Lancashire, 5 T. R. 49, John Lancashire, being unmarried, made his will, and, subsequently, married and died, leaving his wife pregnant, who, subsequently, gave birth to a child, and the question was whether this operated as a revocation of the will. The general proposition that marriage and the birth of issue would operate as a revocation being conceded, the only question considered was, "whether a posthumous child is considered in the same situation as one born during the parent's life," and the conclusion reached was that there was no distinction. See, also, Thellusson v. Woodford, 4 Ves. 322.

An argument in support of a contrary view has been suggested, drawn from the word "leave" in our statute of distributions, and it has been contended that as our statute provides only for those whom the intestate leaves at his death, an unborn child of the intestate cannot be said to be one of those left by him at his death, and, consequently, cannot inherit under the statute. If, however, as we have seen, there is no distinction, in law, between a posthumous child and one born during the father's lifetime, so far as the right to inherit is concerned, this argument loses its force. But, in addition to this, it has been repeatedly decided that a devise to the children of one "living at his death" embraces a posthumous child. Clarke v. Blake, 2 Ves. Jr. 673, and the cases therein cited; Jenkins v. Freyer, 4 Paige 52; Stedfast v. Nicoll, 3 Johns. (N. Y.) Cas. 18.

So in Burdet v. Hopegood, 1 P. Wm. 486, the testator devised the premises, "in case he should leave no son at the time of his death," to the defendant, Hopegood, and died, leaving his wife pregnant, who afterwards gave birth to a son, the plaintiff, and it was held that the plaintiff was entitled to the devised premises, the contingency upon which the estate was to go over to the defendant not having happened; the testator did leave a son, *although he was not born at the time of his father's death. See, also, Bedon v. Bedon, 2 Bailey 231, where the same view seems to have been taken as a matter of course, the question not being discussed by the court. It seems to us, therefore, that a posthumous child, who is afterwards born alive, must be regarded as one of the children left by his deceased father, and, as such, capable of inheriting under our statute.

It may be contended, however, that though a posthumous child is an heir of his deceased father, and, as such, entitled to a portion of his estate, yet, that, as his rights do not attach until his birth, he must take his portion of the estate in the condition in which it is found at his birth; and where, as in this case, the real estate of his deceased father has, before his birth, been converted into money or bonds by a sale thereof, his claim must be confined to his share of such money or bonds, and that he cannot claim a share of the land in the hands of a purchaser.

We have found one case, which, at first view, seems to support this proposition. Knotts v. Stearns, 91 U. S. 638 [23 L. Ed. 252]. In that case, the action was brought to set aside the sale and conveyance of certain real estate in the city of Richmond, Virginia, of which one Edwin Knotts died seized. The order of sale was obtained under a bill filed for that purpose by the guardian of the infant children of the deceased, to which his widow was a party. The case made by the pleadings and evidence was, that the property sold consisted of a house and lot, which, with a few articles of household and kitchen furniture, constituted the entire estate of the intestate; that the house was much out of repair, so much so that it could not be rented, and the parties had no means to repair it, nor had they any other property from which they could derive a support; and that it was manifestly for the interest of all parties concerned that the property should be converted into funds yielding an income. The property was sold on April 5th, 1863, the money paid and invested in Confederate bonds by order of the court, and titles were made to the purchaser. In the month of May, following the sale, the widow gave birth to a posthumous child, and the sale was attacked because this unborn child was not a party to the proceedings, nor were its interests specifically considered in the proceedings, *in that case. The court held that "the posthumous child did not possess, until born, any estate in the real property of which his father died seized, which could affect the power of the court to convert the property into a personal fund, if the interests of the children then in being or the enjoyment of the dower right of the widow required such conversion. Whatever estate devolved upon him at his birth was an estate in the property in its then condition. That property had then ceased to be realty; it had become, by the sale, converted into personalty." The court also relied upon the further ground that, under the laws of Virginia, "Parties in being, possessing an estate of inheritance, are there regarded as so far representing all persons, who, being afterwards born, may have interests in the same, that a decree binding them will also bind the after-born parties," and refers to the case of Faulkner v. Davis, 18 Gratt. 651 [98 Am. Dec. 698]; and this case, upon examination, will be found to be not in conflict with the views herein presented. No other authority is cited, and the conclusion reached by the court, upon this branch of the case, is not supported by any reasoning further than that above quoted.

This case, it will be observed, was not a case in which the order of sale was attacked, was in question, but, on the contrary, was a case in which the order of sale which was attacked, was made by the court for the purpose of changing an unfruitful investment of the property of persons who were not sui juris, into something that would yield an income necessary for the support of such persons. The sale, therefore, might, perhaps, have been sustained upon the principles established by the case of Bofil v. Fisher, 3 Rich. Eq. 1 [55 Am. Dec. 627], in which the Court of Equity asserted its power to bar, by its decree for sale, the interest of unborn contingent remaindermen, who, of course, could not be made parties. But such a power would only be exercised when a proper case was made for its exercise—when, as in the case of Knotts v. Stearns, and in Bofil v. Fisher, it has been ascertained, by an inquiry made for that purpose, that a sale was necessary to provide for the interests of those who could be, and were, brought before the court. A proceeding for partition is a very different matter, and presents totally different questions for the consideration of the court; and if, as we have seen, the doctrine *is well settled that a posthumous child inherits in the same manner as if he had been born in the lifetime of his father and had survived him, we do not see how his interest could be divested by a proceeding for partition to which he was not a party, notwithstanding the inference that may be drawn from some of the remarks made in the case of Knotts v. Stearns, supra.

We think, therefore, that the defendant, Anna Waddill, was entitled to claim the same rights as the plaintiff has been shown to be entitled to, and that there was no error on the part of the Circuit judge in so adjudging.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

Mr. Justice McGOWAN, absent at the hearing.

18 S. C. 59

WILSON v. BABB.

(April Term, 1882.)

[1. Bastards ⚭3.]

A child born in lawful wedlock is presumed to be legitimate until the contrary be shown, even where born so soon after marriage that it could not have been lawfully begotten; but in such case, the evidence of illegitimacy is not required to be so strong as in other cases. This rule should be applied by the courts with a cautious regard to the peace of society and the happiness and reputation of families.

[Ed. Note.—Cited in Kennington v. Catoe, 68 S. C. 472, 47 S. E. 719.

For other cases, see Bastards, Cent. Dig. §§ 4, 5; Dec. Dig. ⚭3.]

[2. Bastards ⚭5.]

Any competent testimony bearing upon this question is admissible, and, if it satisfies the mind, is sufficient.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Bastards, Cent. Dig. §§ 7, 8; Dec. Dig. ⚭5.]

[3. Bastards ⚭3.]

Impotency of the husband, impossibility of access, or cohabitation of the wife with another man, are not the only facts competent to establish the illegitimacy of a child born in wedlock.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Bastards, Cent. Dig. § 5; Dec. Dig. ⚭3.]

[4. Bastards ⚭6.]

A finding by the Circuit judge of the fact of the illegitimacy of a child born four and one-half months after marriage, sustained.

Before Fraser, J., Laurens, July, 1881.

Action for partition of a tract of land of which J. Newton Bolling died seized. Elizabeth Wilson and others, children of James and Lucinda Johnson, were plaintiffs, and the defendants *were, at first, Tandy M. Babb, administrator de bonis non of J. N. Bolling, and Amanda Bolling, widow; and after her death, Tandy Babb, as heir-at-law of the widow of J. N. Bolling, and the widow and children of Melmoth Babb. Tandy and Melmoth Babb were brothers, and only heirs-at-law of Mrs. Bolling. Mrs. Bolling survived her husband, and her brother, Melmoth survived her. The brief gives no dates.

*60

The testimony was as follows:

Martin Arnold—Am connected with the family; know Elizabeth Wilson, Sarah Monroe; they were acknowledged to be children of James Johnson and Lucinda Johnson; she was also the mother of Henry Johnson; Henry Johnson was a brother to petitioners; Henry Johnson and J. N. Bolling called each other brother.

X.—Reside in Greenville county; Lucinda Johnson was the mother of Elizabeth Wilson and Sarah Johnson; never heard her claim to be the mother of J. N. Bolling; knew the parties for forty years; well acquainted with petitioners; Mrs. L. Johnson raised them.

William Ellison—I know Elizabeth Wilson and Sarah Monroe; they were said to be children of Lucinda Johnson; am connected with the family by marriage; knew J. N. Bolling; he was said to be a son of Lucinda Johnson.

X.—Reside in Laurens county; it was said by neighbors and connections that J. N. Bolling was a son of Lucinda Johnson; Mrs. Perrit said, during her life, that J. N. Bolling was a son of Lucinda Johnson; Mrs. Perrit and Mrs. Johnson were sisters.

Martin Arnold, recalled—Know that Mrs. Perrit and Mrs. Johnson were sisters; J. N. Bolling was raised by old Mrs. Bolling.

X.—Heard Mrs. Perrit and Mrs. Johnson say they were sisters; old Mrs. Bolling was the mother of Mrs. Johnson and Perrit.

Wesley Latimer—Know J. N. Bolling; heard him say that *Lucinda Bolling was his mother; Lucinda Bolling was the wife of James Johnson; heard Mrs. Isabella Latimer, my former mistress, say that J. N. Bolling was taken from his mother when very small; Mrs. Latimer and Mrs. Bolling were closely connected after her marriage with Johnson; Mrs. Johnson had other children—Sarah, who married Monroe; Elizabeth, who married Wilson, and others.

X.—It was in Greenville county I saw Mr. Bolling, some twenty-two or twenty-three years ago, when he told witness that Mrs. Bolling was his mother; can't recall any other conversation that then took place between them; frequently saw before-mentioned at Mrs. Johnson's; they called her ma; Mrs. Latimer said to witness, the child was carried away when very small, but did not say where from.

Josiah Sullivan—I know J. N. Bolling; Lucinda Bolling was his mother, who afterwards married James Johnson; did not know the Johnson boys; when they were play-boys together, heard J. N. Bolling say Lucinda Bolling was his mother; he (Bolling) then lived at the old Bolling place.

X.—Knew J. N. Bolling well; were play-boys together; witness is over seventy years old; saw Mr. Bolling frequently after we grew up; did not know the Johnson boys; it was when they were boys heard J. N. Bolling say Mrs. Bolling was his mother.

Phyllis Bolling—I knew J. N. Bolling well; Lucinda Bolling was his mother; was born after her marriage with James Johnson; I knew both J. N. Bolling and his mother well.

X.—Witness belonged formerly to mother of Mrs. Bolling; carried a letter from Esquire Dunklin to James Johnson, saying he would take the child and its mother too; I carried the child to my home at Mrs. Abby Bolling's, but the mother stayed; I have heard J. N. Bolling say Mrs. Lucinda Johnson was his mother; he was then a good-sized boy; have heard Mrs. Johnson say J. N. Bolling was her son; Mr. Johnson is dead; witness was not at Mr. Johnson's for several days after the birth of the child.

*XX.—Witness went for the child; got it at Mr. Johnson's house, and from the bed with Mrs. Johnson; Mrs. Johnson said it was her child, but that Mr. Johnson would not allow her to "suckle" it; witness raised the child at Mrs. Abby Bolling's; lived with him after he was grown; saw him after death; and knew him to be the same J. N. Bolling.

Mrs. Ann H. Sullivan—Knew Newton Bolling and his mother; Bolling was born, I think, in 1808 or 1809; his mother was then married to James Johnson; I knew Elizabeth, daughter of James and Lucinda Johnson; she married John Wilson; and Sallie, another daughter, married Francis Monroe; did not know the other children; am not related to Newton Bolling; knew his grandmother; lived near her and visited her; Lucinda was at my house several times.

X.—Lucinda was never married, except to James Johnson; about time of Newton's birth, I saw Phyllis carrying the child to his grandmother's, Mrs. Abigail Bolling; and also heard Mrs. Kinman, the midwife, speak of the circumstances of his birth about 1808 or 1809.

Nathaniel Gaines—Knew J. N. Bolling; report said he was son of Lucinda Bolling, born after her marriage with James Johnson.

X.—My recollection is, that James Johnson and Lucinda Bolling were married in the latter part of the summer or early fall of 1809; about four and a half months after, the child, J. N. Bolling, was born; recollect the date from the fact that my (witness) father died November 6th of that year; recollect the birth from the fact, as reported then, that Mrs. Kinman, the midwife, on that occasion, attempted to pacify Mr. Johnson by telling him that four and a half months for himself and four and a half months for his wife, made the full nine months; was familiar with the Bolling family from a short time before said marriage; do not recollect to have heard said family, or Johnson, or his wife, speak of the child; was frequently at James Johnson's in 1809 and 1810; was there a few weeks after the birth of said child; did not, at any time, see the child or hear *the family speak of him; my father and Johnson's mother were brother and sister; I have heard the Johnsons speak of the birth of the child, and his removal by order of James Johnson; I never saw or heard of the child, J. N. Bolling, being at Johnson's, or having any communication whatever with his family; never heard Johnson say why said child was taken away; from frequent visits, I know the child was not nurtured by his mother, and was never recognized as a member of the Johnson family.

XX.—Knew the Bolling family from shortly before said marriage; saw James Johnson and Lucinda Bolling on one occasion at a neighborhood gathering, but did not see them associating together.

For Defense.

Tandy Babb—Am acquainted with defendant; is his sister; she married Josiah N. Bolling; I have heard members of the Bolling family speak of Josiah N. Bolling; it was said by them that he was a son of James Dunklin; I have frequently heard Maj. T. C. Bolling (cousin of Josiah N. Bolling, and nephew of Lucinda Bolling,) say that James Dunklin was the father of the said J. N. Bolling, and was so recognized by the whole family, and there was a striking resemblance between them; the Bolling family regarded J. N. Bolling illegitimate; I never saw James Johnson; J. N. Bolling, my brother-in-law, never recognized the Johnsons as his family.

X.—Josiah N. Bolling lived in Laurens county; married Amanda Babb, my sister, the defendant in this case; was never married but once.

Amanda Bolling—Was the wife of Josiah N. Bolling; never heard him speak of himself as the son of James Johnson; have heard him frequently say he was not; Josiah N. Bolling showed me a house, and said his father lived there, and his name was James Dunklin; does not know that Lucinda Bolling was ever married.

Phyllis Bolling—Knew Lucinda Bolling well; lived on same plantation with her; four or five months after her marriage, the *child, J. N. Bolling, was born; the mother kept the child some three days after birth, before it was sent away; Mrs. Johnson sent the child away because Mr. Johnson would not allow it to remain; would not allow her to "suckle" it; because, as he said, it wasn't his child; frequently heard the Bolling family say James Dunklin was the father of the child.

X.—Josiah N. Bolling was the son of Lucinda Johnson; witness lived with Bolling family before said parties were married; saw them married; Johnson came courting a very short time—perhaps three months.

B. Gunnels—I have heard Mary Perrit and her husband say that James Dunklin did not deny, but said there was no doubt but that he was the father of Josiah or Newton Bolling; Mary Perrit was a sister of Lucinda Johnson.

Andrew McKnight—Thornberry Bolling said to me that Josiah N. Bolling was an imperfect child, and he intended to give all his property to him and one other; said James Dunklin was his father; I heard Samuel Bolling speak of James Dunklin as the father of the child, and fought on the subject; I have heard James Dunklin say that he was the father of J. N. Bolling; J. N. Bolling has said more than once, in my presence, that James Dunklin was his father, and that Dr. Irby Dunklin was his half-brother; Thornberry Bolling was uncle of J. N. Bolling.

Mrs. Ann H. Sullivan—Knew Lucinda Bolling and others of Bolling family; never heard her mention Newton's name nor his father's, nor say who was his father; the wife and daughters of Lucinda's brother often spoke in my presence, and said that Newton's father was Lucinda's brother-in-law, James Dunklin, and censured both for such conduct; this was over fifty years ago; Lucinda was never married before she married James Johnson; Newton was born four or five months afterwards; saw the baby at my father's when Phyllis was carrying it to Mrs. Bolling; have heard Mrs. Kinman, the midwife, say that James Johnson would not suffer his wife to keep the child, Newton, who could not have been more than two weeks old when taken *from his mother; never heard James Johnson speak of Newton or claim to be his father, or deny it; heard the wife of Lucinda's brother say that James denied being the father; the child was removed because James denied being the father; and this was the reason given by the Bolling family; never heard Newton claim any one for his father.

It was conceded that the declarations of divers persons as to the illegitimacy of Josiah N. Bolling were the declarations of persons deceased at the time of trial. The plaintiffs, at the taking of the testimony and on the trial, objected in turn to any and all testimony directed to showing that anybody else than James Johnson either was, or was believed to be, the father of Josiah N. Bolling, or that James Johnson denied being the father of Josiah N. Bolling, or that Lucinda's family connection regarded Josiah N. Bolling as the child of any other person than James Johnson.

The Circuit decree was as follows:

This case was heard by me at the extra term of the court for Laurens county in July, 1881. The questions involved are somewhat new in this State, and deserve more consideration than can be given to them by a Circuit judge. I shall, therefore, state my conclusions very briefly.

The action is brought for the partition of a tract of land, the property of J. Newton Bolling, deceased, who died intestate, leaving surviving him a widow, Amanda Bolling, but no children or other lineal descendants. The plaintiffs claim that they are the brother and sister and the representatives of a deceased brother and sister, and entitled to one-half of the land. The defendants claim that they are the representatives of the widow, now deceased, and entitled to the whole tract of land, basing their claim upon the alleged illegitimacy of J. Newton Bolling, deceased.

I have examined the testimony and find nothing to show any relationship between any of the plaintiffs and the intestate, except Elizabeth Wilson and Sarah Monroe. If there is any such evidence it has escaped me.

As to these two, the only evidence *is that they were regarded and perhaps treated as the children of James and Lucinda Johnson, who were husband and wife. This, however, is sufficient if J. Newton Bolling was a legitimate child of the same parents.

The evidence is clear that Lucinda Johnson, whose maiden name was Bolling, about four and a half or five months after her marriage with James Johnson, gave birth to a son; that this son was sent off by James and Lucinda Johnson, within two or three days after his birth, to the mother of Lucinda Johnson; was nursed by a colored woman, and never afterwards became a member of the family of James and Lucinda Johnson; that from declarations of various persons, relatives of the family, some now dead, he was regarded as the son of one Esquire Dunklin, a brother-in-law of Lucinda. The same kind of evidence, on which Elizabeth Wilson and Sarah Monroe base their claim to being the legitimate children of James and Lucinda Johnson in the case, assigns an illegitimate birth to the intestate. He did not bear the name of Johnson, but Bolling, the maiden name of his mother, and not a single witness says that he ever was regarded as legitimate. The fact that James Johnson was visiting Lucinda as a suitor for some three months before marriage is not, in my judgment, such access as to affect him with the charge of having improper relations with her, in the absence of any circumstances to show that such a condition of things then existed between them.

The intestate was born in 1808 or 1809, and the evidence is such as must be relied on in these cases. I think that as a matter of fact, the intestate, J. Newton Bolling, was an illegitimate child of Lucinda Johnson, and that the evidence is sufficient to remove any presumption of legitimacy arising from the fact that he was born four and a half or five months after the marriage of his mother. It is, therefore, ordered and adjudged that the complaint be dismissed with costs.

The plaintiffs appealed upon the exception stated in the opinion, and also upon the following:

2. Because, upon the facts proved, the presiding judge on the *circuit ought to have decreed that J. N. Bolling was in law a child of James Johnson.

3. Because, it having been proved that J. N. Bolling was born in lawful wedlock, the presiding judge on the circuit ought to have decreed that according to the evidence the alleged illegitimacy of J. N. Bolling was not proved.

4. Because the said J. N. Bolling and the plaintiffs having been born in lawful wedlock, the plaintiffs are entitled to a share of the estate of J. N. Bolling.

Mr. W. C. Benet, for appellants.

Marriage is proof of paternity, and the old maxim of the civil law, pater est quem nuptiæ demonstrant, subject to certain exceptions, is still the approved dogma. Fraser's Parent and Child 1, 62. Impotency of the husband and his absence from the realm were once the only exceptions. But the rule was extended to include proof of non-access. Strange 925; 1 Sim. & S. 153; 2 Kent 211-212; 2 Greenl. Ev. 145. Another exception is open cohabitation of the wife with a paramour. 5 Car. & P. 604. See, further, 2 Phil. Ev. (Cow. & H.) 488, note 379, 314, note 305; Steph. Dig. Ev. 159; 5 Wait Ac. & Def. 48; Schoul. Dom. Rel. 308. The husband here was not impotent nor extra quatuor maria, and there is not "perfectly satisfactory proof" that he had no access at time of the conception; and this is necessary. 2 Kent 21, note 5; 1 Turn. & R. 138; 6 How. 580; Schoul. Mar. & D., § 435; see particularly Stegall v. Stegall, 1 Brock. 256, which is directly in point. There is no satisfactory proof here of non-access by the husband. There is no proof of open cohabitation with another man; only vague rumors of an illicit intercourse with Dunklin—a scandal that arose after the birth of the child. This case is unlike Shuler v. Bull, 15 S. C. 421. But adulterous intercourse with another man—short of open cohabitation—is not sufficient. Shelf. M. & D. 711; 2 Myl. & K. 349. These rules apply, equally, to antinuptial generation. Shelf. M. & D. 797; 2

As appellants here claim collaterally, a question of pedigree is involved. On questions of pedigree, declarations of deceased persons connected with the family are admissible. 3 Bouv. August 9th, 1882. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. Josiah Newton Bolling died intestate in 18—, seized and possessed of certain real estate situate in Laurens county. He left a widow, but no lineal descendants. The plaintiffs commenced this action for the partition of his lands, claiming to be heirs-at-law with the widow. Their right to this partition involved the question of the legitimacy of the deceased. During the pendency of the action, the widow died, and the present defendants were made parties as her heirs-at-law. Considerable testimony was taken, whether orally *before the Circuit judge, or before some officer of the court, does not appear in the brief. It was taken, however, and is set out in full.

Judge Fraser, who heard the case, found, as matter of fact, that the deceased was the illegitimate child of Lucinda Johnson, the mother of the plaintiffs, and, upon this finding, he dismissed the complaint with costs. The plaintiffs have appealed, and the question which the appeal requires us to consider is, whether the judge erred in this finding. The case before us is a case in chancery, and is embraced within the appellate jurisdiction of this court, so that, although the appeal involved a question of fact almost entirely, yet it is within our cognizance, subject to the principles heretofore decided as to such appeals.

A legitimate child is he that is born in lawful wedlock, or within a competent time afterwards. 1 Blacks. Com. 367. "Pater est quem nuptiæ demonstrant" is the rule in the civil law, says Mr. Blackstone, and this holds with the civilians, whether the nuptials happen before or after the birth of the child. In England, and in this country, however, the nuptials must be precedent to the birth, and while a post-nuptial birth is not conclusive upon the question of legitimacy, yet it raises a presumption which will stand until overthrown by sufficient and competent testimony. At one time, in the early history of such cases, nothing short of proof of impossibility of access, on the part of the husband, was regarded as sufficient to destroy this presumption. But such is not the law now. It now stands as any other question of fact, resting upon the testimony for and against it. Shuler v. Bull, 15 S. C. 421, and the cases there cited; State v. Shumpert, 1 S. C. 85.

While a legitimate child is one born in lawful wedlock, and a bastard is one begotten and born out of lawful wedlock, yet it does not follow that every child born in lawful wedlock is legitimate, nor does it require one to be both begotten and born out of lawful wedlock to be a bastard. The true test is whether the husband of the woman who gives birth to the child is its father; and this must, of necessity, in every case, be a question of fact. Where the child is born after lawful wedlock, and after the lapse of the usual period of gestation, it should require *a very strong state of circumstances to overthrow the presumption of legitimacy, such as impossibility of access, absolute non-access, abandonment, or something equally as conclusive. But where the birth is so soon after the marriage as to render it certain, according to the laws of nature, that the child could not have been begotten during the wedlock, then it is more of an open question, depending on the weight of the testimony, aided in favor of the legitimacy, somewhat, by the marriage, but, perhaps, not to the extent of requiring such strong opposing evidence as in other cases. In every case, however, the question is still one of fact, to be determined in each special case by the principles hereinabove stated: to be administered and applied by the courts with a cautious regard to the peace of society and the happiness and reputation of families.

Judge Fraser, after a careful consideration of the testimony submitted to him, came to the conclusion that the deceased was illegitimate, and refusing the claim of those who never recognized their now alleged relationship to the deceased until after his death, and his property had become subject to partition, turned the property over to the heir of his widow, who, notwithstanding his bar sinister, had, in the face of it, and against all attendant reproach, united her destiny with his in early life, and had stood by him until his death. There is some justice in this result at least. But the question for this court to determine is, whether the decree of Judge Fraser can stand.

The first ground of appeal claims that J. N. Bolling, having been born of the wife of James Johnson after marriage, the law requires said Bolling to be considered and treated in the distribution of his estate as a child of James Johnson until the contrary be established by competent testimony, which must be either—First, impotency of the husband; Second, impossibility of access between husband and wife; or, Third, birth of the child during or within a competent time after the mother's cohabitation with some other man than her husband. It is true that birth during lawful wedlock presumes legitimacy which will stand until the contrary be established by lawful testimony; and if this ground had stopped at the first paragraph it would have been unobjectionable. But we know of *no law which requires the proof of either one or all of the facts mentioned in the specifications as indispensable to the overthrow of this presumption. Either one of these facts will certainly have that effect; but there is no authority for saying that they are indispensable, one or all.

We have examined the cases relied upon by the appellants, and have extracted from them the principles as laid down above. In most of these cases the birth of the child took place during the coverture and within a competent time thereafter for the husband to have been the father during said coverture; and even in those cases, the presumption was not regarded as conclusive. Nor did they indisputably require the presence of the facts mentioned in this ground to overthrow it. The rules established in the Banbury Peerage Case, 1 Sim. & S. 153, were in reference to questions applicable to cases of a like character to those above referred to. These rules hold the presumption rebuttable by such facts and circumstances as are sufficient to prove to the satisfaction of the jury that no sexual intercourse took place between the husband and wife at a time when, by such intercourse, the husband, by the laws of nature, could be the father of such child.

The true doctrine, sustained by all of these cases, is found in 1 Phil. Ev. (C. & H.'s notes) 630, where he says: "If a child be born after the marriage of the mother and during the husband's life, it is presumed to be legitimate. It was formerly an established doctrine of the courts that this presumption in favor of legitimacy could not be rebutted, unless the husband was incapable of procreation, as from impotency, or old age, or was absent beyond the seas during the whole period of the wife's pregnancy. This doctrine was not, however, conformable to the more ancient legal authorities, but in later times it came to be established that the presumption in favor of legitimacy of the child of a married woman might be rebutted if it were shown that the husband had not opportunity for sexual intercourse within such a period of time before the birth of the child as would admit of his being the father. And, in the present day, even where a husband and wife have had opportunities for sexual intercourse at a time when the husband might have *become the father of the child, a court and jury are at liberty to infer from all the circumstances of the case that no sexual intercourse took place. But when a jury believes that sexual intercourse took place between husband and wife at a time when it might have led to the conception of the child whose legitimacy is disputed, it would seem that they ought not to find the child a bastard. If, however, there was an opportunity of access, though the wife was notoriously living in adultery, it does not necessarily follow that the child is not legitimate."

*72

These principles, as it appears from the terms employed by Mr. Phillips, were intended to apply to cases of adulterine bastardy, and their effect is to throw the protection of a very strong presumption in such cases around the legitimacy—so strong as to cast the burden of destroying it on the party impeaching it; which, however, when assumed, may be done by any competent testimony sufficient to satisfy the mind of the tribunal before whom the question is made, to the contrary. This certainly is the law in this State since the cases of the State v. Shumpert and Shuler v. Bull, supra.

Whether this protecting principle applies as strongly to antenuptial conception and birth afterwards, as in this case, the authorities are not very definite. In the case of Wright v. Hix, 12 Geo. 162, Judge Lumpkin thought it applied whether the bastardy originated before or during the marriage. "If a man," says he, "marries a woman pregnant by another person, the law presumes the child to be the husband's; and whether she was at the time a reputed virgin or grossly encephalic, the books make no difference. In both cases the law says, presumably, it is his child; still he may show, by whatever proof he may command, that he has been made the innocent victim of fraud and artifice. And the same proof may be adduced by any one whose interest and right it is to contest the legitimacy of the pretender; and inexpressibly hard would it be if such privilege was not allowed." But whatever doubt there may be as to where the burden of proof lies in any case, the authorities are uniform as to the character of the evidence which may be submitted. Any competent testimony bearing upon the question is admissible, and, if it satisfies the mind, it is sufficient.

*73

*Now, how does Judge Fraser's finding of fact stand when examined by the light of these principles and tested by the rules heretofore established as to appeals involving questions of fact in chancery cases? Is there an absence of all testimony to sustain that finding? Or, even, is the manifest weight of the testimony against it? We think both of these questions should be answered in the negative. We find, in the decree, the substance of the testimony stated in a condensed form, and presented so as to show its full force. It is as follows: [Here follows the statement of the evidence contained in the Circuit decree, supra.] It was further in testimony that James Johnson became a suitor of Lucinda about three or four months before the marriage, and, on one occasion before, at a neighborhood gathering, they were both present, not, however, associating with each other. The only testimony on the other side was the fact that the birth took place during coverture. There was no evidence that this birth was premature. In the face of these facts, we cannot say that there was an entire absence of testimony to support the finding of the Circuit judge, nor that the weight of the evidence is against it.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

Mr. Justice McGOWAN absent at the hearing.

18 S. C. 73

HARDIN v. HOWZE.

(April Term, 1882.)

[1. Homestead ¶216.]

The case of Howze v. Howze, 2 S. C. 229, determined the conditions upon which the claimant there would be entitled to a homestead, but it did not settle the existence of those conditions; and whether a homestead ever had been assigned in that case was, in this case, a question of fact for the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homestead, Cent. Dig. §§ 400–403; Dec. Dig. ¶216.]

[2. Homestead ¶18.]

At that time there was no statute covering the claim for homestead in that case, and the claim, therefore, rested alone upon the constitutional provision, which secures a homestead on two essential conditions: That the claimant is the head of a family, and that he is in possession of a dwelling-house and outbuilding on the land claimed as a homestead.

*74

When these *conditions do not exist, or have ceased, the exemption cannot be claimed by virtue of the constitution alone.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homestead, Cent. Dig. § 22; Dec. Dig. ¶18.]

[3. Appeal and Error ¶1200.]

Howze v. Howze, supra, held (erroneously but controllingly) that the claimant was entitled to a homestead if the land contained a dwelling-house occupied by the deceased father of claimant, and if claimant was the head of a family; the Circuit judge, therefore, erred here in charging the jury that the right of claimant to this homestead expired with his minority, the former adjudication having fixed no such limitation.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 4672; Dec. Dig. ¶1200.]

Before Pressley, J., Chester, November, 1881.

Action by John O. Hardin against William C. Howze, S. C. Howze et al., commenced August 24th, 1880. The opinion states the case.

Mr. G. J. Patterson, for appellant.

Messrs. J. & J. Hemphill, contra.

August 9th, 1882. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. William Howze, late of Chester county, died in 1865, leaving a minor son, S. C. Howze, surviving, and others, his heirs-at-law. William C. Howze administered on his estate, and, finding it insolvent, he commenced action in 1869, to marshal the assets. Samuel C. Howze, the minor, was made a party, and answered by guardian ad litem. In his answer he claimed a homestead: the Circuit judge ordered a writ to issue to three commissioners therein named, to wit, to Elihu Lynn, John O. Hardin and Stephen R. Ferguson, commanding them to admeasure and lay off a homestead to this defendant. This order bears date September 23d, 1869.

From this order, and before action by the commissioners, an appeal was taken to this court. 2 S. C. 229. This court, in accordance with the previous case of In re Kennedy [2 S. C. 216], held that the ante-bellum debts of the deceased (all of his debts being ante-bellum, as he died in 1865), interposed no obstacle in the way of the homestead, nor did the fact of his decease being before the adoption of the constitution of 1868 present any *objection, and that the right of the claimant to the homestead depended upon the facts, whether William C. Howze died in possession of a dwelling-house * * * and whether the claimant was the head of a family. These facts not appearing in the proceeding, the case was remanded, the homestead to depend upon further investigation as to these.

On the return of the case to the Circuit Court, that court, April 19th, 1871, passed an order, directing C. S. Bryce, heretofore appointed receiver, to sell the real estate described in the pleadings: "So much as has been adjudged liable to the claim of, and assigned for homestead of S. C. Howze, one of the defendants, to be sold subject to said right of homestead. That the fee-simple estate of the remainder, if any, be sold," with other provisions in the order as to the distribution of the proceeds of sale not necessary to be mentioned here. On October 24th thereafter, two of the commissioners named in the original writ issued in 1869, to wit, Hardin, the present plaintiff, and Ferguson, with one Heath, not named in the writ, made a return in which they reported that, in pursuance of a writ of admeasurement of homestead for S. C. Howze, they had laid off and assigned to the said S. C. Howze, two hundred and seventy acres for homestead, which is the land now in dispute. It does not appear that this paper was ever recorded, nor that any action was taken thereon by the court. S. C. Howze seems to have been in possession, which he retained until after he became of age, when he went to Texas, whether to remain permanently or not does not fully appear. In his own testimony, he stated that he was twenty-eight years of age; that he left South Carolina in 1879, and went to Texas on a visit, and had intended all the time to return as soon as he made money enough to pay expenses; that he was farming in Texas, on shares.

Under the order of April 19th, 1871, C. S. Bryce, the receiver, sold the real estate of William Howze according to the terms of the order, to Hemphill, who, having transferred his bid to Hardin, the plaintiff, the receiver executed a deed to Hardin on November 8th, 1871, in which he conveyed three hundred acres, more or less, to him, "subject, nevertheless, to the right and claim of

S. C. Howze to a homestead in the same, *as has been or may be adjudged by the decree and judgment of the court in that behalf."

This action is to recover possession of the land by Hardin, who claims under the deed from Receiver Bryce. The defendants all lived on the land, when the action commenced, except S. C. Howze. The jury found the land in dispute for the plaintiff, except a portion which, previous to the action, had been conveyed by plaintiff to D. B. Cloud. This was excepted in the verdict.

The judge charged as is set forth in exceptions one and two below, and declined to charge as requested in exceptions three, four, five, six and seven. The defendants have appealed upon the following grounds:

1. "Because his Honor charged that the homestead was awarded in the case of Howze v. Howze, in the land in dispute, to S. C. Howze, until such time as he should arrive at the age of twenty-one years, and that after that time the purchaser was to take the land so assigned.

2. "Because his Honor charged that if S. C. Howze has attained twenty-one years, the plaintiff is entitled to recover the premises in dispute, or so much thereof as he has not parted with.

3. "Because his Honor refused to charge that the court in Howze v. Howze having decided that S. C. Howze was entitled to homestead, is conclusive that it was a homestead in accordance with the provisions of the constitution on that subject, and an intent to the contrary cannot be inferred.

4. "Because his Honor refused to charge that such homestead must have been assigned to S. C. Howze solely on the grounds that he was the head of a family, entitled under the constitution, and that the duration of enjoyment of said homestead is unlimited as to time.

5. "Because his Honor refused to charge that an intent on the part of the court in Howze v. Howze to decide as to the duration of S. C. Howze's homestead otherwise than in accordance with the constitution, is not to be inferred, except upon conclusive proof of such intent.

6. "Because his Honor refused to charge that there could be *no valid sale made of any reversionary interest in lands assigned to S. C. Howze for homestead, in Howze v. Howze.

7. "Because his Honor refused to charge, that it having been adjudged that S. C. Howze is entitled to a homestead in the lands in dispute, and the said lands having been assigned to him as a homestead by a court of competent jurisdiction, the plaintiff cannot impeach it in this collateral proceeding, either by showing that S. C. Howze was not entitled to homestead at all, or by showing that it had not been assigned to him as a homestead in accordance with the constitution, to wit, a homestead of unlimited duration."

We will consider the exceptions in the inverse order in which they are presented. The seventh assigns error, because the Circuit judge declined to charge that plaintiff could not impeach the homestead in this collateral proceeding, either on the ground that he was never entitled thereto, or that it had never been assigned to him, when it had been adjudged that he was entitled to it, and when it had been assigned to him by a court of competent jurisdiction.

It does not appear that the right of S. C. Howze to this homestead had ever been adjudged. The case of Howze v. Howze, supra, determined the conditions upon which he might be entitled, but it did not settle the fact that these conditions were present. The case was remanded to the Circuit Court to make this inquiry, so that the judge could not have properly charged the first branch of this request. The second was a question of fact which was beyond his province; whether, in fact, a homestead had ever been assigned, was for the jury.

In the third, fourth, fifth and sixth exceptions, the appellants contend that the homestead which S. C. Howze obtained, was obtained by virtue of the constitutional provision on the subject of homestead; that such a homestead is of unlimited duration, and that the judge should have so charged. At the time S. C. Howze made his claim, there was no act of assembly under which it could be secured. The act of 1868 did not meet his case. That provided a way for the widow and minor children of a deceased head of a family, who, at the time of his death, was entitled to a homestead, which this act continued for their *benefit. Gen. Stat. 476, § 6. The father of S. C. Howze died in 1865, years before the constitution was adopted. He was not, therefore, entitled to a homestead at his death. Such being the fact, the act of 1868 did not cover the claim of S. C. Howze, and the court so held. But it also held, that if he was entitled to it, it was under the constitutional provision, and the case was sent back to ascertain whether the constitutional requirements were in existence.

No doubt it was true, then, if S. C. Howze was entitled at all to his claim, it was directly under the constitution and independent of any act on the subject. Yet, what necessity was there for the judge to charge this. The material part of the request was as to its duration, and it would have been error for the judge to charge as requested on that question. For, while there is nothing in the constitutional provision which fixes a definite period or limit to a homestead, there is certainly nothing in it which makes it unlimited. The language of the constitution is: "That a family homestead of the head of each family * * * such homestead consisting of a dwelling-house, outbuildings, * * * shall be exempt from attachment, levy or sale on any mesne or final process from any court."

This provision neither creates or confers any new title or property upon the claimant, but simply stays the arm of the court from touching that already in existence, to wit, the family homestead, and in favor of the head of the family. When these two conditions exist, and are present together, to wit, the head of a family and a family homestead, consisting of a dwelling-house, &c., then the constitutional homestead is in existence, free from the process of any and all courts. Standing together, they occupy a charmed circle, thrown around them by the constitution, which no process can invade; but, disunited and apart, there is no exemption or protection so far as the constitution is concerned.

Apart from the acts on the subject, the question in every case would be, Is there a head of a family, and is that head in possession of a dwelling-house and out-buildings, such as are specified in the constitution as the material for homestead? If so, the process of the courts is paralyzed, and it stands thus paralyzed as long as these conditions are present. But when these conditions disappear, what is there in the constitution to stop the courts? We see nothing.

This does not apply to homesteads obtained under the acts of assembly which have been passed in pursuance of the constitution. Such homesteads are governed by the acts allowing them, both as to their duration and all other qualities; but we are discussing a homestead derived solely from the constitutional provision itself as in this case. Admitting, then, that S. C. Howze derived his homestead, if any, from the constitution, and in accordance with its provisions, yet that homestead, depending as it did for its existence upon the presence of the two conditions mentioned, and the duration of these conditions not necessarily being unlimited, it would have been error for the judge to have charged that, after assignment, the homestead was necessarily unlimited as to time.

This claim is a peculiar and isolated claim; such a case can never arise again. The father of the claimant died before the adoption of the constitution, and before any act on the subject of homestead was passed. If it was now before the court for the first time, no doubt the claim would be dismissed upon several grounds. Standing as it does, however, we have considered it upon its own peculiar facts, and upon principles applicable to the case as made.

Exceptions one and two complain because the Circuit judge charged that the homestead expired when S. C. Howze reached his majority. We know of no authority to sustain the position of the charge. The homestead which was assigned, if any, was under the principles laid down in Howze v. Howze, supra.

That case was, no doubt, decided erroneously, but still it was a decision of the court of last resort in the State, and it was the law for all time in that case, and authority in all other similar cases until overruled. It held that the right of S. C. Howze to the homestead which he claimed, depended, not upon his minority, but upon the two questions of fact which the case was sent back to have determined upon a new trial, to wit, whether the land upon which the homestead was claimed contained the dwelling-house of the deceased William Howze, and whether S. C. Howze was the head of a family.

We cannot see, therefore, what the minority of S. C. Howze had to do with the case. Under the case of Howze v. Howze, his right depended upon the fact that he was the head of a family, and this without regard to the question whether he was a minor or not, and if he became entitled to it upon that ground, there can be no reason that it should be lost when he becomes of age, and because he arrives at age. If he obtained it while under age, because he was the head of a family, why should he not hold it after reaching his majority, if he still remains the head of a family?

We do not think that the questions raised by respondent can be considered in this case. It is admitted that the principles laid down in In re Kennedy and in Howze v. Howze were erroneous, but when the claim of this party was adjudicated, these principles controlled, and his rights became fixed; and whatever those rights may be, they are beyond assault. We think there was error in the charge of the judge as to the duration of this homestead, and on that account the case must be remanded for a new trial.

The main questions in this case, and those which should control in the new trial, are chiefly questions of fact. First, was a homestead ever assigned to S. C. Howze in accordance with the opinion of this court in the case of Howze v. Howze? If so, the plaintiff bought, subject to this homestead; if not, he bought free from it. The dates of the different orders and papers, the statements in the brief, and the language in plaintiff's deed, leave it in great doubt whether, as a matter of fact, any homestead was ever legally laid off and assigned, in such way as to have become complete and a bar to the purchaser at the sale ordered by the court. Whether S. C. Howze is still the head of a family in the sense of those terms as used in the constitution, is another question of fact, and, if not, whether the homestead, though once assigned, under the peculiar circumstances of this case, can be protected?

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed, and the case be remanded for a new trial.

*STATE v. MANCKE.

[1. Intoxicating Liquors ⚭101.]

A city license, dated in July, to retail liquors to December 31st, gave no license to sell in the January preceding, although the tax had then been in part paid, and it was customary to pay in two installments.

Before Wallace, J., Richland, March, 1882.

The opinion states the case.

Messrs. U. R. Brooks, R. A. Lynch, for appellants.

Messrs. Solicitor Bonham, Abney & Abney, contra.

August 9th, 1882. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. The defendant was indicted for retailing without a license on January 15th, 1881, in the city of Columbia. He admitted that he had sold spirituous liquors as alleged in the indictment, but insisted that, at the time, he had a license from the city council of Columbia. He produced the following papers:

"Columbia, S. C., January 13th, 1881.

"Received from Julius H. Mancke, fifty dollars on account of license for the current year.

"$50. Richard Jones,
["Seal.] City Treasurer."

*82

"*This must be displayed in a conspicuous place.

"No. 853. City License.

"State of South Carolina, Columbia, July 20th, 1881." }

"Mr. J. H. Mancke—Licensed by the city council of Columbia to carry on the business of retailing in this city at corner of Washington and Richardson streets until December 31st, 1881.

"R. Jones, City Clerk and Treas.

"Richard O'Neale, Jr., Mayor."

It was in evidence that the license for the last two years had been $100 each year for the city of Columbia; that the city generally gave persons taking out license the privilege of paying the $100 in two installments; that the license of defendant for the year previous expired on December 31st, 1880, and that the receipt above, given on January 13th, 1881, for $50 was for the first installment of the city license for 1881; and that it was understood that the other $50 would be paid when called for.

The license above given on July 20th, 1881, was issued when the second $50 was paid, and no other license was issued for that year. The city clerk was directed by the mayor to issue no licenses until the city tax of $100 was paid, and also the county tax of $100, imposed by the act of 1880. The defendant never offered to pay the county tax or proved that he had paid the same. The Circuit judge held that the act of December 24th, 1880, was of force on January 13th, 1881, when the defendant paid the first $50 on account of license, and that, before getting license, the defendant should not only have made his arrangements as to the city license, but have shown that he had paid the county tax of $100 imposed by the act of 1880. Under the ruling of the judge, the jury found the defendant guilty, and he appeals to this court upon the following exceptions:

1. For that his Honor charged the jury that the act entitled "An act to further regulate the sale of spirituous liquors in this State," approved December 24th, 1880, took effect and became of force on the day of its approval by the executive.

2. For that his Honor charged the jury that the receipt *issued by Richard Jones, clerk of the city council of Columbia, dated January 13th, 1881, and bearing the impress of the seal of the corporation, for $50 on account of license for the year 1881, was not such evidence as would show that the city council had granted a license to the defendant to sell liquor from the first day of January, 1881.

3. For that his Honor should have charged the jury that no other day being specially named in the act prohibiting the sale of spirituous liquors, the act did not go into effect until twenty days after its approval, and that the city council having granted a license to the defendant to sell liquor during the year 1881, before the act took effect, to wit, on January 13th, 1881, the jury should bring in a verdict of not guilty.

4. That the act entitled an act "to further regulate the sale of intoxicating liquors in this State" is unconstitutional and void— (1) Because it violates section 21 of article I. of the constitution of South Carolina in this, that it impairs the obligation of the contract entered into between the city of Columbia and the defendant in the matter of license. (2) Because it violates section 38 of article I. of the constitution by depriving the defendant of his property by statute. (3) Because it violates section 9 of article I. of the constitution of the United States in this, that the act does not exempt from its provisions imported liquors to be sold in bulk.

5. That this act did not go into effect until the twentieth day after approval of the act.

Did the defendant have a license to retail when he sold spirituous liquors on January 15th, 1881? He certainly did not have any written evidence of a license in terms. His license for the year 1880 had expired, and the only evidence of a license which he then had was the receipt for $50, given on January 13th, 1881. It is true, that afterwards, when the grand jury had returned "no bill" on indictments which had been given out in like cases, the clerk of the council, on July 20th, 1881, did issue a license for the last half of the year, and it is insisted, under the authority of the case of City Council v. Corleis, 2 Bailey 186, that the license granted in July had reference back and covered also the first six months of the year.

*That case does hold that "the grant of a license to retail spirituous liquors from a day past, is a release of the penalties for retailing without license subsequent to that day, although prior to the taking out of a license." But this case is not at all analogous to that, which was a civil action for a penalty which the plaintiff had waived. Here the license was granted on July 20th, and does not name any day in the past from which the license was to run; but, on the contrary, is only prospective in its terms, "until December 31st, 1881." And instead of the intention being that it should have retroactive operation, the exact contrary is true. Mayor O'Neale testifies that he instructed the clerk not to issue a license until the party had complied with the State law; and the clerk testifies that no license was issued to the defendant for the first six months of the year 1881. So that even if the act of 1880 had never been passed, the defendant had no license to retail on January 15th, 1881.

But on December 24th, 1880, was approved the "Act to further regulate the sale of intoxicating liquors in this State" (17 Stat. 459), which, among other things, provides that "no license for the sale of intoxicating liquors shall be granted by any municipal authorities in any city, town or village in this State, except upon the payment by the person applying for the same to the treasurer of the county in which such city, town or village is located, the sum of $100 in addition to the license charged by such city, town or village, for the use of such county," &c. The city council of Columbia was positively inhibited by this law from granting license to any applicant for the year 1881, without proof that such applicant had paid to the treasurer of the county of Richland $100 in addition to the license charged by the city. There is no evidence that the defendant made such payment to the county, and if the municipal authorities of the city had actually granted a license to him without such payment (of which there is no evidence), such pretended grant, being in direct violation of the law, would have been absolutely void.

It is argued, however, that the act of 1880 did not take effect until "the twentieth day" after its approval by the governor, according to the act of 1879, which provides "that no act or joint resolution, enacted or passed by the general assembly of *this State, * * * shall take effect or become of force until the twentieth day after its approval by the executive, unless some other day be specially named in the body of the act as the day upon which such act shall take effect," &c. The first section of the act of 1880 commences with these words: "That from and after the passage of this act, no license," &c.; but it is contended that, although in the body of the act, these words do not name specially any other day upon which the act was to take effect, and, therefore, it was not made an exception to the rule established by the act of 1879.

By section 22, article III. of the constitution, every act of the legislature becomes a law as soon as it is approved by the governor, unless its operation is postponed by some competent authority. Ex parte DelHay, 3 S. C. 564. Although it is recognized that one legislature cannot absolutely bind another upon subjects of substantial legislation, yet the legislature of 1879 endeavored, by the act of that year, to establish a convenient and just regulation in a matter merely administrative in its character, to which subsequent legislatures have conformed by so declaring when it was their intention that an act should go into operation immediately upon its passage. We have no doubt that it was the intention of the legislature to make the act of 1880 an exception, and to give it the force of law upon its approval by the governor. It is not usual to insert in an act that it is to take effect "from and after its passage." That sentence could not have been put in the body of this act for no known purpose, except to take it out of the provisions of the act of 1879 and put it into immediate operation. The year was about to close, and there were many reasons why the act should go into operation immediately.

But assuming that such was the intention of the legislature, it is insisted that the words used were not sufficient to accomplish the purpose; that no other day is specially named as the act requires. It was substantially admitted in the argument, that if the identical words "from and after the passage of this act" had been expressed in a separate section at the end of the act (as in the immigration act approved on the same day), there could have been no reasonable doubt about it.

We incline to *think that they are sufficient, as they stand, to indicate the intention of the legislature to put the act in force immediately. "From and after the passage of this act" referred to the whole act, and meant from and after the day (December 24th) on which the act should be approved by the governor, as certainly as if that day had been "specially named." The only reason why the day of the month was not named, was because it could not then be foreseen on what day it would be approved by the governor.

But for the purposes of this case it is not necessary to make this ruling. There is no doubt that the act was approved by the governor on December 24th, and, counting that day, the twenty days fixed by the act (as December had thirty-one days) expired at twelve o'clock on the night of January 12th, which was before defendant paid his first $50 on January 13th, and took his receipt, which, he claims, was substantially a license from the city authorities. He certainly had no pretense of license before that day. In any view, then, the act was in operation on January 13th, 1881, and the city council had no authority to grant a license unless the applicant produced the evidence that he had paid the $100 to the county, which the act required. Arnold v. United States, 9 Cranch 119 [3 L. Ed. 671]; Krom v. Levy, 60 N. Y. 126.

In the case from Cranch, Judge Story said: "It is contended that this statute (passed July 1st) did not take effect until July 2d. We cannot yield assent to this construction. The statute was to take effect from its passage; and it is a general rule that when the computation is to be made from an act done, the day on which the act is done is to be included." In the New York case, it was said: "The New York statute fixing the time from which a statute shall take effect, provides 'every law, unless a different time be prescribed therein, shall commence and take effect * * * on and not before the twentieth day after the day of its final passage.' The act prohibiting appeals to this court in cases involving less than $500, was passed on May 2d, 1874, and did not provide when it should take effect. The twenty-second day of May was the twentieth day after its final *passage, and consequently it became a law the instant that day began."

There is nothing in the objection that the act of 1880 is unconstitutional. We have just seen that the defendant had made no contract with the city council in regard to license for the year 1881, before the act went into operation, and, therefore, no question can arise as to impairing such a contract.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

Ex parte BROWN AND WIFE et al. Ex parte LAYNE, GIBBES v. GREENVILLE AND COLUMBIA RAILROAD CO. STATE, ex relatione ATTORNEY-GENERAL, v. SAME.

[1. Interest ⇨22.]

Claims for damages sued against a corporation itself while in the hands of receivers and reduced to judgment, (in one case by consent of the officers of the corporation, who were also the receivers,) and afterwards presented and allowed as original claims against the receiver's fund, are not entitled, as against that fund, to interest, either from the date of the judgments or from the order giving to them the right of payment—such order not having fixed the amounts due.

2. The decision in Ex parte Brown and Wife, 15 S. C. 518, considered and declared.

[3. Receivers ⇨163.]

[Judgments were recovered against a railroad corporation, the property of which afterwards passed into a receiver's hands. The judgment creditors appeared before the court of equity having jurisdiction of the winding up of the affairs of the corporation, and obtained an order that the receiver pay the amounts of the judgments in preference to the claims of certain lien creditors. No order was made concerning interest. Held, that interest was not payable by the receiver; that the judgments were ordered paid, not because they were judgments, but because they were claims which a court of equity should recognize.]

Before Fraser, J., Richland, December, 1881.

At the hearing of this appeal, Hons. A. P. ALDRICH and J. H. HUDSON, Circuit judges, sat in the places of the CHIEF JUSTICE and Mr. Justice MCGOWAN, who had once been of counsel in the causes. This appeal is a sequel to the case to be found reported in 15 S. C., at page 518. The opinion fully states the case.

Mr. W. C. Benet, for Brown and wife et al., appellants.

*Mr. J. E. Bacon, for Layne, appellant.

Mr. James Conner, for respondents.

August 21st, 1882. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice HUDSON. In 1872 the Greenville and Columbia Railroad Company was adjudged insolvent by the Circuit Court of Richland; but its president and directors were authorized to continue in the management and control of the road, subject, however, to the orders of the court. On an appeal heretofore heard by this court, it has been held that the effect of the orders of May and June, 1872, on circuit, was to make the officers of said company receivers of the road, though not so designated, eo nomine.† During the period when these orders were in force, to wit, in 1874, the aforesaid petitioners, except Mrs. Layne, received bodily injuries from an accident whilst traveling as passengers on the cars of the said company. To recover damages for these injuries, they instituted actions against the company in the Court of Common Pleas for Anderson, which, being transferred to Abbeville, judgments were there recovered at a term held April 22d, 1878.

The action of Elizabeth J. Layne was instituted by her as administratrix of the personal estate of her deceased husband, to recover damages for his death, caused by the bursting of the company's locomotive. Mr. Layne was an engine-driver in the employment of the company. This action was brought to trial at Newberry, September 15th, 1877, when, by way of compromise, the plaintiff was allowed to take judgment for $2,000, of which sum $500 was to be paid in cash, and the balance in monthly installments of $90. Such was the arrangement between the plaintiff and the attorneys representing the company.

On November 23d, 1878, at a term of the Circuit Court held for the county of Richland, at Columbia, Judge Pressley, on due application, and for good cause shown, duly appointed James Conner, Esq., receiver of the property of the said company, and, by an appropriate order, conferred upon him the requisite powers, duties and responsibilities pertaining to that office. Thus, the *status of the company became clearly defined, and creditors, in compliance with the order of the court, began to come forward and establish their claims before the master. Accordingly the petitioners came in, and, by special allegations in their respective petitions, claimed the right to establish their claims against the receiver, and to be paid out of the fund in his hand arising from current income, in preference of mortgagees and other existing lien creditors.

In March, 1880, it was referred to the master to inquire into and report upon the merits of these claims; and on May 17th, 1880, he reported against their right to priority. On July 26th, 1880, the Circuit Court, sustaining the master, decreed that the petitioners had no equity to a share of income in the hands of the receiver superior to the equities of mortgagees and other lien creditors. On appeal to this court, the decree of the Circuit Court was reversed, the higher equity of the petitioners sustained, and the causes were remanded to the Circuit Court for adjudication in accordance with the judgment of this court. Ex parte Brown and Wife, 15 S. C. 518.

On November 1st, 1881, the Circuit Court, in order to carry out the judgment of this court, referred it to the master to ascertain and report the amounts of the several demands of the petitioners. On a hearing before the master, under this order of reference, a contest arose as to the sums to be recovered in each case; and after hearing argument, he reported that the petitioners were each entitled to recover and to receive out of the fund in the hands of the receiver, the amount of the principal, interest and costs of the judgment recovered against the company in the several actions at law before they presented their petitions to be paid from the receiver's fund.

At this reference, as also at the previous one, the parties mutually agreed that they would not renew the controversy which was originally had before the court at Abbeville and Newberry, to wit, the right of the petitioners to recover damages, but would accept the amount found by the jury in each case as the correct assessment of the damages. The petitioners thereupon claimed that they should recover on said verdicts or judgments all interest and costs, whilst the receiver claimed *that the demand of each petitioner against the fund in his hand did not rest upon the judgment, but upon the original cause of action, and was, therefore, unliquidated, and could not be augmented by any interest or costs.

On exceptions to the master's report awarding to each claimant the full amount of his judgment, interest and costs, the Circuit judge reversed the same and sustained the proposition of the receiver. The Circuit judge held that these claims are for unliquidated damages, and bear no interest; that they are not enforceable against the receiver's fund as judgments. Against this fund (he continues) they never have been in judgment, and the judgments from Abbeville and Newberry were only used in evidence by consent as a convenient mode of ascertaining the amount of damages in each case, it being far less expensive, and just as reliable, as to have summoned the witnesses and had a trial de novo, which might have been insisted upon. If these claims had been merged in the judgments, they would have lost that high equity on which alone they were entitled to be paid. They cannot throw off their character as judgments in order to get a standing on the equity side of the court, and again resume it in order to recover interest. Reasoning thus, the Circuit judge allowed to the petitioners the principal of their respective judgments and the costs thereon, but disallowed the interest.

From this judgment the petitioners appeal, and allege for error in the Circuit decree, that it holds that these judgments were not recovered against the receivers; that these claims are not enforceable in the Court of Equity as judgments; that they are for unliquidated damages, and do not bear interest. In this judgment the Circuit judge is correct. In the judgment of this court, in which the equitable character of these claims is established, no weight whatever is given to them because they were sued to judgment against the corporation; but, on the contrary, this court took occasion to say that those actions unnecessarily embarrassed and complicated the matter. They were adjudicated solely upon the ground of the meritorious character of the original cause of action. In fact, this court says, in that judgment: "These claims are pressed in this case, not on account of *their rank as judgments, but on account of the cause of action on which those judgments are based. It would have been more regular to have based the claims in the Court of Equity at once on these several causes of action. This, however, would have opened the cases anew, and led to a very long and expensive investigation." In the further consideration of the questions then before the court, these claims are treated, not as judgments, nor allowed as such, but are dealt with as unliquidated demands presented for proof before the Circuit Court sitting in equity, and, as such, were adjudged to have superior equities to be paid from the receiver's fund. That judgment expressly holds that these claimants, so far as they seek payment from the income of the road in the receiver's hand, cannot be treated as lien creditors.

Against the corporation they hold judgments, and these judgments, as liens, take their due rank with other judgments against the company. Against the receiver's fund, however, they come divested of their character as judgments, and rest solely upon the equities of the original cause of action. Counsel for the appellants are in error in supposing that the judgments recovered at Abbeville and Newberry are judgments against the receivers. Those actions have none of the forms of suits against receivers, but are, in every feature, actions at law against the company, and the judgments are entered up accordingly. There is naught in the actions, nor in the defenses, which impresses upon them any equitable character, nor special claim to priority. Not until these petitions were filed on the equity side of the court in Richland, were suits instituted against the receiver, and against the fund in his hand they have never been put in judgment, the amount to which they are respectively entitled being still a matter of contention. When that contention is ended, and the amount of each definitely fixed by final judgment, then, and not till then, will they bear interest.

Had they never brought suit against the company at Abbeville and Newberry, but delayed the presentation of their claims until 1879, when they were eventually, and in due form, presented against the receiver, with a special claim of payment out of the fund in his hands, it is evident that the only recovery

*which could have been had would have been the amount of damages received from the injuries in 1874, without interest. Now, the recovery of judgments against the company does not alter the case, nor affect, in the slightest, the amount to which they are entitled out of the receiver's fund. In the subsequent suit against him, he could have treated each claim res integra, and demanded proof anew. This was dispensed with only as a convenient mode of saving expense and shortening litigation; and the parties went to trial upon the equities of the claims, and the question of priority, taking the findings of the juries as the basis of recovery, if recovery could be had.

From this view of the case, it is contended by the counsel for Elizabeth J. Layne, that her claim must be excepted, because the judgment in her behalf, at Newberry, was by special consent, and stipulated to be paid in certain installments. We do not regard this as altering the case. Notwithstanding this stipulation of counsel for the company, it stands, nevertheless, just as the others do—as a judgment against the corporation. In asking to be paid out of the receiver's fund prior to lien creditors, for damages resulting from the death of her husband, Mrs. Layne can take nothing from this consent judgment more than the other petitioners from their judgments recovered against consent. As claims upon the receiver's fund, in a court of equity, all stand upon the same footing, and are based, not upon judgments recovered against the corporation, but upon the high equities inhering in the original cause of action.

Upon the quantum of damages or question of interest, her counsel also insists that interest on the judgment should be allowed, at least from the date when this court decided that the petitioners are entitled to prior payment from the receiver's fund. But it must be borne in mind that, in that judgment, this court did not fix the amount of recovery, but only the right of priority to which claims of this character are entitled. Hence, that judgment does not give a day from which interest is to be computed, because it fixes no sum to be recovered. The controversy was as to the right to be paid out of income, and not as to the amount. That question was never raised and brought directly in issue until it was submitted to the master by the *order of the Circuit Court of date November 1st, 1881, referring it to him to ascertain and report the amount of each of these claims.

Wherefore, it is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed, and the appeals in these cases dismissed.

Mr. Justice McIVER concurred.

Mr. Justice ALDRICH, dubitante. I am not so well satisfied with the conclusion reached by the court as expressed in the opinion of his Honor, Judge Hudson, and now proceed to give the reasons of my doubt.

The jurisdiction of law and equity are now blended in one court; therefore, in administering the law, we should be careful to preserve the equity of the case. Let me illustrate by taking the case of Mrs. Layne. So far as she is concerned, no damages can restore the slaughtered husband, or alleviate the mental agony of the bereaved wife. The verdict is not intended as compensation, but to afford the widow a scanty support for the loss she has sustained from the negligence of the company in whose service her husband lost his life, at the post of duty. The liability of the company was incurred when the accident happened. The extent of that liability was fixed when the jury assessed her damages. It does seem to me, in equity and good conscience, the verdict should bear interest.

We have said the railroad company is liable. Instead of paying these lawful debts at once to the injured parties, every obstruction that the courts afford has been thrown in the way. In the case of this bereaved widow, she has been compelled to maintain a protracted litigation, incurring long delay and heavy expense, thus diminishing the compensation for the grievous burden she has been compelled to bear, and thus adding suspense, anxiety and hope deferred to her sad fate. Now she is turned away on a technical construction without interest, the corporation having used the damages awarded to her in the prosecution of their business. It is true, the judgments were not recovered against the receiver, but against the corporation. The receiver *represented the corporation; and can there be a doubt, if the cases had been again submitted to a jury, they would have provided, in their verdict, against a loss of interest by increasing the damages? I think not. If no receiver had been appointed the verdicts would have borne interest. It is the same company, when the master made his report, that it was when the injuries were sustained.

It does seem to me like straining a point, because the verdicts were accepted as the amount of assessments of the damages instead of bringing a new suit against the receiver, the interest on the same shall not be computed. I do not see, clearly, how this is in derogation of the rights and equities of other creditors. These creditors are entitled to preference, if for no other reason, because of their diligence in pressing their claims to judgment. But, I suppose, I must yield to the weight of authority and the concurring opinion of the three able judges, who have considered the case as carefully as I have. I reluctantly concur and sign the judgment of the court, doubting.

Judgment affirmed.

BELL v. TOWELL.

(April Term, 1882.)

[1. Wills ⇨3.]

A will, executed in 1857 by a testator who died in 1881, is governed by the provisions of the act of 1858 as modified in the General Statutes of 1872, and, therefore, passes after-acquired real property, the terms of the will being sufficiently comprehensive for that purpose.

[3. Executors and Administrators ⇨138.]

A testator directed the residue of the estate, after payment of debts, to be kept together on the place whereon testator then lived, and as his children (who were then minors) married or became of age, the executors were empowered to give off such property as they deemed necessary; the property given to the daughters to belong to them and their bodily heirs; if any daughter died and left no issue, the said property to be returned and divided among the other children; if the wife married, the whole estate was to be sold and divided between wife and children, share and share alike; and if the wife never married, at her death the whole estate was *to be sold and equal division made among the children. Before testator's death, the wife died, and all the children became of age and married. Held, that the power given to the executors lapsed and never went into operation.

Before Cothran, J., Edgefield, October, 1881.

This was an action by John M. Bell as executor of George Bell deceased, against Angeline M. Towell, Elizabeth R. Landrum, Henrietta M. Timmerman and Emily G. Shaw, commenced in September, 1881, for a construction of testator's will, which is copied in full in the opinion of this court.

The Circuit decree was as follows:

This action is submitted on the complaint and answer of defendants. The plaintiff asks for a construction of the will of his testator, and for a writ of partition of testator's real estate. The testator, George Bell, departed this life August 16th, 1881, leaving of force his last will and testament, the provisions of which are fully set forth in the complaint.

The testator's will bears date in the year 1857. Salome Bell, the wife of the testator, died soon after the date of testator's will, and many years before the death of testator. The will of testator was made when he resided on the Mine Creek Place described in the complaint. The testator removed from said place and resided elsewhere for several years before his death. He owned the Mine Creek Place and the Pinelands, described in the complaint, at the time that he made his will. The testator acquired all the rest of the real estate, described in the complaint, after the date of his will and after the death of his wife. The will is as follows: * * *

*The first question that arises upon the construction of said will, is as to what estate the daughters take under the first provision of said will. The words are as follows: "The property that may be given to my daughters shall belong to them and their bodily heirs. If any one of my daughters shall die and leave no issue, then said property shall be returned back and divided among my other children or their children." The daughters take a fee-conditional under these words of the will. If any of them die, leaving no issue, the shares of such go to the other children of testator or their children as purchasers.

The next question of importance in the construction of said will is, whether the shares of the daughters in the entire estate of the testator are subject to the provisions above stated; that is, whether their respective shares in the whole of said estate are to be held as a fee-conditional, and are subject to revert to testator's estate in case of their death, leaving no issue surviving them? Nothing was given off to any of the children of testator under the first provision of the will, nor was the estate kept together and managed as was contemplated by the second provision of the will. The testator survived his wife, and the latter never married, and the sale and division of the property upon her marriage or death, as provided by the second and third provisions, never took place. These two provisions of the will became inoperative, and the scheme of testator was defeated by the death of his wife. The first provision of the will applies to the property of testator owned by him at the date of the will, and the daughters take a fee-conditional in that part of the estate.

The testator died intestate as to all his after-acquired estate, real and personal; and this property acquired by him after the date of his will is divisible among his heirs-at-law under the statutes for the distribution of intestate estates, and does not pass under his will, and is not subject to any of the provisions thereof.

The Mine Creek and Pinelands places are subject to be divided equally between testator's children, the shares of the daughters therein to revert to the estate in case any of them die, leaving no issue. The other lands are divisible in equal shares *in fee among testator's heirs, who are his children, the plaintiff and defendants in this action. It is not necessary that said lands and more particularly those which are herein adjudged to pass under the will, be sold if they can be fairly and equally divided. The personal estate of testator that was not kept on the Mine Creek Place is intestate property, and is divisible among testator's heirs-at-law. It is therefore ordered that a writ of partition be issued, &c.

From this decree all parties appealed.

Messrs. Norris & Folk, for plaintiff.

Mr. James Aldrich, for Mrs. Landrum, and Messrs. H. W. Addison, Bettis & Wardlaw, for the other defendants.

October 2d, 1882. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. George Bell departed this life August 16th, 1881, seized and possessed of a considerable estate, consisting for the most part of eight different tracts of land situate in the counties of Edgefield and Aiken. He left, surviving him, five children, one son, the plaintiff, and four daughters, the defendants. He left a will which had been executed as far back as 1857, when his wife Salome was alive, and his children were all minors, living in his family. At that time the testator owned only two tracts of land, the old homestead whereon the family resided, and an adjoining tract known as "the Pinelands." All the other tracts of land of which he died seized were acquired after the execution of his will. Soon after he made his will, Salome, his wife, for whom ample provision was made, died, and his children all grew up and married before his death in 1881. Upon that event, John M. Bell, one of the children, and the sole qualified executor, instituted these proceedings for construction of the will, which is as follows:

"First. After all my just debts are paid and discharged, the residue of my estate, real and personal, shall be kept together on the place whereon I now live; and as my children marry or *become of age, I empower my executrix and executors to give off such negroes and other property as they may deem necessary; and the property that may be given to my daughters shall belong to them and their bodily heirs. If any one of my daughters shall die and leave no issue, then said property shall be returned back and divided among my other children or their children. My will also is, that my beloved wife Salome and children, viz., John M. Bell, Elizabeth R. Bell, Angeline M. Bell, Henrietta M. Bell and Emily G. Bell, shall remain on the said plantation where I now live. My wife (Salome Bell) shall use the proceeds of the farm for the benefit and use of the family and herself; if there shall be anything left over the support of the estate, it shall be disposed of as the executrix and executors may think most advantageous to the estate. And if my beloved wife should marry, then my whole estate shall be sold and equally divided between my wife, Salome, and my five children named, share and share alike with all. If my wife never marries, then at her death my whole estate shall be sold and equal division made among my children. Likewise, I make, constitute and appoint my beloved wife, Salome Bell, John M. Bell and John Denny, executrix and executors of this my last will and testament."

The Circuit judge held that the property owned by the testator in 1857, when he executed his will, alone passed under it; that by the terms of the first paragraph, the daughters respectively took a life estate in their shares of that property, with limitation over to their brother and sisters "if they should die and leave no issue." But that all the property acquired by the testator, after the execution of his will, did not pass thereunder, but was intestate and subject to division under the statute of distributions in fee-simple, and ordered a writ of partition to issue for that purpose.

All the parties filed exceptions upon appeal to this court. John M. Bell and Mrs. Landrum insist that all the property owned by the testator at the time of his death passed under his will, and that the limitation attached to the property, which the executors were empowered to give off to the children in the lifetime of Mrs. Bell, should be held as applicable also to the shares *of the daughters in the whole estate. And the other daughters, whilst agreeing that all the property owned by the testator at the time of his death passed under his will, insist that by proper construction of the will all the property should be sold and equally divided among the children without limitation, according to the terms of the last paragraph, which has no connection with the other parts of the will.

The first question is, whether the will is to be considered as disposing only of the other property which was owned by the testator at the time of its execution, or as speaking at the time of his death. At common law, a will of personal property was ambulatory, taking effect only at the death, and, as a consequence, disposed of all property then possessed by the testator, without regard to the fact whether it was acquired before or after its execution, only provided the terms of the will were sufficient to cover such property; but, for reasons which it is unnecessary to state here, the rule was different as to real property, as to which the will only disposed of that which was owned by the testator at the time of its execution.

In 1791, it was enacted "that no lands or personal estate, which shall be acquired by any person after the making of his or her will, shall pass thereby (unless the said will shall be republished); but every such person shall be considered as having died intestate as to said lands and personal estate." 5 Stat. 163. In 1808, an act was passed which declared, "That any person acquiring personal property after making his will shall not be considered as having died intestate as to such personal property." 5 Stat. 573. In 1858, it was enacted "That real estate purchased or otherwise acquired after the making and publishing last wills and testaments shall pass by and under the same, in the same manner and to the same extent as personal estate now passes." 12 Stat. 700. In 1872, the previous acts upon the subject were repealed; but, at the same time, a provision as to after-acquired property, both real and personal, was adopted in the following words: "Land and personal property which shall be purchased or otherwise acquired by a person after the making of his or her will, shall pass thereby, and no one shall be considered as having died *intestate as to said lands and personal estate." Gen. Stat. 440.

This law is perfectly clear as to all wills executed after its adoption; but the question is made, whether it should apply to wills executed before that time. It will be observed that the common law was restored as to personal property before this will was executed, and, therefore, as to that kind of property, there can be no question here. But the repeal of the act of 1791, as to real property, did not take place until 1858, a year after this will was executed, and it is contended that, as to the lands, the will must be governed by the act of 1791.

The testator did not die until the year 1881. His will, from its nature, could not take effect until that time, and falls under the operation of the law then of force, which declares "that lands and personal property acquired by any person after making his or her will, shall pass thereby, and no person shall be considered as having died intestate as to said lands and personal estate." It has been held that this embraces wills executed before as well as after the passage of the act, provided only the testator died after that time, and the terms of the will are broad enough to cover such property. Means v. Evans, 4 Desaus. 243; Jarm. Wills 146, note.

There can be no doubt that the terms of this will are sufficient to cover all the property of which the testator died seized and possessed. The property is not particularly described, but is spoken of in general terms which are as applicable to property acquired after the execution of the will as to that owned at that time. It speaks of "the residue of my estate, real and personal," after his debts were paid, "the whole of my estate," &c. There is nothing in the will which indicates that the testator intended to limit its operation to the property owned by him at its date. "A residuary clause of all the testator's property of every kind and description whatever, covers all his interest in real estate otherwise undisposed of by the will, whether such interest be vested or future, contingent or reversionary." Williams v. Kibler, 10 S. C. 414; Scaife v. Thomson, 15 S. C. 358.

As the will covers and disposes of the whole estate, what is the proper construction of it? The paper is most unskillfully drawn. It is short and obscure, if not inconsistent, in its different parts. The difficulty of giving it satisfactory construction is increased by the fact that it was made more than twenty years before the death of the testator, when the property and the beneficiaries under it were in a very different condition from what they are now. In construing a will the leading object should be to discover the intention of the testator in the state of facts which have actually occurred, and to reach that intention it is necessary to read the will in the light of the circumstances surrounding the testator at the time it was made.

At the time this will was executed, Salome, the wife of the testator, was living and his children were all minors still in his family. He seemed to assume throughout that his wife would survive him, and her welfare during life and that of the young children during the period of nurture were manifestly the first objects of his bounty. He directed that his property should be kept together for the benefit of his wife and children during the life or widowhood of his wife, and in that view he empowered her, as executrix, and the other executors to give off to the children as they married or came of age, "such negroes and other property as they might deem necessary," declaring that "the property that may be given off to my daughters shall belong to them and their bodily heirs. If any of my daughters shall die and leave no issue, then said property shall be returned back and divided among my other children or their children." But the state of facts here provided for never actually occurred. Salome died long before the testator, and the children all grew up and married before his death. The power of the executors to give off property under this paragraph lapsed by the death of Salome and never went into operation.

The testator next provided for the possible case of his wife marrying again, but that never occurred, and the provision made to take effect in that event need not be considered. Finally, he directed that if his wife should never marry again, then, at her death, the whole estate should be sold and equal division made among his children. This event has occurred, except that, contrary to his expectations, her death occurred in his lifetime, the effect of which was to destroy the provision made for the wife and to postpone the operation of so much as related to the children until his own death, as the will could not take effect until that time. "It may be stated, as a general rule, that when the gift is to a designated individual, with a gift over in the event of his dying without having attained a certain age, or under a certain age, or under any other prescribed circumstances, and the event happens in testator's lifetime, the ulterior gift takes effect immediately on testator's decease, as a simple, absolute gift." 3 Jarm. Wills 618, note; Williams Exec. 1318; Dunlap v. Dunlap, 4 Desaus. 305.

In the last case cited, it is said: "It is certainly a general rule that if the legatee dies before the testator, the legacy shall be lapsed and sunk into the residuum of the testator's personal estate, although the legacy may be given to the legatee, his heirs, executors, administrators and assigns. But there are various exceptions to this rule, and, amongst others, one exception is, when the legacy is given over to others, after the death of the first legatee, for in such case the legatee in remainder shall have it immediately." The last paragraph of the will is operative as if Salome had survived her husband and died unmarried immediately after.

If Salome had survived her husband, and the executors had given off property to the children, it is at least doubtful even in that case (as none of the children died "without issue" in her lifetime), whether the words of the will were sufficient to create a good limitation over in that property, but without considering that question, we do not think that we are at liberty to take the words of limitation from the context in which they appear and transfer them to the last paragraph, which simply requires that upon the death of Salome all the property shall be sold and equal division made among the children.

It is true that in seeking after the intention of the testator, all parts of a will should be construed in relation to each other, so as, if possible, to form one consistent whole, but when the several parts of a will undertake to provide, each for a different state of facts, it cannot be affirmed, in the absence of any such expression, that his intention was the same in all the cases. Under such circumstances, we cannot venture to take part of a provision made for one state of facts, and interpolate it upon another provision made for a state of facts entirely different. It may be possible, but we cannot hold that it was the intention of the testator, to limit over the property directed by the last paragraph to be sold and equally divided among the children. The words of limitation, by their place in the will, and the manner in which they are stated, indicate that they were intended to apply to the property which the testator understood might be given off under the first paragraph, which never went into effect. If the testator intended that the limitation should apply to the property to be taken in the final division, he should have so said, and in that case he would probably have directed the property itself divided, instead of ordering it to be sold and the proceeds divided.

The whole estate passes under the will and must be administered according to the last paragraph, without regard to the words of limitation used in connection with the property which it was contemplated might be given off to the children by the executors under the first but inoperative paragraph of the will.

As the will positively directs a sale, the property itself cannot be partitioned except by consent of all parties.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be modified according to the principles and conclusions herein announced.

Before Aldrich, J., Pickens, January, 1882.

Indictment against James Turner for retailing without license. The opinion states the case.

Mr. T. H. Cooke, for appellant.

Mr. Solicitor Orr, contra.

October 6th, 1882. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McIVER. The defendant was convicted under an indictment for retailing spirituous liquors without a license, and sentenced to pay a fine of $200, or be imprisoned in the State penitentiary, at hard labor, for six months. He appeals upon four grounds: 1. "Because the evidence showed that the selling complained of occurred about October 15th, 1881, and that the defendant sold spirituous liquors in quantities of not less than three gallons, which he had the legal right to do, the act of 1783 being still of force in this State." 2. Because his Honor erred in charging the jury that any sale of spirituous liquors without license, in any quantity, outside of incorporated cities, towns and villages, is a violation of the act of 1880, regulating the sale of the same." The third ground makes, substantially, the same point as the second; and the fourth is the general ground that the judgment is, in other respects, contrary to the law and the evidence, which, it has been repeatedly held, will not be considered by this court.

It may well be questioned whether the evidence adduced in this case would enable the appellant to make the point intended to be raised by the first ground of appeal; for it seems from the testimony set out in the "Case," that the defendant agreed to sell three gallons to several different persons, and allowed them to take it away at different times, in such quantities as the purchasers might desire; and then follows this statement: "The proof further showed that any one could get whiskey from Turner, and in any quantity they desired. They simply signed a certificate that they would buy three gallons, and they took any quantity from a half pint up, paying for what they took away, and getting the remainder if they desired it. If they did not want it, they were not bound to take it. They all paid at the rate of $2 per gallon for the whiskey they got." Under this state of facts, it might well be doubted whether the defendant could have escaped conviction, even if there were no other law upon the subject than the act of 1783, sometimes called "the three-gallon law." For selling, as this defendant is represented to have done, nominally three gallons, but really any less quantity that the purchaser might choose to take, might well be regarded as an attempted evasion of the provisions of that act, which would subject a party, so selling, to the penalties of the law.

We are not disposed, however, to rest this case upon that ground, but rather to give the defendant the benefit of the most liberal view of the evidence, and to consider the case as if the defendant had in fact never sold spirituous liquors in any less quantities than three gallons. The point raised by the first ground of appeal is that inasmuch as the act of 1783 did not forbid a sale of three gallons or more, and inasmuch as that act has never been repealed, it is not now unlawful to sell in quantities not less than three gallons. This proposition rests upon the assumption that because that act made it a penal offense to sell spirituous liquors without a license, in less quantities than three gallons, it thereby authorized the sale of quantities of that amount or larger, for all time to come, or at least until that act was repealed. This assumption is without any foundation whatever.

The right to sell in any quantity was not derived from that act, but was a right existing before any act upon the subject was passed, and the only effect of that act was to limit this pre-existing right. So that whether the act of 1783 has been repealed or not, cannot affect the question now under consideration. While the act of 1783, so far as we are informed, has not in terms been repealed, yet it certainly has been superseded by *subsequent legislation upon the subject. Since the Legislature has forbid the sale of spirituous liquors in any quantities without a license, the previous law forbidding the sale in certain quantities, has unquestionably been superseded and rendered nugatory, as the general proposition must necessarily embrace the particular or special one.

The second ground of appeal, alleging error in the charge of the Circuit judge, cannot be sustained, as it is quite clear that the law was stated to the jury just as it is declared in the act of 1880 (17 Stat. 459). We presume, however, from the course of the argument here, that the main object of this ground was to assail the constitutionality of the act of 1880. The power of the Legislature to regulate the sale of spirituous liquors, has been too long and too well settled to admit of question at this late day. Experience has demonstrated that the unrestrained traffic in spirituous liquors is dangerous to the peace and welfare of society, and therefore it has long been settled that the law-making power may throw such restraints around that traffic as, in the judgment of that department of the government, may be necessary to secure the peace and welfare of society; and persons who wish to deal in such an article must conform to the regulations prescribed, or they cannot claim the right so to do. There is nothing in the constitution of the United States or of this State which forbids the Legislature from exercising this power. See the License Cases, 5 How. 504 [12 L. Ed. 256]; Heisembrittle ads. City Council, 2 McM. 233; City Council v. Ahrens, 4 Strob. 241.

We do not understand that the power of the legislature to do this is now controverted, as a general proposition, but the appellant contends that this particular act is open to objection because of what is called its discriminating features, and because it tends to deprive the citizen of his property and of his right to sell and dispose of it. The act in question does not deprive any citizen of the right to his property or forbid his using or disposing of it, but simply prescribes the regulations to which he must conform in disposing of it, so as to prevent his using or disposing of it in such a manner as would be detrimental to the interests of society. There is no discriminating feature in the act, for the same regulations apply alike to every citizen. To obtain a *license to sell spirituous liquors the law requires certain conditions to be complied with, and every one, without distinction, who complies with the prescribed conditions, can obtain a license, and no one who fails to comply with these conditions can procure a license.

Another point has been raised in the argument, which, though not taken in the exceptions or grounds of appeal, we propose to consider, inasmuch as it is a point of general importance that ought to be settled. The point is that, as the act of 1880 prescribes simply punishment by imprisonment for a violation of its provisions, without saying imprisonment in the State penitentiary, so much of the sentence in this case as imposes imprisonment in the penitentiary is illegal, as the defendant could only be imprisoned in the county jail. After the decision of this court in the case of State v. Hord, 8 S. C. 84, where it was held that a person convicted of a misdemeanor could not be sentenced to confinement in the penitentiary unless such punishment was prescribed by some statute, the act of March 12th, 1878, (16 Stat. 453,) entitled "An act to amend the law respecting the punishment for crime," was passed. That act declares "that in every case in which imprisonment is provided as the punishment, in whole or in part, for any crime, such imprisonment shall be, either in the penitentiary, with or without hard labor, or in the county jail, with or without hard labor, at the discretion of the Circuit judge pronouncing the sentence."

In the face of this act we do not see how it can be claimed that so much of the sentence in this case as imposes the punishment of imprisonment in the penitentiary is illegal. The appellant contends that the act of 1878 relates solely to those cases in which the law then prescribed the punishment of imprisonment, and cannot apply to cases in which the legislature has subsequently passed acts in which the punishment prescribed is by imprisonment simply, without saying imprisonment in the penitentiary, but that all such acts should be regarded as making provisions for themselves, and, in the absence of any provision as to the place of imprisonment, the rule established by the case of State v. Hord would apply.

We see no warrant for thus limiting the scope of the act of *1878. On the other hand, we regard it as a general law applicable to all cases in which punishment by imprisonment is prescribed, and that its object was to define what is meant by the term "imprisonment" whenever it is used in any statute. The object of it, as disclosed by its title, is to amend the law respecting the punishment for crime, and, inasmuch as the law had then recently been determined by the Supreme Court to be, that when imprisonment merely was prescribed as a punishment, such imprisonment could not be in the penitentiary unless the statute prescribing it so declared, the purpose of the legislature clearly was to alter or amend that rule of law by prescribing a rule which should apply "in every case," so that whenever such a punishment should be prescribed, the place of imprisonment should be fixed by the discretion of the judge pronouncing sentence. Hence, whenever a statute is found, whether passed before or after the act of 1878, "in which imprisonment is provided as the punishment," such imprisonment shall be either in the penitentiary or in the county jail, according as the judge pronouncing the sentence may, in his discretion, regard the one or the other most appropriate to the circumstances of the case.

We deem it proper to add that we do not desire this case drawn into a precedent for the practice of going outside of the points raised by the exceptions or the grounds of appeal.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

Before Thomson, J., Charleston, June, 1880.

This was an action by William Sharp against Henry W. Kinsman, commenced January 14th, 1880. The facts of the case are stated in the opinion. The presiding judge sustained a demurrer to the counter-claim, overruled a motion for nonsuit, and charged the jury as follows:

The plaintiff says that the defendant, Kinsman, on the 5th, 6th and 7th January, 1880, forcibly broke into and entered lands of the plaintiff. He claims that he is still the owner of the land. The man who rents land for a year, is entitled to the possession of it for a year, and I presume that he made this statement—that the land was his—meaning for a year. He then says that on a certain farm on Charleston Neck, the said farm being in possession of the plaintiff, and without the leave of the plaintiff, the said owner did forcibly enter and carry away the vegetables of the plaintiff, and otherwise injure the premises of the plaintiff, to the damage of $1,000. Now, what does the defendant say to that? The defendant says that the plaintiff rented about twenty acres of this farm. The defendant says that the plaintiff rented—he does not say that Green rented with the plaintiff. The question has been made in the testimony that Green was a partner, but the defendant's statement is that he was not a partner. The defendant, on the stand, stated that the plaintiff rented twenty acres of his farm, and, with a colored man, Green, was to pay rent. Does the proof correspond with his statement in the papers?

Now the next question is, that some time previous to last Christmas, the plaintiff abandoned the place and went away, no one could tell where, and, thereupon, this defendant made arrangements with the colored man, Green, to care, tend and gather said crop, which was done by the said man, Green—he *says, in other words, that finding this person gone, that he and Green made an arrangement to care and gather the crop, and I don't think the testimony, to any considerable extent, changes this. If Green was a partner, the plaintiff would have been affected by the notice that Green had, but Green not being a partner, the notice to Green is equal to no notice at all. I have put the parties where they have put themselves.

There is a good deal of disputed law here in relation to tenancy and notice to quit. Three months' notice, where there is a tenancy for a year, should be given, and the law requires that three months' notice, in writing, should be given; and, moreover, that is reciprocal, and if the tenant wants to quit, he should give the landlord three months' notice. You may consider first whether this notice has been given. It is rather a question of law to determine whether the parties are entitled to notice or not. I don't think it necessary, in the consideration of this case, to make any ruling upon the point whether or not there was any necessity to give three months' notice, because there is another question which I will submit to you, upon which I think the case should properly turn.

We will suppose, now, that notice was actually given. We will say that, for the sake of the case, that notice was required and that notice was given, and that at the end of the year he did not quit, but still remained on the place. Did that authorize the defendant to go and take the crop to pay himself? Suppose the notice was given, and that it was the duty of the man to quit, and, moreover, we may admit that he told the party that he would leave. The declaration of the tenant that he is going to leave does not constitute notice to quit. But we will assume that notice to quit was duly given, and that it was the duty of the party to leave; what was the next step on the part of the landlord? It was to have a trial before a trial justice to have him ejected—the law provides this. Did the landlord do this?

It seems that the plaintiff was there in January, February and March, and gathered turnips and carried them off. I don't know who is in possession now—possession will continue until a change of that possession occurs. About the end of the year this man returns. He was off and returned again in a few days. *What was the duty of the landlord? Suppose this had been for a debt? He would have gone to an attorney to issue an attachment. What I instruct you here is, that the defendant had no right to enter that land in such manner as he says he did. His duty was simply, at the end of a year, to take out a landlord's warrant and distrain upon the crop. He could have taken out a distress warrant, or he could have instituted proceedings to have him ejected; but it seems that he went on the place and took this crop. It does not appear that he went with any malicious intent, but it was, nevertheless, an illegal act. The law does not allow a man to take another by the collar and say, leave. He is bound to use the means which the law has given him. Thus it was that here the defendant committed an error. I have no doubt that he did it unintentionally; I suppose he thought it was cheaper, and you may find no very great harm in all this except that the act was illegal.

A man, however, must bear the consequences of an illegal act, and the question of damages is a question wholly for you. A counter-claim was set up here, but this is an action for tort, and no discount can be allowed. The law is always disposed to let its hand fall upon one who is not willing to abide by its provisions. I do not know that there was any ill-feeling shown in this case. You are bound to give the plaintiff the full value of the property that was taken. The defendant says he sold it for twenty dollars. You are authorized to give that and so much more as in your opinion would prevent the defendant from doing it again. A little smart money, as it is called. I don't think this is a case for vindictive damages, but I don't think, on the other hand, that the defendant is to be wholly excused. You should give the plaintiff the value of what has been taken, and then as much more as you think the defendant should pay; not punitive damages, but such an amount as you think would prevent a similar act again. I must say that the defendant appears to be a man of unexceptional character, but he appears to have been mistaken here. If you come to the conclusion that this plaintiff was wholly out of possession, and that all the other had to do was to enter and take possession, then it would go very far in mitigation of damages, but it would not justify him *in taking the crop, even if he was entitled to full possession—he had no right to take the crop—he could do that only under cover of law. If you think that the plaintiff was wholly out of possession, that would go very far to mitigate any damages that might arise in your mind, but he had no right to take the crop without process of law.

The jury found a verdict for plaintiff for $200, and judgment was entered accordingly. Defendant appealed.

The first, second, fifth and ninth exceptions are sufficiently stated in the opinion; the others were as follows:

3. Because his Honor erred in charging the jury that the defendant's statement is, that he (Green), was not a partner, when no such statement was made by the defendant, and when, as a matter of fact, Green, the witness of the plaintiff, testified that he was a partner.

4. Because his Honor erred in charging, as follows: "Green, not being a partner, the notice of Green was no notice at all. I have put the parties where they have put themselves."

6. Because his Honor erred in charging the jury on the facts in the case contrary to the provisions of the constitution of the State.

7. Because his Honor erred in overruling the counter-claim, the same having grown out of the same transaction.

8. Because his Honor erred in charging the jury: That in this case the jury was bound to give the value of the property, and, also, smart money.

Mr. J. B. Cohen, for appellant.

Messrs. McCrady & Sons, contra.

October 7th, 1882. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McIVER. The original plaintiff in this case having died pending this appeal, the action has been continued by an order of this Court, in the name of Warren Kinsman, as his administrator.

The object of the action was to recover damages for an alleged *trespass on a certain piece of land claimed to be in the possession of William Sharp. It seems that Sharp had rented about twenty acres of land from Kinsman for the year 1878, and also for the year 1879, and one of the questions in the case was whether the tenancy continued in 1880, the alleged trespass having been committed early in January, 1880, when the defendant entered upon the land and took up and carried away some of the vegetables growing on said land.

When the plaintiff closed his testimony the defendant moved for a non-suit upon the ground that by the plaintiff's own showing the lease terminated on the first day of January, 1880, and that the plaintiff had failed to show that he was in possession, either legally or illegally, when Kinsman entered, and also because the testimony showed that Kinsman had entered by the consent of one Green, the partner of the plaintiff, and was not, therefore, guilty of any trespass in so entering. The motion was refused, and this constitutes the basis of defendant's first ground of appeal. The determination of the motion for a non-suit depended entirely upon the view which the Circuit judge took of the testimony adduced by the plaintiff, and we see no error of law in the conclusion which he reached.

The second ground of appeal alleges that the Circuit judge "erred in holding that a tenant, under a lease for a year, is entitled to three months' notice to quit, and in failing to make the distinction between a tenancy for a year and a tenancy from year to year." It is true that the jury were told that "three months' notice, where there is a tenancy for a year, should be given, and the law requires that three months' notice in writing should be given," and that no distinction was drawn between a tenancy for a year and a tenancy from year to year; but the jury were told immediately afterwards: "I don't think it necessary, in the consideration of this case, to make any ruling upon the point whether or not there was any necessity to give three months' notice, because there is another question which I will submit to you, upon which I think the case should properly turn." So that even if there was error in what the judge said to the jury as to the necessity for notice to terminate a tenancy *for a year, yet such error would be immaterial, inasmuch as the jury were subsequently told that it was unnecessary to consider the question of notice in this case.

The third, fourth and sixth grounds of appeal will be considered together, as they all make, substantially, the same point, to wit: that the judge erred in charging the jury on the facts. These grounds, we think, are well taken. One of the questions of fact in the case was whether Green was a partner or a mere employé of Sharp, and the judge, in effect, took that question away from the jury, and instructed them that he was not a partner.

The fifth ground of appeal is based on a misapprehension of the judge's charge, and need not, therefore, be considered. We do not understand that the judge charged as is imputed to him in this ground of appeal, but that his charge on this part of the case simply amounted to this: that where a tenant holds over after the expiration of his lease, the landlord has no right to take the law into his own hands and proceed to eject the tenant, but that his duty would be to call to his aid the process of the law; and in this there certainly was no error.

The ninth ground of appeal alleges that the Circuit judge erred in charging the jury as follows: "If you think the plaintiff was wholly out of possession, that would go very far to mitigate any damages that might arise in your mind, but he had no right to take the crop without process of law." We cannot assent to the correctness of this instruction as we understand it. If the judge meant, as we suppose he did, to say to the jury that even if the tenancy of the plaintiff had been terminated, and the possession of the land had been surrendered or abandoned, so that there was no obstacle in the way of defendant's entering, still he could not take the growing crop without process of law, then we think there was error in the charge. If a tenant rents a piece of land for a year, upon which he plants a crop which will not mature so that it can be removed by the end of the year, and at the expiration of his lease abandons or surrenders the possession of the land, and the landlord enters and appropriates the growing crop left there by the outgoing tenant, we do not see how he can be said to have committed any trespass.

The eighth ground of appeal complains of error in the charge *as to damages. It does seem to us that while the jury were not told in so many words that they ought to give what was called "smart money," yet the manifest tendency of the charge upon the subject of damages was to invite the jury to give something more than the value of the property taken, and that the judge plainly indicated his opinion that they should give more; and in this we think there was error, for the question as to the amount of the damages was exclusively for the jury without any intimation of opinion from the judge as to what they should give by way of damages.

The only remaining question is that raised by the seventh ground of appeal as to whether the counter-claim should have been allowed. This being an action of tort, the counter-claim set up for the balance of the rent due for 1879, could not be pleaded unless it was based upon a cause of action arising out of the "transaction set forth in the complaint as the foundation of the plaintiff's claim," or unless it was "connected with the subject of the action." Code, § 173, subd. 1. The "transaction" set forth in the complaint as the foundation of the plaintiff's claim was the alleged trespass in January, 1880, and certainly the claim for rent in 1879 could not be said to have arisen out of that "transaction." Was it connected with "the subject of the action?" The subject of the plaintiff's action was not the land, but the violation of plaintiff's right to the possession of the land. In speaking of the proper signification of this phrase as used in this section of the code, Pomeroy, in his work on Remedies, sec. 775, p. 801, says: "It seems, therefore, more in accordance with the nature of actions, and more in harmony with the language of the statute, to regard the 'subject of the action' as denoting the plaintiff's principal primary right to enforce or maintain which the action is brought, than to regard it as denoting the specific thing in regard to which the legal controversy is carried on." See, also, cases cited in note 2 to section 785 of Pomeroy on Rem., p. 808. We think, therefore, that the counter-claim was properly disallowed; but on account of the errors hereinbefore specified there must be a new trial.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed, and that the case be remanded to that court for a new trial.

*WILMINGTON, COLUMBIA AND AUGUSTA R. R. CO. v. LING.

(April Term, 1882.)

[1. Principal and Surety ⇨ 42, 123.]

In action by a railroad company against the sureties on the bond of a station agent, who was in arrears to the company when the bond was executed, and continued to make additional defaults in several subsequent monthly settlements, the presiding judge committed no error in charging the jury "that if the plaintiffs knew when the bond was given, that their agent was in default and indebted to them in his pre-existing agency, and yet concealed this fact and held him out to the sureties as trustworthy, either expressly or impliedly, such conduct would be a fraud upon the sureties, and would make void the bond as to them."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Principal and Surety, Cent. Dig. §§ 87, 308; Dec. Dig. ⇨ 42, 123.]

[2. Principal and Surety ⇨ 122.]

But in charging further "that each default of the agent, after the bond was given, in failing to pay over to the company the money collected by him, was a breach of his duty and obligation, and gave the plaintiffs the right to dismiss him; that if knowing of these defaults, the plaintiffs condoned his fault and continued him in his agency without notice to his sureties of his misconduct, such conduct would be prejudicial to the interest of the sureties, and would discharge them," he erred in failing to limit the discharge to defaults occurring after the first.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Principal and Surety, Cent. Dig. § 302; Dec. Dig. ⇨ 122.]

[3. Trial ⇨ 198.]

The judge erred in refusing to charge the jury "that, as matter of law, it was no fraud upon the sureties to the bond in suit that the principal was behind in his accounts at the time the bond was given, and no notice was given to the sureties."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 467-470, 476; Dec. Dig. ⇨ 198.]

[4. Trial ⇨ 198.]

He also erred in refusing to charge "that the plaintiffs were not bound to notify the sureties of each or any default of the principal agent, and that the sureties were not discharged by failure on their part to do so."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 467-470, 476; Dec. Dig. ⇨ 198.]

Before Wallace, J., Darlington, September, 1881.

Action by the plaintiffs against Joseph J. Ling, Isaiah L. Wright, James M. Hunter and Ira M. Harrell, commenced August 20th, 1878. The opinion states the case.

Mr. J. H. Rion, for appellant, cited the authorities referred to in the opinion, and also the following: 2 De G. & J. 609; 3 Hurlst. & C. 437; 59 Ga. 685; 18 Wall. 662; 64 N. October 13th, 1882. The opinion of the court was delivered by Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. The plaintiff, appellant, a railroad corporation under the laws of this State, employed the defendant, Joseph J. Ling, to act as their agent at Timmonsville, in the county of Darlington. Some four months after the said Ling had been acting as such agent, to wit, on May 1st, 1870, he executed and delivered to the plaintiff a bond with the other parties named as his sureties, conditioned generally for the faithful discharge of his duties, and especially that he would well and truly account for and pay over to the said company all moneys that might come into his hands, or for which he might be accountable by reason of his appointment.

At the time this bond was given, Ling was behind some $497.40. The testimony does not show whether the sureties were aware of this fact or not, when they executed the bond. Ling continued in office until February 17th, 1873, when he was dismissed, at which time he was a defaulter to the amount of $1,737.48, which sum was afterwards reduced by certain cash receipts to $1,526.57. The account between Ling and the company, introduced in evidence, embracing his monthly standing, showed that he was frequently behind from the beginning of his agency. These sums had been carried forward until finally, upon his dismissal, after the credits above referred to had been allowed, the balance against him amounted to $1,526.57. For this balance the action below was brought on the bond of indemnity.

Wright, one of the sureties, was never made a party, and Ling died before the trial, so that at the trial the action stood against the two sureties, Hunter and Harrell. These defendants relied upon two defenses. First, "that Ling, before the execution of the bond sued on, having been agent of the appellants at Timmonsville, had committed default by failing to pay over moneys collected, and was indebted, when the bond was executed, in a considerable sum by reason of said default; that the appellants, knowing these facts, concealed the same from the defendants, Hunter and Harrell, and impliedly held out Ling as a trustworthy person and competent agent, when they knew or had reason to believe the contrary." Secondly, "that shortly after the execution of the bond, Ling made default as agent, and thereafter continued to make defaults by failing to pay over money collected by him; that these facts were known to the appellants, but, instead of dismissing Ling from their employment, they gave no notice to his sureties, condoned his faults, connived at the same, and continued him in their employment as agent." The defendants claimed that, on the first ground, the bond was void as to them, and, on the second ground, that if ever liable on the bond they had been discharged from that liability by the fraudulent conduct of the appellants. The action was submitted to a jury under the charge of the presiding judge, and the verdict was for the defendants.

His Honor, Judge Wallace, charged the jury, "that if the plaintiffs knew, when the bond was given, that Ling was in default and indebted to them in his pre-existing agency, and yet concealed this fact, and held him out to them as trustworthy, either expressly or impliedly, such conduct would be a fraud upon the sureties, and would make void the bond as to them;" and, secondly, "that each default of Ling, after the bond was given, in failing to pay over to the company the money collected by him as their agent, was a breach of his duty and obligation, and gave the plaintiffs the right to dismiss him; that, if knowing of these defaults, the plaintiffs condoned his fault and continued him in his agency without notice to his sureties of his misconduct, such conduct would be prejudicial to the interest of the sureties, and would discharge them."

He declined to charge the following requests of the plaintiffs: 1. "That, as matter of law, it was no fraud upon the sureties to the bond in suit that the principal was behind in his accounts at the time the bond was given, and no notice was given to the sureties. 2. That the plaintiffs were not bound to notify the sureties of each or any default of the principal agent, and that the sureties were not discharged by failure on their part to do *so. 3. That there is no proof whatever that the plaintiffs held out Ling as competent and trustworthy, or in any way imposed upon the sureties; and that in law the railroad company did nothing that would discharge the sureties. 4. That there is no fact for the jury to find but the default and the amount of the default; and there is no law in the case to prevent the recovery by the plaintiff of the amount proven."

The appeal is founded upon the charge, and the refusal to charge, as hereinabove.

The charge of the judge, so far as reported, seems to have been directly upon the two grounds of defence relied upon by the defendants and set up in their answer. It was nothing more than a declaration by the judge, that if the evidence in the case sustained the averments in the answer as to matters therein alleged as a defense, in law the defendants had a good defense. Subject to the modification hereinafter suggested, we think the principles laid down were sound. The law requires good faith in parties contracting with each other; and the high moral principle, that misrepresentation or concealment of a material fact in reference to the matter contracted about, or any device by the one to prevent the other from being fully informed, will vitiate the contract, is found in all text writers upon the subject of contracts, and is sustained by numerous decisions, not only in this State, but in all the courts where the English common law prevails.

This principle applies in its fullest force to contracts on suretyship. Judge Story (1 Eq. Jur. § 324) says: "The contract of suretyship imports entire good faith and confidence between the parties in regard to the whole transaction; any concealment of material facts, or any express or implied misrepresentation of such facts, or any undue advantage, information or surprise taken of the surety by the creditor, will undoubtedly furnish a sufficient ground to invalidate the contract." See also Ad. Eq. *179, where the same doctrine is announced.

The propositions of law, charged by the judge, were in accordance with these principles, except that he went too far in holding in the second proposition, that if the appellants knew of Ling's default accruing after the execution of his bond, and yet, notwithstanding this, they continued to employ him, condoning his default, and giving no notice to his sureties of his misconduct, that this would discharge the sureties entirely. This, no doubt, was good law, so far as it warranted the discharge of the sureties from the culpable defaults occurring subsequent to the first default, after the execution of the bond, but it was error to hold that the sureties would be entirely discharged thereby, even though there had been a fraudulent concealment of the first default. Because, in any event, the first default was a breach of the bond, and against this the fraudulent continuation of the employment of the agent afterwards was no defense. The judge should have limited the discharge, even upon the facts supposed, to the defaults occurring after the first.

We think the judge was in error, too, in refusing to charge the two first requests of the appellants. We have carefully examined the cases referred to by counsel on both sides, and although there is some conflict in the decisions, we think the weight of the argument is in favor of the position, that there must be some positive act of concealment or misrepresentation on the part of the obligee in cases like this before the court, as to some fact which it was his duty to discharge, before the sureties can be relieved. Silence, merely, especially as to facts within the reach of proper inquiry by the sureties, will not be sufficient. The law stands between the parties perfectly impartial, ready to rebuke fraud, concealment, or misrepresentation on the part of either, but carelessness and want of proper vigilance are left to their own fruits. There must be an intent to deceive, not a mere passive omission to state everything within the knowledge of the creditor. The intent is the gist of the fraud, and this should be made to appear. Stafford v. Newsom, 9 Ired. 507; De Colyar on Prin. and Sur. 367; Atlas Bank v. Brownell, 9 R. I. 168; Roper v. Sangamon Lodge, 91 Ill. 518.

We were at first inclined to think that the presiding judge, in his charge, had laid down the law applicable to such cases in its fullest extent, subject to the modification hereinabove. He required actual concealment or misrepresentation to be found as a fact by the jury before relieving the sureties. This seemed to be all that the plaintiffs could claim. But upon examination of the cases, where this question has been discussed, while we do not find any legal adjudication of what will constitute concealment or misrepresentation in such form as to be applied as a test in every case where the question is presented, yet we find several decisions in other States, where certain facts have been held not to amount to such concealment. For instance it has been held as matter of law that it was no fraud upon the sureties, that the principal was behind in his accounts at the time he gave his bond of indemnity and no notice given to the sureties, and also that the obligee was not legally bound to notify the sureties of each and every default of the principal. See The Guardian of the Stakely Union v. Stratter, 22 L. T. Eng. 84; Roper v. Sangamon Lodge, 91 Ill. 518; Pittsburg, Fort Wayne and Chicago Railroad Co. v. Shaffer et al., 59 Pa. St. R. 350; Watertown Ins. Co. v. Simmons, 131 Mass. 85; Taft v. Gifford, 13 Met. 187.

It is the business of the surety to see for himself that his principal performs the duty which he has guaranteed. The surety is bound to inquire for himself, and cannot complain that the creditor does not notify him of the state of the accounts. Now the principle, as laid down in these cases referred to above, is precisely what the appellant requested the judge to charge in his two first requests, and which, being refused, is made grounds of exception.

The strongest adverse case is the case of Phillips v. Foxall, 3 Moak's Eng. R. 264. But that case, when analyzed, does not conflict with the principles above. That case turned upon a demurrer. The defendant set up the defense, that the plaintiff had condoned the default of the servant in not paying over money collected, which the defense directly charged had been embezzled by the servant, and which fact was known to the employer, and, notwithstanding this, he had continued the servant in his employment without notice to the sureties of the embezzlement. The plaintiff demurred to this plea. The court overruled the demurrer and sustained the plea. The court said: "We think that in a continuing guarantee for the honesty of the servant, if the master discovers that the servant has been guilty of acts of dishonesty in the course of the service to which the guarantee relates, and instead of dismissing the servant, as he may do at once, and without notice, he chooses to continue in his employ a dishonest servant, without the knowledge and consent of the surety, express or implied, he cannot afterwards have recourse to the surety to make good any loss which may arise from the dishonesty of the servant during the subsequent service." The ground of the defense in that case was the dishonest act of the servant—embezzlement—known to the plaintiff. The ruling of the court on the demurrer, which admitted the truth of the charge against the servant, was right, and the defense was properly admitted.

But there is a broad distinction between a case of that kind and a case where it simply appears that the agent is behind in his accounts. Knowledge on the part of the employer of dishonesty and corruption in his agent, without disclosure, would amount to a fraudulent concealment, but a falling behind in current accounts by an agent is not always the result of dishonesty. We do not think that simply the failure on the part of the employer to give notice to the sureties that the agent is behind in his accounts at the time he executes the bond, or that he has fallen behind since the execution of the bond, is such a fraudulent concealment of material facts as, in itself, without more, should discharge the sureties. These facts might properly go to the jury with other facts bearing upon the question of fraudulent concealment and have such weight as would be proper, but standing alone they would not be sufficient to discharge the sureties.

We think the appellant was entitled to the charge requested in the two first requests. The other requests of appellant were properly refused, involving, as they did, questions of fact mostly.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed and the case be remanded for a new trial.

*CATHCART v. SUGENHEIMER.

(April Term, 1882.)

[1. Evidence ¶340.]

In action by a former lunatic to recover a lot of land sold during his lunacy under proceedings to which he was no party, instituted by his committee, the defendant may introduce in evidence the record of the probate court ad-judging the plaintiff to be a lunatic and appointing a committee of his person and estate.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 1294-1301; Dec. Dig. ☞340.]

[2. Judicial Sales ☞45.]

It is the well settled policy of the law to support judicial sales in all cases where the court has jurisdiction.

For other cases, see Judicial Sales, Cent. Dig. § 83; Dec. Dig. ☞45.]

[3. Insane Persons ☞71.]

An action at law for the recovery of the property of a lunatic or damages for its detention, must be brought in the name of the lunatic by his committee, but where equitable relief is sought in the Court of Chancery, it seems that the committee may sue alone and without using the name of the lunatic as a party plaintiff, and that the judgment will be as binding upon the lunatic's estate as if he were personally present.

For other cases, see Insane Persons, Cent. Dig. § 118; Dec. Dig. ☞71.]

[4. Subrogation ☞16.]

And where in such action the property of the lunatic has been sold for the purpose of paying his debts, the proceeds of sale have been so applied, and the purchaser has bona fide erected costly improvements, the purchaser is subrogated to the rights of the creditors to whom the payment was made and may retain possession until re-imbursed.

Before Cothran, J., Fairfield, February, 1882.

The opinion states the case.

Mr. L. F. Youmans, for appellant.

Messrs. J. H. Rion, A. S. Douglass, contra.

October 13th, 1882. The opinion of the court was delivered by Mr. Justice McGOWAN. In June, 1874, John H. Cathcart was found a lunatic under proceedings in the Court of Probate for Fairfield county. On September 2d, 1874, Samuel Cathcart was appointed the committee of the person and estate of the said lunatic.

Finding the estate embarrassed to the extent of insolvency and the creditors already pressing for payment or threatening to commence suit, the said Samuel Cathcart, as committee, commenced an action in the Court of Common Pleas, alleging the *lunacy of John H. Cathcart, his appointment as committee, the large indebtedness of the lunatic and the necessity of selling the whole estate for the payment of the debts, and making Hopkins, Dwight & Trowbridge, and Samuel C. Clowney, as clerk of the court, who held mortgages upon certain tracts of land of the lunatic, parties defendant, but omitting to make the lunatic a party by name and service of process, as he was at that time in the lunatic asylum.

The creditors were called in and a referee appointed, who reported that the claims against the lunatic, so far as presented before him, amounted to about $56,000, besides interest, and that he could perceive no means of discharging this heavy indebtedness without a sale of the whole estate. The court confirmed the report of the referee and (after exempting a homestead) adjudged and ordered that the real estate of said lunatic should be sold in different tracts at public auction by the sheriff of Fairfield county, on the first Monday of January, 1875, one-third of the purchase money to be paid in cash, and the other two-thirds upon a credit of one and two years, the proceeds of sale to be turned over to the clerk of the court, subject to further order.

The sale was made as ordered and the defendant, Doreth Sugenheimer, became the purchaser of a lot in the town of Winnsboro' at the sale, and after complying with the terms of sale, received a deed of conveyance from the sheriff under said order. The sheriff made his report on sales, which was confirmed by the court, May 5th, 1875. The purchaser was let into the possession and has retained it ever since, and has paid, in taxes and for repairs, something over a thousand dollar, besides $4,025, the purchase money, which went to pay the debts of the lunatic as established.

On July 24th, 1876, the Probate Court, upon the application of the said lunatic, John H. Cathcart, passed an order superseding the commission of lunacy, and ordering the committee to turn over to him, the said John H. Cathcart, all the books and papers belonging to him, and in January of this year, 1882, the said John H. Cathcart commenced this action against the defendant for the lot of land purchased by her as aforesaid, and *damages for the detention thereof. She claims title under the said proceedings of court and the deed of the sheriff made in accordance with the decretal order therein, and sets up special equities arising out of the payment of the purchase money and the other facts of the case.

Judge Cothran directed a verdict for the defendant, and Cathcart, the plaintiff, appeals to this court upon the following exceptions: 1. Because his Honor erred in admitting as evidence the record in the case of Samuel Cathcart, Committee, v. Hopkins, Dwight & Trowbridge, and S. C. Clowney, as clerk of the court, the same being as to the plaintiff res inter alios acta. 2. Because his Honor erred when he held that the plaintiff was not a necessary party to the action above stated, brought by said committee. 3. Because the charge of his Honor was otherwise contrary to law.

It was not error in the Circuit judge to admit in evidence the record of the case of Samuel Cathcart, Committee of the Estate of John H. Cathcart, Lunatic, v. Hopkins, Dwight & Trowbridge, and Samuel C. Clowney, as clerk of the court, et al. The plaintiff, before he was declared a lunatic, was the owner of the land sued for. The defendant claimed from him, through the proceedings of court, and offered the record with a view to show that the plaintiff had been regularly declared a lunatic, and the court had pronounced a judgment and ordered a sale of the land, which sale divested the title of the lunatic and transferred it to the purchaser at that sale. That is to say, it was offered as a link in her chain of title. "A judgment or decree is admissible, though res inter alios acta, to form a link in a chain of title, but recitals in the record are not sufficient to make out the chain as to strangers. Against them the facts must be independently proved." 2 Whart. Ev. § 821; Wardlaw v. Hammond, 9 Rich. 454.

The precise point seems to have been ruled in the old Court of Appeals, in one of the many trials of the case of McCreight v. Aiken. It seems that the committee sued alone, and when the record of the proceeding, which declared the party a lunatic, was offered, it was objected that it was not admissible in evidence for the reason that the lunatic had not been made a party. In a *subsequent case involving the same transaction (Rice 58), Judge O'Neill said: "The first ground contends that the proceedings in equity, establishing the plaintiff's lunacy, were not admissible in evidence, but the case of John R. McCreight v. David Aiken, decided here, December, 1836, shows that they are admissible between parties other than the lunatic."

It does not, however, follow from the admission of the record in evidence, that it must be regarded as conclusive of everything contained in it as against the plaintiff. It was received for what it was worth, still leaving as undecided the question as to its legal effect—whether John H. Cathcart, the lunatic, was substantially a party to it and represented therein, or an entire stranger and not in any way bound by a proceeding in which he, although a lunatic in the asylum, was not by name made a party. The admission of the record still left the real question of the case to be the legal effect of the proceedings as to the property of the lunatic which had been sold by the order of court.

There is no doubt that this land was purchased and paid for bona fide at a judicial sale, that is to say, at a sale where the property was sold under an order of court designating it and authorizing its sale. It is the well settled policy of the law to support judicial sales if it can be done without injury to any one, or the violation of any principle. The purchaser at such sale is in no danger of losing his property by proof that the order was erroneously given. It cannot be collaterally attacked for error or irregularity. The only ground upon which the title can be successfully assailed, is that the court which rendered the decree of sale, in doing so, acted without jurisdiction either of the subject-matter or of the parties. Freeman on Void Judicial Sales 42 (and authorities).

Did the court, in ordering this land sold, act without jurisdiction? It has not been denied that the subject-matter was within the jurisdiction of the court, but it is insisted that John H. Cathcart, although a declared lunatic at the time, should have been made a party by name in the proceedings instituted by the committee in his behalf, and that the omission to name him was a failure to make a necessary party, and the whole proceeding must therefore be declared void, and the plaintiff, never having *been divested of his title, may now recover the lot purchased by the defendant.

There seems to be some confusion in the authorities as to the precise character of the relation which one appointed a committee of a lunatic, bears to the person and property of said lunatic. This much, however, is certain, that in this State the relation is not the same as it is in England. It was said by the Chief Justice, in the case of Ashley v. Holman, 15 S. C. 106: "There is no doubt that the Lord Chancellor, under the sign manual of the King, was the special custodian of this important class of society there, and that committees were his agents and responsible to him. It was not a subject-matter over which his court had jurisdiction, but it was a power conferred upon the Lord Chancellor as the representative of the Crown, to be exercised as a special and personal duty. But whatever may have been or may now be the law in England on the subject, or whatever may have been its origin there, this principle has never prevailed practically in this country." We must, therefore, look for light only to the nature of the relation and our own law as shown by the decided cases.

We may take it as also certain that the mere appointment of a committee to take charge of the person and property of a lunatic, does not ipso facto transfer to the committee legal title to the property of the lunatic, as the appointment of an assignee in bankruptcy transfers to him the legal title of the bankrupt by the express terms of the act. The title of his property still remains in the lunatic, even after the appointment of his committee. In this respect the relation may be regarded as analogous to that of guardian and ward.

In the case of McCreight & McCreight v. David Aiken, 3 Hill 338, Robert McCreight had been declared a lunatic, and the plaintiffs, his sons, appointed his committee. They brought an action at law for a gig and other personal property alleged to belong to the lunatic, and to have been unlawfully taken from him by the defendant. Judge Butler non-suited the plaintiffs, saying that "the legal relation of a committee to a lunatic is analogous to that of a guardian to his ward. For any trespass to the person or property of a minor, an action must be brought in his name by his guardian, and why should not an action be brought in the same way for a trespass on the person or property of a lunatic? Such a person has a legal existence that is under the protection of the law, and he can take and hold property, real and personal." This ruling was affirmed by the old appeal court, and it seems to be settled in South Carolina that in an action at law, for the recovery of the property of a lunatic, or damages for its detention, the action must be brought in the name of the lunatic by his committee, as in such action he only can recover who has the legal title. Petrie v. Shoemaker, 24 Wend. 85.

But, as we understand it, the rule is not peremptory when the relief prayed for is equitable in its character, and is sought through the forms of Chancery. It is the settled doctrine of this State, that the Court of Equity takes special charge of infants, lunatics and other persons under disabilities, and in doing so exercises large powers over their property under the control of trustees for their benefit, even when such persons under disabilities are before it only substantially and by representation. The doctrine is well stated in the case of Spencer v. Godfrey, Bail. Eq. 468: "The jurisdiction of the Court of Equity to dispose of the real estate of infants and other persons under disability, has been too long exercised to be now questioned, and a conveyance or mortgage executed by the master in pursuance of an order of the court, which was intended to operate on the title of infants, is binding on them, if they are parties to or represented in the proceeding in which the order was made." This case was approved in Moore v. Hood, 9 Rich. Eq. 327 [70 Am. Dec. 210], so far as it decided that infants equally with adults are bound by a decree until it is reversed or vacated.

It seems that all that is considered absolutely necessary to the exercise of this beneficent power, is that the party incapable of acting for himself shall be substantially and fairly represented before the court, and the court should be satisfied that the proposed action is for the benefit of such incompetent person: Some seeming inconsistency, as to who are necessary parties, has arisen from overlooking this difference between the practice in actions at law and in equity. Judge

O'Neill says that "all the confusion has arisen from confounding a rule of practice in Chancery with one at law." Rice 59.

The proceeding in this case was not an action at law for the recovery of property of the lunatic, but regarding the committee as a trustee, and the lunatic as cestui que trust, it was a proceeding on the equity side of the court to anticipate a compulsory and ruinous cash sale of property belonging to the lunatic to pay his debts by obtaining an injunction against creditors and an order for sale on credit. The relief prayed for was purely equitable, and the question is, whether Samuel Cathcart, when he instituted the proceedings expressly as committee in behalf of the lunatic, so represented him and his interest that he may be regarded as a privy in the action and bound by the sale made thereunder.

The question is one of form rather than of substance. For, at the time the extraordinary powers of the Court of Equity were invoked in his behalf, John H. Cathcart was non compos mentis, and incapable of doing anything toward the protection of his person or property. For that very reason the court had put him in charge of a guardian, who instituted the proceedings expressly, and in terms, for his benefit. They concerned only him and his property, and were, undoubtedly, intended to be his proceedings. Possibly, it would have been more regular if he had been joined as a co-plaintiff with his committee; but if that had been done, there is no reason to suppose that the judgment would have been different; and if he had been made a defendant by name and nominal service, it is not perceived who could have answered for him but his committee, already before the court, as plaintiff.

As was said in the case of Executors of Brasher v. Van Cortlandt, 2 Johns. Ch. 242: "If he had been joined, it would seem to be mere matter of form. * * * If he be made a defendant, he is to answer by his committee. When the committee is made defendant, there can be no use in joining the lunatic also, for the custody of the estate is no longer in him, but in this court under the administration of the committee. * * *

This question of necessary parties is always, more or less, a matter of discretion, depending on convenience. In this case it would be quite absurd to bring in a party who has no capacity or power of action, except by the very persons before the court as his trustees, and where the court is only to look to the certainty of the debt and to the state of the assets in order to provide for its payment." See Cooley Const. Lim., ch. V., p. 97.

The old Court of Equity, in this State, did not regard it necessary that the lunatic should be formally made a party to sustain an order made by that court concerning his rights, or even the sale of his land at the instance of his committee. Ex parte Drayton, 1 Desaus. 136; Sims v. McLure, 8 Rich. Eq. 286 [70 Am. Dec. 196]. The case from Desaussure is very meagerly reported, but it seems to have been much like this case. Upon petition of committee, the court ordered the lands of the lunatic, Thomas Drayton, sold, and the commission of lunacy was afterwards superseded. In the case from Richardson, J. S. Sims was appointed committee of one Thaddeus C. Sims, a lunatic, and, without making the lunatic a formal party, filed the bill to set aside sales of certain slaves made by the said Thaddeus, and certain judgments confessed by him before the inquisition. The proof as to some of the charges was held to be insufficient, but the bill was sustained and a reference ordered as to other charges.

By way of suggesting the best practice, Chancellor Wardlaw in that case said: "The practice of instituting such a suit in the name of the committee only, is sustained by high authority. Story Eq. Pl., § 64; Ortley v. Messere, 7 John. Ch. 139. But where, as in this State, the maxim of the common law, that one cannot stultify himself, is not recognized, it is certainly better to follow the general rule of pleading to make all parties to the suit who are materially interested in the object of it, and not to litigate and indulge concerning the estate of any person, even a lunatic, who is not before the court." In the case he referred to from New York, where, under their statutes, a different practice prevails, Chancellor Kent said: "The general practice is to unite the lunatic with the committee, as was done in 2 Vern. 678, but there does not appear to be any use in it or any necessity for it, as the committee have the exclusive custody and control of ception that "an executor or administrator, a trustee of an express trust, or a person expressly authorized by statute, may sue without joining with him the person for whose benefit the action is prosecuted." Where the lunatic is sued, the code directs that the summons be served by delivering a copy to the committee or guardian, and to the defendant personally, but we discover no direction where the lunatic or his committee is the party who sues.

In such case it would seem the merest form whether the title of the case should be "John H. Cathcart, lunatic, by his committee, Samuel Cathcart," or, as in this case, "Samuel Cathcart, committee of the estate of John H. Cathcart, lunatic." We do not consider that these provisions of the code change the old practice in this particular, so as to require us to declare this sale void. Mitford's Ch. Plead. (6 Am. edit.) 31 and note; Person v. Warran, 14 Barb. 488; Fields v. Fowler, 2 Hun 400; Ashley v. Holman, 15 S. C. 97. In the last case cited, which has been decided in our State since the adoption of the code, the Chief Justice, in delivering the judgment of the court, says: "If this was an action in behalf of the lunatic for an unsettled demand on account of wages earned by his labor, then the lunatic himself should have been party plaintiff, but this is not an action strictly for the wages of the lunatic. It is a case in Chancery by a trustee against the representatives of a former trustee seeking an account," &c.

But if, from the increased strictness latterly required in this State on the subject of making parties, the lunatic must be regarded as a necessary party, though merely a formal one, we think there is merit in the equitable defense set up. It is quite *certain that the defendant purchased the lot bona fide, relying upon the orders of court, and that improvements have been made, and that the purchase money went towards satisfaction of plaintiff's debts. It does not appear that he made any offer of the money thus expended for his benefit. We cannot see why the purchaser in this case should not be entitled to be subrogated to the claims which she by her purchase paid.

Wherein did this sale differ from that of the property of a decedent for the same purpose? "If, by a sale of the lands of a decedent, his debts are paid, and it turns out that the sale is void, the purchaser has the right to be subrogated to the claims which he has by his purchase paid. And he has also the right to retain possession of the property as security for the repayment of the sums to which he is entitled." Freeman on Void Judicial Sales 51. As Judge Story says in Bright v. Boyd, 1 Story 478 [Fed. Cas. No. 1875]: "Such principle has the highest and most persuasive equity, as well

*131

*the estate and rights of the lunatic. The lunatic may be considered a party by his committee, and, like trustees of an insolvent debtor, the committee hold the estate in trust under the direction of the court." Story Eq. Pl., § 65.

It is true that the code, § 134, provided that "every action must be prosecuted in the name of the real party in interest," but this does little more than give expression to the general principle long established, that all parties interested in the subject-matter of the suit should be made parties. The code does no more, but on the contrary declares an exas common sense and common justice, for its foundation."

The judgment of this Court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

Before Kershaw, J., Newberry, November, 1880.

Action by David H. Wheeler, individually, and as survivor of Wheeler & Hiller, against the county of Newberry, commenced in September, 1879. The opinion states the case.

*133

*Messrs. Jones & Jones, for plaintiff.

The position of counsel upon the plaintiff's ground of appeal was as follows:

If, however, none of the above propositions are sufficient to entitle the plaintiff to interest, then we say he is certainly entitled to interest from the time certificates of indebtedness were issued to other creditors for past due claims; for the resolution approved March 22d, 1878, directs certificates to be issued not only to the creditors whose claims have been passed by the commission appointed under the act of the legislature, approved June 11th, 1877, but also to those persons whose claims "may hereafter be adjudged valid by some court of competent jurisdiction." The said resolution further says: "Said certificates to bear interest at the rate of seven per cent. per annum, from the date of issue, which shall be the same date in each case." The plaintiff's claim has been adjudged valid in this case by a court of competent jurisdiction, and he is, on that ground, entitled to interest, at least from the time others receive it on their past due claims.

Mr. F. Werber, Jr., for defendant.

October 18th, 1882. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. The plaintiff had an open account ($643.80) against the county of Newberry for lumber, alleged to have been delivered in 1870. He presented the account to the county commissioners, who approved it, and ordered it paid October 22d, 1870. The treasurer made payments as follows: May 1st, 1874, $109.85, and on May 15th, 1876, $139.37. This action was brought for the balance due and interest. The defendant answered, insisting that as the county of Newberry was not a body corporate, it could not be sued, and that the demand sued on was res adjudicata. That it had been examined by a "commission" appointed by the governor, under the act of 1877, "to investigate and ascertain the actual bona fide indebtedness of the various counties in this State, and to regulate the manner of paying the same" (16 Stat. 311), and that said commission reported upon the claim and scaled it down to $132.03,

*134

*which was a conclusive adjudication of the true and bona fide amount due.

On the trial the plaintiff proved the sale and delivery of the lumber, that the board of county commissioners had audited the claim and ordered it paid, that "payment was deferred for want of funds," and that he never put his claim before the said "commission," which did, however, consider it ex parte, and reject all but the amount of $132.03. Judge Kershaw charged the jury that the county of Newberry was a body corporate, and might be sued; that "the commission," appointed by the governor, was not a court whose decisions were binding on parties who did not accept it as a board of arbitration; that the plaintiff, if they believed the proof, was entitled to recover the amount of his account, but not interest.

The plaintiff appealed because interest was not allowed him, and the defendant having failed in a motion for a new trial, appealed upon the following grounds:

1. Because his Honor erred in holding and charging the jury that the county of Newberry is a body corporate, so as to be sued in this action.

2. Because his Honor erred in holding that the "commission," created by the act of the general assembly, approved June 11th, 1877, was not a court of subordinate and special jurisdiction to pass upon the validity of claims sued on in this action, in order to in-investigate and ascertain the true and bona fide indebtedness of Newberry county.

3. Because his Honor erred in refusing to charge as requested, that the plaintiff's claim, having been considered by the said "commission" and sustained in part and in part rejected, was res adjudicata.

4. Because his honor erred in holding that the approval of the board of county commissioners of the claim sued on could be proved by the endorsement of "Mathew Gray, chairman," in one instance, and by the signatures of Henry Kennedy and Simpson Young, members of the board of county commissioners, in the other, when, it is submitted, to prove such approval the records of the board of county commissioners should have been *produced, or at least the written approval of the said board signed by all the members.

5. That his Honor erred in refusing a new trial on the minutes.

We have lately had occasion, in the case of The County of Richland v. Miller, 16 S. C. 244, to consider the force and effect of the audit of a board of county commissioners with reference to the question as to what is and what is not within the scope of their authority, but the court has never been required to consider how a creditor, having a claim already audited, should proceed to enforce it against the county—whether, considering the audit as a judgment of the tribunal established for the purpose of deciding county claims, he should seek to enforce it by mandamus, requiring the county commissioners to have the money raised to pay it, or sue upon it in the Court of Common Pleas to get thereby an enforceable judgment against the county. There is some want of uniformity in the practice of the different States upon the subject, and until the point is made and argued before us we will make no ruling upon it. For the purposes of this case it is enough to say that it has been the practice in this State, to sue the county, which by the express terms of the act is "a body politic and corporate," and as such, authorized "to sue and be sued." Ex parte Williams, 7 S. C. 72; Greenville County v. Runion, 9 S. C. 4; Ostendorff v. County Commissioners of Charleston, 14 S. C. 403; Holmes & Calder v. County of Charleston, Id. 146; Edmonston v. County of Aiken, Id. 622.

We do not think that the Circuit judge was in error when he charged the jury that "the commission" appointed by the governor was not a court with judicial power to determine authoritatively county claims. It was not intended to do more than to obtain information which would lead to the exposure of fraud and possibly to further action by the county commissioners or the legislature. After the report called for by the act was made for Charleston county, another act (1878) was passed, "to provide for funding the debt of Charleston county and for the payment of the expenses incurred in ascertaining the same." 16 Stat. 692. The scheme for settling the county claims provided by this act, with the right of appeal to the Court of Common *Pleas, was accepted by the creditors who presented their claims, and the indebtedness of Charleston county was thus settled. Holmes & Calder v. County of Charleston, supra.

No such act was ever passed for the settlement of the indebtedness of Newberry county. The joint resolution of the legislature (1878) to authorize the county commissioners of certain counties "to fund the past indebtedness of certain counties and provide a mode of liquidating the same" (16 Stat. 681), did include the county of Newberry, but that resolution only authorized the county commissioners "to issue certificates of indebtedness to all holders of claims for the amounts reported to be due by the commission appointed to investigate and ascertain the bona fide indebtedness of the county, and as may hereafter be adjudged valid by some court of competent jurisdiction." This itself is conclusive that the commission was not claimed to be a court of competent jurisdiction, and their reports binding on the parties as judgments. The county commissioners could not issue their certificates upon the authority of the commission alone, but had to wait until judgment was rendered by a competent court, which might adjudge as valid the whole or a part of their ascertainment, or for a larger amount. Ex parte Childs, 12 S. C. 118.

It is not necessary to consider whether the endorsement of the county commissioners, on the back of the account—"approved and ordered to be paid"—was of itself sufficient proof of the audit, or whether parol evidence of the fact was admissible. The pro rata payments made by the county treasurer afforded evidence of the audit. Besides, as we understand, the plaintiff did not rest upon the audit, but seems to have proved the account itself, relying upon the audit simply as an admission of those in authority.

The terms of the resolution also settle the question of interest. The county commissioners could not issue the certificate until the claim was adjudged to be valid by the court, and the terms of the resolution are, "said certificates to bear interest at the rate of seven per cent. per annum from the date of issue, which shall be the same date in each case." The certificate does not issue upon the authority either of the audit of the county commissioners or the report of the commission, but by virtue of the judgment in the Court of Common Pleas. A judgment only bears interest from its recovery, and the certificate which issues in satisfaction of that judgment is made to conform to it. In the case of Holmes & Calder, in reference to claims against the county of Charleston before referred to, it was held, in express terms, that "an open account audited by a board of county commissioners does not draw interest from the date of audit."

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed and the appeal dismissed.

STATE v. EVANS.

(April Term, 1882.)

[1. Burglary ⚡20; Criminal Law ⚡970.]

Defendant was convicted under an indictment that alleged a burglary in "a gin-house, situate within the curtilage of the dwelling-house." Held, that judgment should be arrested, because the indictment failed to allege that the gin-house was within two hundred yards of the dwelling-house and appurtenant to it, two averments that were essential under the statute. Gen. Stat. of 1882, § 2483.

[2. Burglary ⚡20.]

And the defendant having been tried, convicted and sentenced for statutory burglary, the conviction cannot be referred to the indictment as sufficiently charging the higher offense of burglary at common law.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Burglary, Cent. Dig. § 51; Dec. Dig. ⚡20.]

Before Aldrich, J., Abbeville, February, 1882.

The opinion states the case.

Mr. T. P. Cothran, for appellant.

Mr. Solicitor Orr, contra.

October 21st, 1882. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. George Evans was convicted of burglary and sentenced to three years in the penitentiary under an indictment in the following terms: "That George Evans, late of the county and State aforesaid, on February 7th, 1882, with force and arms, at Abbeville court house, in the county *and State aforesaid, in the nighttime of the same day, the dwelling-house; that is to say, the gin-house, situate within the curtilage of the said dwelling-house of one James D. Fooshe, in the county and State aforesaid, feloniously and burglariously did break and enter," &c. The testimony showed that the gin-house was eighty yards from the dwelling-house of J. D. Fooshe, within the common enclosure; was used for storing cotton in the seed and ginning, and as a shelter for his stock; and was an appurtenance of the dwelling-house.

Upon being arraigned for sentence, the defendant made a motion in arrest of judgment upon the following grounds: 1. "That the indictment was fatally defective in not alleging that the gin-house, the subject of the burglary, was within two hundred yards of the dwelling-house of the prosecutor. 2. That the indictment was fatally defective in not alleging that the said gin-house was an 'appurtenant' to the dwelling-house of the prosecutor." The motion was refused. He now appeals to this court, and renews the motion upon the grounds stated.

It appears that the evidence brought the case within the definition of burglary under the statute, so far as the subject of it was concerned, for the gin-house was shown to be within eighty yards of the dwelling-house of the prosecutor. The question, however, is not as to the facts proved, but as to the sufficiency of the allegations in the indictment. "An indictment is the complaint of the State against the accused. It should charge some offense cognizable by the court, and this offense, whatever it may be, should be clearly and distinctly set forth. The crime charged should be described with certainty, for no latitude of intention will be allowed to include anything more than is expressed." State v. McKettrick, 14 S. C. 353. Nor can the evidence supplement the statements of the indictment. "Every indictment must contain and set forth all the necessary ingredients of an offense, and no omission, in such statements, can be supplied by innuendo or evidence." State v. Henderson, 1 Rich. 184. "In setting out an offense against a statute, the defendant must be brought within all the material words of the statute, and nothing can be taken by intendment." State v. O'Bannon, 1 Bailey 144.

*It is true that it is not necessary to set out the very words of the statute; but, according to these principles as to the particularity required in criminal proceedings, we do not think that the indictment was sufficient under the statute, which is as follows: "With respect to the crimes of burglary or arson, and to all criminal offenses, which are constituted or aggravated by being committed in a dwelling-house, any house, out-house, apartment, building, erection, shed or box, in which there sleeps, &c., * * * shall be deemed a dwelling-house; and of such a dwelling-house, and of any other dwelling-house, all houses, out-houses, buildings, sheds and erections, which are within two hundred yards of it, and are appurtenant to it, or to the same establishment of which it is an appurtenance, shall be deemed parcels." Gen. Stat. 1882, § 2483.

This statute was intended to enlarge the field within which burglary could be committed, but in doing so it required two things as essentially necessary to constitute the new statutory offense; the out-house in which the offense is committed must be within two hundred yards of the dwelling-house and appurtenant to it. Neither of those ingredients of crime were alleged in this indictment, and, therefore, it was not good under the statute. The indictment containing no such allegations, proof upon these points was inadmissible.

But it is insisted that the terms of the indictment, even if not full enough under the statute, are sufficient to sustain a conviction for burglary at common law, inasmuch as it charges the offense to have been committed "in a gin-house situate within the curtilage of the dwelling-house," which fulfills the definition of burglary at common law, viz., "the breaking and entering the dwelling-house of another, &c., and the term dwelling-house includes all out-houses contiguous to the dwelling and parcel thereof, if within the curtilage." State v. Sampson, 12 S. C. 567 [32 Am. Rep. 513].

This court has held that the act of 1866, re-enacted in the general statutes, enlarged the limits within which burglary might be committed, but did not repeal the common law offense, and also that it was not repealed by the act of 1878, which increased its punishment. State v. Branham, 13 S. C. 389.

*But it may be a question whether the statute, which does not use the word "curtilage" at all, and seemingly in lieu thereof made a new provision as to burglary, so far as out-houses are concerned (in requiring that they must be within two hundred yards of the dwelling-house and appurtenant thereto) did not repeal as inconsistent with that provision so much of the common law offense as relates to "curtilage," or to out-houses which may or may not fall within it, leaving the common law offense of burglary still in existence, but limited to the single case of being committed in the dwelling-house. This question was suggested, but not argued before us, and we make now no ruling on it.

Assuming that the common law offense still exists unimpaired as to out-houses within the curtilage, as it did prior to the act of 1866, and this could be considered as an indictment under it, the indictment does not charge that the gin-house was "contiguous" to and "parcel" of the dwelling-house, only that it "was situate within the curtilage of the dwelling-house," making it necessary to institute the inquiry, whether a gin-house eighty yards from the dwelling-house, and used for ginning cotton and sheltering stock, was within the curtilage, a term which, although often defined, seems still to lack certainty. It was long ago held in this State that "a house to be parcel of the mansion-house, must be somehow connected with or contributory to it, such as a kitchen, smoke-house or such other as is usually considered as a necessary appendage of a dwelling-house. It cannot embrace a store, blacksmith shop, or any other building separate from it and appropriated to another and a distinct use." State v. Ginns, 1 N. & McC. 585.

It is not necessary in this case, however, to make any such inquiry. The case was tried as one under the statute. Judge Aldrich reports that "it was an indictment under the statutory provision punishing as burglary the breaking and entering any house within two hundred yards of the dwelling-house and appurtenant thereto," and the punishment imposed—three years in the penitentiary—shows conclusively that he so regarded it; for if the defendant had been convicted of burglary at the common law, the punishment, under the statute of 1878, could not *have been less than imprisonment "in the penitentiary with hard labor during the whole life of the prisoner." The defendant having been tried for the offense of burglary under the statute, and never having had an opportunity to defend himself as against the common law offense, the conviction, not sustained under the former, cannot be referred to the indictment as sufficiently charging the latter offense. As we understand it, burglary at common law is a different offense from burglary under the statute, is considered of higher grade and is punished much more severely.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed and the judgment arrested.

[2. Interest ⇨37.]

A bond executed January 1st, 1873, conditioned for the payment "of $1,195 in five equal annual installments, with interest payable annually from date upon the whole amount unpaid and at the rate of ten per centum per annum, the first installment payable January 1st, 1874, being $239, besides interest, and the last installment of like amount on January 1st, 1878, and the same amount with all interest due, payable on the first day of January of each intervening year," bears annual interest at the rate of ten per cent. a year after maturity of the last installment as well as before.

Before Kershaw, J., Abbeville, February, 1881.

Hon. THOMAS B. FRASER, judge of the Third Circuit, sat in the place of Mr. Justice McGOWAN, who had been of counsel in the cause.

It was an action by Jacob Miller against Wiley Hall, commenced in March, 1879, for a specific performance of the bond recited in the opinion of this court, or for a sale of the land. The covenant referred to in the opinion was as follows:

Agreement and covenant this day entered into between Jacob Miller and Wiley Hall, both of the county and State aforesaid.

*First. Jacob Miller agrees to sell to said Wiley Hall two hundred and thirty-nine acres of land according to metes and bounds of a plat thereof made by Jas. A. McCord, Esq., deputy surveyor, which, when finished, is to be attached to this agreement; at and for the price of five dollars per acre, making in the aggregate the sum of one thousand one hundred and ninety-five ($1,195) dollars, for which sum the said Wiley Hall has this day executed to the said Miller a penal bond, payable in five annual equal installments with interest from date at ten per centum and payable annually. The said Jacob Miller to retain the title to the said land until the whole of the said bond for the purchase money and interest thereon is paid in full. Then good titles to be made to the said tract of land.

Second. Wiley Hall agrees to pay five dollars per acre for the said tract of land, making the sum of one thousand one hundred and ninety-five ($1,195) dollars, for which he has this day executed a bond with interest at ten per centum payable annually, the said bond payable in five equal annual installments. The said Wiley Hall agrees to enter upon the said premises without titles and after payment of the said bond in full, then, and not till then, to receive titles to the said tract of land.

Witness our hands and seals this the first day of Jan., 1873.

The cause was referred to O. T. Calhoun and M. P. De Bruhl, Esqs., as referees. Referee Calhoun reported in favor of a credit of $60 claimed by defendant to have been paid January 1st, 1874, and that the bond bore simple interest at seven per cent. after maturity, and found the balance due by defendant to plaintiff on September 1st, 1879, to be $555.94. Referee De Bruhl found the balance on the same day to be $666.81, he having disallowed the alleged credit of $60, and having calculated interest after the maturity of the bond at ten per cent., payable annually. The cause came up for a hearing on exceptions to this report, and the Circuit judge filed the following decree:

This case was heard upon the reports of two referees, who differed in opinion and made separate reports, to both of which exceptions were filed. The referees do not differ in their findings of fact, except in the item of the credit for $60 claimed by the defendant. It appears to me that the weight of the evidence is against this credit, and as to that I concur with Mr. De Bruhl in rejecting it.

The main question in the case is as to the mode of calculating the interest. The principle of construction on this question is explained in Langston v. South Carolina Railroad Company, 2 S. C. 248. The legal rate applies unless displaced by the positive terms of the contract, and yields only so far as it is thus excluded. The interest was to be "at the rate of ten per centum per annum, to be payable annually, from date, upon the whole amount unpaid, the first installment ($239), besides interest, payable on January 1st, 1874, and the last installment of like amount, on January 1st, 1878, and the same amount, with all interest due, payable on the first day of January of each intervening year." This statement of the bond presents the two questions made upon its construction, first as to how far the rate of ten per cent. is to be applied to it; and next, whether annual interest is to be allowed after the maturity of the bond.

1. I consider that the rate of ten per cent. was established by the contract, not only for the detention of the principal sums due, but also for the detention of the interest when not paid each year. The rate applied to the "whole amount unpaid," and those words require this construction.

2. So also do they qualify the requirement in regard to payment of the interest annually. The interest was to be "payable annually, from date, upon the whole amount unpaid." This construction is supported by the decision of the Court of Errors in Wright v. Eaves, 10 Rich. Eq. 584, and would be in accordance with that case even without the words in the bond, "upon the whole amount unpaid," which seem to me to be conclusive, and to require that the interest be calculated with annual rests upon the whole amount unpaid, after, as well as before, the last payment became due. The bond in Wright v. Eaves was without those words, but in other respects very like this, and the Court of Errors decided that the interest was payable annually after, as well as before, maturity, thereby reversing the Circuit decree to that extent.

The report of Mr. De Bruhl does not contain a statement of his calculation of the interest, whereby its accuracy might be tested and his mode of calculating the same exemplified, and a further reference will be necessary. It is ordered and adjudged that the reports herein be so modified as to conform to the principles of this decree, and that the exceptions which accord therewith be sustained, and the other exceptions be overruled. That it be referred to the master to ascertain and report the amount due upon the bond aforesaid, in accordance with the said reports, as modified by this decree.

Defendant appealed on the following exceptions:

1. Because his Honor erred in overruling defendant's exceptions to the report of M. P. De Bruhl, Esq., one of the referees.

2. Because his Honor erred in overruling defendant's exceptions to the report of O. T. Calhoun, Esq., the other referee.

3. Because his Honor erred in sustaining plaintiff's exceptions to the said report of O. T. Calhoun, Esq.

4. Because there is a patent ambiguity upon the face of the two bonds, and his Honor erred in not giving them that construction which is most agreeable to the rules of law, instead of the contrary.

5. Because his Honor erred in allowing interest at the rate of ten per centum per annum on the bond in suit from its date to the date of the referee's report, and also in allowing compound interest on the said bond at the rate aforesaid, instead of computing annual interest from the date of said bond upon each installment thereof, until it became payable, at the rate of ten per centum per annum, and simple interest upon each installment thereof after it became payable, and upon each installment of interest that was payable annually, according to the terms of said bond, at the rate of seven per centum per annum.

6. Because his Honor erred in making the report of M. P. De Bruhl, Esq., the judgment of the Court.

7. Because the said judgment is contrary to the law of the case and the evidence adduced therein.

[For subsequent opinion, see 18 S. C. 600.]

Messrs. Burt & Graydon, for appellant.

Mr. W. H. Parker, contra.

October 21st, 1882. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice FRASER. On January 1st, 1873, the appellant executed his bond to the respondent, the condition of which was "the payment 'of one thousand one hundred and ninety-five dollars ($1,195) in five equal annual installments, with interest payable annually from date upon the whole amount unpaid, and at the rate of ten per centum per annum. The first installment payable on the first day of January, one thousand eight hundred and seventy-four, being two hundred and thirty-nine dollars ($239), besides interest, and the last installment of like amount on the first day of January, one thousand eight hundred and seventy-eight, and the same amount, with all interest due, payable on the first day of January of each intervening year." On the same day and year the said parties entered into a written agreement, under seal, that the respondent would convey to the appellant a certain tract of land upon the payment of the above described bond, which appellant thereby again covenanted to pay.

After various payments were made a dispute arose as to some alleged payments and as to the mode of calculating interest on the bond, and this action was brought for specific performance or sale of the land. The burden of proof as to the alleged payments was certainly on the appellant, and this court concurs with the Circuit judge that the weight of evidence is against the credit claimed for sixty dollars, and that it was properly disallowed.

The only other question presented to this court by the appeal is as to the mode of calculating interest, and it is conceded that this must be governed by the contract between the parties.

In the case of Mobley v. Davega, 16 S. C. 73 [42 Am. Rep. 632], there was a note "with interest from date at twelve and a half per cent. per annum, interest payable annually," and the mortgage contained the further words, "till paid," and the court held that interest was payable annually as well after as before maturity. The words here are "interest payable annually from date upon the whole amount unpaid, at the rate of ten per centum per annum." The words "till paid," it is held, will carry the interest agreed on beyond the period of maturity of the payments. The words "whole amount unpaid" cannot certainly refer to amounts not paid before maturity, because the rate as to this is fixed by the other words in the bond, and the word "unpaid" is more properly applicable to the amounts not paid when due, and which the obligor was then bound to pay, and which he had no right to pay before.

It does not appear to this court that there is any good reason for applying the term "unpaid" as used in this bond to any portion of the principal or interest, which, if tendered, the obligee had a right to refuse. The words must have some meaning, and their clear import is that any amounts not paid when due according to the condition of the bond, continue to bear interest at the rate of ten per centum per annum, payable annually, until the bond is paid up. This is the contract of the parties.

The court therefore concurs with the Circuit judge as to the mode of calculating interest on the bond. The reports of the two referees have been recommitted by the Circuit judge to the master "to ascertain and report the amount due upon the bond aforesaid in accordance with said reports as modified" by the Circuit decree, and upon the coming in of the master's report a final decree can be made on the Circuit.

It is therefore ordered and adjudged that the exceptions be overruled, the judgment of the Circuit Court affirmed, and the appeal dismissed.

Mr. Justice McIVER concurred.

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON, dissenting. Where annual interest is agreed to be paid on money foreborne, the general rule is that it stops at the maturity of the principal sum. It is not illegal, however, for a party to contract to pay annual interest after the maturity of the principal sum, as well as before, so that in every case, where the question arises whether annual interest should be computed after the maturity of the principal sum, it must be decided upon the construction of the contract. The true meaning and intent of the parties as derived from the terms of the instrument must be inquired into, and, when ascertained, will govern. See appendix to Johnstone's Digest, where the cases on this subject are collected and analyzed.

It has been decided that where a certain sum has been promised at twelve months, or any shorter period after date, with *interest, payable annually, that this is a contract to pay the interest annually, after the maturity as well as before. This is inferred from the word "annually," as there could be no other purpose in using this word, but to convey the idea that the interest was to be paid at the end of each year, till the debt was paid. Singleton v. Lewis, 2 Hill 408; O'Neill v. Bookman, 9 Rich. 80.

It has also been decided, that where a principal sum is promised at two or more years after date, with interest from date, payable annually, that the obligation of the debtor to pay annual interest stops at the maturity of the debt, because the term "annually" is satisfied by such a construction, the promise of the debtor being to pay the principal sum at the end of the two or more years, with the interest of each intervening year as it accrues, which, not being paid, would bear interest as these amounts fell due, respectively, as if a note had been given for these unpaid annual interests at the end of each intervening year. Gibbes v. Chisolm, 2 N. & McC. 38; O'Neill v. Sims, 1 Strohh. 115; DeBruhl v. Neuffer, Id. 426.

But where the promise is to pay a principal sum at the end of two or more years, with interest payable annually "till the whole debt is paid," these words, or any of similar import would require the party to pay annual interest after the maturity as well as before, because such is the plain meaning of the contract, the promise of its terms being to pay the debt at a fixed time and also annual interest on it, not as in the former case up to that time, but continually until the whole debt is paid. Thus, as has already been said, each contract depends upon its own terms, the question in every case being what was the understanding of the parties as expressed in the instrument under consideration.

Now apply these principles to the case before the court. Here the appellant gives bond that he would pay the respondent $1,195, in five equal annual installments from date, with annual interest on this sum. Suppose that the bond had stopped at this point, could the instrument be construed otherwise than that the appellant promised to pay the principal debt within five years, and also the annual interest that might ac-cure thereon *within that time? Could it be said that he had promised to pay annual interest after the five years? I think not, because the bond, as to all of the installments, would mature at the end of the five years, and while there is a promise to pay the interest on each installment at the end of each intervening year, there is nothing which shows that he was to pay the annual interest after the five years.

The bond in question, however, does not stop at this point; it provides further, "that the interest is to be paid annually on the whole amount unpaid," and the majority of the court has reached the conclusion that this term "unpaid" has the same effect as if the term "till paid" had been employed. It is conceded that if these latter terms had been used, this would carry the annual interest to the ultimate payment of the whole debt, because such would have been the distinct promise of the debtor. But, as I understand the case, the term "unpaid" was not used by the parties here synonymously with "till paid." Look at the bond. Its evident purpose was to bind the appellant to pay the respondent $1,195, the price of a certain tract of land. The appellant was to have five years to pay this sum as a whole, to be paid, however, in installments of one-fifth annually, the whole amount to be realized in five years, at the end of which time the ultimate maturity of the bond as a whole was to take place.

Now it was uncertain whether each installment would be met at the period of its special maturity. It was not known but what some of them, though falling due within the five years, might remain unpaid up to that time, and no doubt the term "unpaid" was employed to denote that if any of these installments were unpaid as they fell due, they should still carry annual interest up to the ultimate maturity of the bond as a whole, and not beyond the five years as held by the majority, the term "unpaid" having reference to the different installments, but within the five years. And this is the more reasonable when it is remembered that it is by no means certain, if this term had not been used, that the annual interest could have been carried beyond the maturity of each installment.

There is some doubt whether, in the absence of this term, the *bond might not have been construed as containing five different obligations, falling due at one, two, three, four and five years, with annual interest on each, consecutively, in which case, under our decisions, the first bond being due at one year, with interest payable annually, this term, by its own force, would carry the annual interest until the installment was paid. The other four installments, however, falling due at longer dates than one year, would be governed by the other decisions, which hold that the annual interest stops as the debts become due. The term "unpaid" prevents this as to all of the installments and requires the annual interest to run on upon each, though not paid when due—not indefinitely, however, but until the expiration of the five years, when the whole bond was expected to be satisfied. The limit of the contract, as a whole, was five years, and the intervening stipulations had reference to that period.

Under this theory, the interest on the bond in question should have been computed annually on all installments remaining unpaid from the date of the bond for five years, at the rate specified in the bond; after that time the annual interest to cease and the regular legal interest to attach upon the whole. Differing, as I do, in this construction from the Circuit judge who heard the case, and from the majority of this court, no doubt I am in error; but I have been unable to see the case as my brethren have. Hence this dissenting opinion.

Judgment affirmed.

STATE v. SMITH.

(April Term, 1882.)

[Criminal Law ⚡878.]

Where several distinct offenses are charged in different counts of an indictment, all growing out of the same act or acts, even though subject to different punishments, a general verdict of guilty furnishes no ground for a motion in arrest of judgment or for new trial, provided the jury have been explicitly instructed as to the form and effect of their verdict.

Before Aldrich, J., Anderson, February, 1882.

*This was a prosecution against Sherman Smith and four other defendants. The opinion fully states the case.

Mr. W. C. Benet, for appellants.

Mr. Solicitor Orr, contra.

October 25th, 1882. The opinion of the court was delivered by Mr. Justice McIVER. The indictment in this case contains three counts. The first charges that the defendants "did unlawfully, willfully and maliciously and feloniously set fire to the county jail;" the second, that they "did unlawfully, willfully, maliciously and feloniously set fire to the dwelling-house of James H. McConnell;" and the third, that the defendants "did willfully, unlawfully and maliciously mutilate, deface and injure the house, that is to say, the jail of Anderson county, upon real estate in the possession of James H. McConnell." The first two counts, therefore, charge a felony, and the third a misdemeanor.

The Circuit judge, in his charge to the jury, explained the different counts and the effect of a verdict on them, saying: "If they found the prisoners guilty of arson—defining it—they should find them guilty generally; if they did not find them guilty of arson, but of malicious injury, they should write, 'not guilty as to the first and second counts, guilty as to the third count.' If they should find them not guilty of any of the counts, they should say, 'not guilty.' That if they found the prisoners guilty, they could recommend them to mercy." The jury returned a general verdict of guilty, with a recommendation to mercy, whereupon the defendants made a motion in arrest of judgment and for a new trial upon two grounds, which being refused, they now, by this appeal, renew these motions upon the same grounds. As the second ground was abandoned at the argument in this court, it will only be necessary to state the first, which is as follows: "Because his Honor erred in holding that the verdict of guilty, generally, upon an indictment containing a charge of felony, and a count in the same indictment charging a misdemeanor, when the penalties were different, was not a ground for a new trial."

*It must be conceded that it is somewhat difficult to reconcile the decisions in this State upon the point presented by this appeal, and we simply propose, after reviewing the cases, to deduce from them what we understand to be the rule upon this subject.

In State v. Montague, 2 McC. 257, the indictment was for a misdemeanor, and contained two counts, but what those two counts were does not appear. All that is said upon this branch of the case is: "There are two distinct counts in the indictment, each charging the prisoner with a different and distinct offense, for each of which offenses the law has provided a different and distinct punishment. A general verdict of guilty does not show of which offense he was guilty. The judgment of the court, therefore, cannot be pronounced." A new trial was accordingly granted. In the opinion no authority is cited and no reasoning employed except what has just been quoted. It does not appear that the jury were instructed so to shape their verdict as to indicate which of the two offenses they believed the party charged to be guilty of, nor as to the effect of a general verdict.

In State v. Crank, 2 Bail. 66 [23 Am. Dec. 117], the defendant was indicted for murder. In the first count he was charged with having struck the mortal blow, in the second with having been present aiding and abetting another who struck the mortal blow, in the third and fourth he was similarly charged, only varying the name of the person charged with striking the mortal blow, and in the fifth count he was charged as accessory before the fact. There was a general verdict of guilty, and one of the grounds of the motion in arrest of judgment was, that, under a general verdict upon such an indictment, no judgment could be pronounced, as the court could not know whether the intention of the jury was to find the prisoner guilty of murder in the first or second degree, or of being an accessory before the fact. The court held that the motion could not be sustained, saying: "If therefore, several felonies of the same degree be included in the same indictment and there is a general verdict, judgment may be given on any or all of them, according as they may have been supported by the proof." It will be observed that the material difference between Crank's case and the foregoing one is that in the latter case the *punishment was the same under all of the counts, while in Montague's Case it was different.

In State v. Priester, Cheves 103, Judge Earle, in delivering the opinion of the court, lays down this doctrine, that two distinct offenses with different penalties may be embraced in the same indictment; "but," he adds, "care must be taken to have the verdict framed so as to secure the several counts." This, however, is a mere dictum, inasmuch as in that case the indictment was for unlawfully trading with a slave under the act of 1817, and in one count the defendant was charged with buying corn from a slave, and in the other with selling liquor to the same slave, it being all the same transaction, the liquor having been delivered to the slave in exchange for the corn. And upon a general verdict, the court, on a motion in arrest of judgment, held that there was no misjoinder of two offenses, but that it was the same offense charged in different forms.

In State v. Anderson, 1 Strob. 455, the indictment contained two counts, one, under the act of 1834, charging the defendant, as a vendor of spirituous liquors, with delivering liquor to a slave; the other, under the act of 1817, charging the defendant with unlawfully trading with a slave, both charges growing out of the same transaction. There was a general verdict, and the defendant moved in arrest of judgment and for a new trial on the ground, inter alia, that no judgment could be rendered upon such a verdict where the indictment contained two counts, charging different and distinct offenses and punishable differently. The court held that while this afforded no ground for arresting the judgment, yet it did furnish good ground for a new trial, and granted that motion. The reason given seems to have been that, while different offenses might be joint in the same indictment, though not in the same count, yet, on a general verdict, the court would not know on which count to pass sentence. In this case, also, it does not appear that the jury were instructed as to the effect of a general verdict, or that they could so shape their verdict as to indicate what offense they thought the defendant guilty of. Inasmuch as it appeared in this case that the count under the act of 1817 was fatally defective, it is difficult to understand how the court could have reached the result which *they did, in the face of the decision in the State v. Poole, 2 Tread. Con. Rep. 494, which, in that very case, it is said has been followed ever since. See State v. Pace, 9 Rich. 355, where it was held that a general verdict upon an indictment containing two counts, one of which was so defective as not to warrant any judgment upon it, would be sustained and referred to the good court.

In State v. Tidwell, 5 Strob. 1, the defendants were indicted for abduction under the act of 4 & 5 P. & M. ch. 8. The indictment contained four counts. The first, framed under the third section of the act, charged both of the defendants with abducting the girl from the possession of her father; the second, framed under the fourth section of the act, charged that both abducted the girl and that Tidwell married her; the third was like the first count, except that it contained the additional averment that the girl was an heir apparent of her father, and the fourth was similar to the second count, with the additional averment contained in the third. The punishment imposed by the fourth section of the act was greater than under the third section. The jury rendered a general verdict of guilty and the defendants moved in arrest of judgment because the indictment charged two distinct offenses, admitting of different degrees of punishment, and a general verdict of guilty did not show of which offense the jury intended to find the parties guilty. The court held that this furnished no ground for a motion in arrest of judgment. Whether it would support a motion for a new trial does not seem to have been distinctly considered, though the intimation is that it would not in that particular case, inasmuch as the offenses charged were of the same general nature, and the aggravation alleged in one of the counts, while it increased the penalty, could be regarded as embracing the other, and therefore a general verdict should be regarded as having found the highest degree of guilt.

In State v. Posey, 7 Rich. 484, the indictment contained four counts for grand larceny and two for receiving stolen goods, one under the statute and the other at common law, both being misdemeanors. The jury found the defendant guilty of "receiving stolen goods, knowing them to be stolen." A motion in arrest of judgment was made, upon the ground that it did not appear from the verdict upon which count the finding rests. The court said that after the verdict, the indictment must be regarded as containing only the two counts charging the offense of receiving stolen goods, and held that there was no ground for the motion in arrest of judgment. Although there was no motion for a new trial based upon this ground, yet the court, for the benefit of the defendant, treated it as such a motion, and held that though the uncertainty as to which count the verdict referred to might be a good ground for a new trial, if one count was good and the other bad, or the punishment under the two counts were different in kind, yet in this case there was no such uncertainty, and that even if the sixth count was bad, the verdict might be referred to the fifth, as the offenses charged were of the same general nature, and it was at least doubtful whether there was any difference in the punishment. Accordingly the motion was refused.

In State v. Major, 14 Rich. 76, the indictment contained three counts. In the first the three defendants were charged with stealing a colt; in the second, Warren and Hiram Major were charged with the same offense, and Daniel Major was charged as accessory before the fact; and in the third count, all three were charged with a misdemeanor, in receiving the colt knowing it to be stolen. The jury found the following verdict: "Warren T. Major and Hiram Major, guilty; Daniel Major, guilty of petit larceny." One of the questions raised on a motion for a new trial was, whether any judgment could be pronounced upon this verdict. The court held that the offenses charged being distinct and different, and subject to different punishments, there was no means of determining from the verdict of what offense the parties were guilty, and hence no means of ascertaining what punishment should be imposed. The court drew a distinction between this case and that of "the case of a general verdict on an indictment containing several counts, charging offenses of the same general nature, but different degrees, where each higher necessarily includes all the lower grades, distinguished from them by an aggravation of guilt and a corresponding increase in the measure, but not variation in the kind, of penalty, and where the less offense being merged in the greater, the general verdict shall be taken to have found the highest grade, if the proof be applicable to it," as in Tidwell's Case, supra; and said it was rather a case where distinct offenses are charged, for each of which the law prescribes a different and distinct punishment, and that a general verdict not showing of which offense the parties have been found guilty, the court cannot know what judgment to pronounce, as in Montague's Case, supra. It will be observed that in this case it does not appear that any instructions were given to the jury as to the form in which they might find their verdict, or as to the effect of a general verdict.

In State v. Nelson, 14 Rich. 169 [94 Am. Dec. 130], the indictment contained three counts: The first charging burglary; the second charging another burglary at a different time and place from the first; and the third charging larceny, at the same time and place mentioned in the second count; the alleged value of the property stolen being under $20. So that the case presented was one in which two distinct felonies and a misdemeanor were charged in different counts of the same indictment; the misdemeanor charged growing out of the same transaction as that upon which the second felony charged rested, with a general verdict of guilty. Upon a motion in arrest of judgment, which the court treated as a motion for a new trial, the rule was laid down in the following language: "Where an indictment charges the same transaction in one count as a felony, and in another as a misdemeanor of such nature that the latter is, or may be, included in the former, it is merged in it, if the higher offense has been consummated; and the jury, even if there were no charge of the less offense in a separate count, might convict of this under the count for the greater, if the evidence, in their judgment, warranted no more. A general verdict is understood to find the higher offense if there is testimony to support it; and the finding of such verdict is not a ground for a new trial even. It is proper, however, that the jury should be distinctly instructed as to the effect of their general finding in such case, and that they are at liberty to distinguish, and, according to their views of the evidence, convict on the one count or the other; and it is more satisfactory that they should do this."

*In State v. Scott, 15 S. C. 434, the rule, as laid down in Nelson's Case, has been recently affirmed by this court.

From this review of our cases, we think that the rule to be extracted from them is, that where several distinct offenses are charged in different counts of an indictment, all growing out of the same act or acts, even though subject to different punishments, a general verdict of guilty furnishes no ground for a motion in arrest of judgment, and no ground for a new trial, provided the jury have been explicitly instructed that the effect of a general verdict will be to find the party accused guilty of the highest offense charged in the indictment, and that they have the right to designate in their verdict which one of the particular offenses charged they believe the accused to be guilty of.

In the case now before the court, it is conceded that both of the offenses charged in the indictment grew out of the same act; and it appears that the jury were very explicitly instructed how to shape their verdict so as to show distinctly of what particular offense they believed the parties guilty. For the Circuit judge, after explaining what constituted arson, told the jury that if they believed the parties guilty of that offense, their verdict should be guilty generally; but if they did not believe the defendants guilty of arson, but only guilty of malicious injury, then their verdict should be not guilty as to the first and second counts, but guilty on the third count; and if they did not believe them guilty of either of the offenses charged, their verdict should be not guilty. It seems to us, after such instructions, a general verdict of guilty leaves no more doubt as to the offense of which the jury intended to convict the defendants than if their verdict had been guilty of arson, or guilty on the first or second counts.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment below be affirmed.

Before Cothran, J., Richland, November, 1881.

Action by Hirshkind & Co. against Morris Israel, Charles Elias and Jesse E. Dent, sheriff, commenced February 14th, 1879. Afterwards, on motion, certain attaching creditors of Charles Elias were made parties defendant. The case is fully stated in the Circuit decree.

The master, N. B. Barnwell, Esq., to whom all the issues were referred, reported that there was no fraudulent intent on the part of Israel, and that the terms of the mortgage did not constitute fraud in law. Upon the first ground, his findings were as follows:

In support of the first ground a great deal of testimony was taken, in which the validity of the loan, by Israel to Elias, was sought to be impeached, and an effort was made to show that from the conduct of the defendants, Elias and Morris Israel, an inference of the fraudulent nature of the transaction necessarily arose. In my opinion, the facts do not sustain this view, and I find that the transaction between Elias and Morris Israel, at least so far as the latter is concerned, is entirely free from any fraud in fact, and that the debts secured by the mortgage were bona fide transactions, and the mortgage given to secure the same was *not, as a matter of fact, made with any fraudulent intent, nor for the purpose of delaying or hindering the creditors of Charles Elias.

It is clear that at the time of the transaction, i. e., the execution of the mortgage, the defendant Charles Elias was insolvent, but there is no proof that this fact was known to Morris Israel. Prior to that time the credit of Elias was good; he had before borrowed large amounts from the defendant Israel, and repaid them, and, so far as the evidence shows, this mortgage was in fact intended by Israel to operate entirely as a security for his debt, and in no respect whatever does he appear to have contemplated the use of his mortgage as a cover against other creditors. There is no proof of any collusion to that end, in any of the conduct of Israel. The mortgage had a short time to run, it was left with the notes in the hands of the attorneys of Israel, with instructions to enforce the mortgage promptly upon the non-payment of the notes. It is true some delay did occur, but this appears to have been due to the solicitations of Elias, addressed to the attorneys of Israel.

Much testimony was taken in reference to the disposition made by Elias of the money borrowed from Israel, but I cannot see that this has any bearing upon Israel's mortgage, except in so far as it was supposed to discredit the claim of Israel to be a creditor of Elias for the amount alleged to be due him, and for this purpose it was, in my opinion, entirely insufficient; for it must be clear, and in order that this conveyance be set aside for fraud, the fraudulent purpose must be shown to have been shared in both by grantor and grantee.

What right have we then to infer a fraud against the grantee here from the conduct of Elias? The defendant Israel testifies that at the outset of this transaction, considering Elias as perfectly solvent and in good credit, he made no inquiry as to his liabilities, had no information on this point. He simply examined the value of his stock of goods, estimated them at $7,000, and took the mortgage, under the impression that at that time there was an ample amount of property to secure him, and in this view the facts would seem to have borne him out, for when, at the time of the seizure of the property, an inventory was made, being two months after the date of his mortgage, the value of the stock at its cost price in New York was over $5,000.

At the trial before me, the fact that, at the sale of the property, which took place before the trial, Israel became the purchaser of a very large portion of it, sold out his share of the purchases to Mrs. Eva Elias, the wife of Charles Elias, and that she subsequently carried on the business, was alleged as bearing upon this question. If this had been done in pursuance of any agreement or understanding between Israel and Elias at the time of the execution of the mortgage, the indirect benefit resulting to Elias' family might have some weight in vitiating the mortgage; but I see nothing in the mortgage to indicate any such agreement. I do not think, therefore, that this is entitled to any weight in determining the question as to any actual intent on the part of Israel to permit his mortgage to be used to delay, hinder, or defraud the creditors of Elias.

The Circuit decree was as follows:

This is an action brought by the plaintiffs, as mortgagees of a stock of merchandise, the property of the defendant Elias, mainly, for the purpose of setting aside, on the ground of fraud, a senior mortgage of the same stock of merchandise given by the said Elias to his co-defendant Israel.

The matter was submitted by consent of counsel upon written arguments; and although I have cause to regret their actual absence, that has been compensated, as far as it could properly be, by the submission of very learned and exhaustive arguments. By an order of the late Judge Thomson, made in this court on April 25th, 1879, it was referred to the master to hear and determine all the issues in this action and report to this court his findings and conclusions, together with the evidence. Pursuant to this order, the master, on June 6th, 1879, began to hold the series of references duly noted in the mass of testimony taken by him, and on July 11th, 1879, made up his report adversely to the plaintiffs upon all the issues made in this cause. To this report the plaintiffs, by their counsel, have filed sixteen exceptions, which will be considered and determined after making a brief statement of the case.

*The defendant, Charles Elias, during the year 1878, and for a year or so previously to that time, was a merchant, doing business as such in the city of Columbia. Before that time, whilst merchandising in Camden, he had some moneyed transactions with the defendant Israel, who, it appears, was engaged in the brokerage business (lending money) in the city of Charleston. These were promptly and fully adjusted by Elias, and Israel's confidence thereby secured.

In the fall of the year 1878, Elias applied by letter to Israel for further pecuniary aid, and was invited to Charleston by the latter with favorable assurance. He went accordingly, and then executed the first note for $1,000, dated October 4th, 1878, at seventy days, due December 13th, 1878; second note for $500, dated November 11th, 1878, at thirty days, due December 11th, 1878; third note for $500, dated December 12th, 1878, at ten days, due December 22d, 1878. The last note was made and delivered in Columbia, Israel having gone there on account of these repeated demands for aid, and, as he says in his testimony, "feeling a little uneasy."

Before Israel would consent to make the last loan, he required Elias to give some security for the $1,500 already loaned, and after "some consultation and dilly-dallying" (in the words of the defendant Israel), and examination of the stock of merchandise, Elias reluctantly consented to give the mortgage, the subject of this contention. The mortgage is of the stock of merchandise then in the store of Elias, and using the words of the instrument, "as well said stock now in the said establishment, as such goods, wares, and merchandise as may from time to time hereafter be acquired in lieu and place thereof in the current business of the said mercantile establishment," embracing in the tenendum of the deed the property "after acquired as aforesaid," and to secure the sum of the three notes, viz., $2,000. This mortgage was executed December 12th, 1878, and recorded in register's office on December 24th, 1878.

The plaintiffs' transaction with Elias bears date January 10th, 1879, a little more than two weeks after Israel's mortgage was recorded in the register's office, and is evidenced by a note for the sum of $332.50, secured by mortgage of equal date, of the *stock of merchandise then in the store of the said Elias; this mortgage was recorded January 24th, 1879.

On the 3d day of February following, ten days after plaintiffs' mortgage was recorded Israel ~~duy~~ appointed J. E. Dent, then sheriff of Richland county, as his agent to seize and sell the said mortgaged property, and on February 10th the seizure was made and Dent took possession of the entire stock. On February 14th, four days after the seizure by Dent, the plaintiffs began this action, and on February 26th, by agreement of all the parties interested, the sale by Dent was allowed to be made, and this contention is over the proceeds of the sale of the mortgaged property.

Exceptions to the Report.—I agree with the learned counsel for the plaintiffs, that the numerous exceptions to the master's report may be substantially expressed in two propositions, viz.: 1. That the evidence adduced shows with reasonable certainty that the mortgage to Israel was executed with the intent to hinder, delay and defeat the other creditors of the mortgagor, Elias. 2. That the said mortgage is void by presumption of law, because such fraudulent intent is apparent upon its very face.

As to the First Proposition.—In these issues the plaintiffs have taken the affirmative, and it is a well established rule of evidence that he who alleges must prove. The charge of fraud is almost criminal, and in the case of obtaining goods under false pretenses, which is a species of fraud, is punished criminally. Still the rule of "proof beyond a reasonable doubt," is not required of the plaintiffs here; nevertheless on account of the very nature of the charge, it does not admit of any relaxation of that other rule, that the charge should be established by the clear preponderance of the evidence. Upon a careful review of the testimony, as reported, I do not find that clear preponderance, and I shall therefore dispose of the first proposition herein, by stating my concurrence in the conclusion reached by the master (for the reasons so well stated by him, and for others perhaps, which might be given), who has found "that the transaction between Elias and Morris Israel, at least so far as the latter is *concerned, is entirely free from any fraud in fact, and that the debts secured by the mortgage were bona fide transactions, and the mortgage given to secure the same, was not, at a matter of fact, made with any fraudulent intent, nor for the purpose of delaying or hindering the creditors of Charles Elias."

As to the Second Proposition.—There is not perhaps in the whole range of the judiciary of this country and of England a more vexed question than the one now under consideration. Mr. Jones, the distinguished author of the latest and confessedly the most valuable work on Mortgages of Real Estate and of Chattels, in a recent number of the Southern Law Review, Vol. 7, (N. S.) p. 95, has treated the subject of fraud in chattel mortgages in a most masterly manner. I can do little more with propriety in the narrow limits of a Circuit decree than to direct attention to that article, and state his conclusions with some of the reasons given. I can certainly hope to add little, if indeed anything, of value, to his vast array of authorities or to the force of his reasoning. If I be then sustained or overruled in the conclusions which I shall announce, which have been attained with some labor, there can be as little cause for exultation on the one hand as for depression on the other, for it appears that the main question involved, to wit: Whether a mortgagor's possession of mortgaged goods with power of disposal, makes the transaction fraudulent per se, or only prima facie evidence of fraud to be passed upon by a jury (or master or referee) upon all the evidence, and the surrounding circumstances of the case, has been passed upon by twenty-six courts of last resort in the Union—thirteen of them holding one way, and thirteen the other. To the many holding the doctrine that the transaction is fraudulent per se, upon a peculiar state of facts, and upon which some observations will be made hereafter, may be added the case of Robinson v. Elliott, 22 Wall. 513 [22 L. Ed. 758].

The definition of fraud is always matter of law. The statutes of Elizabeth, thirteenth and twenty-seventh, are declaratory of the common law, and it was said by Lord Mansfield that "the principles of the common law, as now universally known and understood, are so strong against fraud in every shape that the common law would have attained every end proposed by these *statutes." These statutes do not embrace conditional sales, and we have in this State no statute enlarging the operation of the statutes of Elizabeth, as are to be found in some of the statutes of the Union, and upon whose judicial decisions has been engrafted what is styled "the American doctrine of Twyne's Case." And, in this connection, it may be profitable to bear in mind, that in the array of cases holding the doctrine contended for by the plaintiff here, statutory enactments will be found which make the retention of possession by the mortgagor fraudulent as in the case of absolute transfers.

But even in cases of absolute conveyance, the early doctrine announced by Marshall, C. J., in Hamilton v. Russell, 1 Cranch 310 [2 L. Ed. 118], although since much discussed, has not been shaken or altered, i. e., that possession consistent with the deed is not fraudulent, and possession inconsistent with the deed is fraudulent in law, and that it is this consistency, or inconsistency, which settles the question of fraud in law.

To a dictum of Judge Buller, in Edward v. Harben, 2 T. R. 587, it is said undue importance has been given in the English courts; but Chancellor Harper, in Smith v. Henry, 1 Hill 21, acknowledging that the case was supposed to have been overruled or departed from by subsequent decisions, upon the examination which he had been able to make of the several cases, thought it not impossible to reconcile them. Whether such result was successfully accomplished by that most learned judge, it is now certain, that in England, the case has been questioned, and the doctrine sought to be established by it has been overthrown in the case of Martindale v. Booth, 3 Barn. & Ad. 498, and others. In that case Parke, J., and Patterson, J., by different forms of expression, argue that "there is no sufficient authority for saying that the want of delivery of possession absolutely makes void a bill of sale of chattels." It was conceded to be a badge of fraud "which ought to be left to the jury; then if a badge of fraud only * * * all the circumstances must be taken into consideration.

And I submit that it would be as illegal and as illogical to convict one charged with crime upon a single well-forged link of circumstantial evidence, when all the other links of the *chain were defective, as to adjudge and conclude a transaction to be fraudulent from the existence of a single badge of fraud, however well defined the same might be. In such case "all the circumstances must be taken into consideration."

The foregoing authority and observations apply in the main to absolute sales, not to conditional sales or mortgages, so much affected here by our registry laws, which have wholly changed the character of mortgages at common law, except in those rare cases where possession is transferred to the mortgagee. In England there has not existed until recently, if there is now, any general system of registration similar to ours. See Life of Lord Campbell (Am. ed.), Vol. 2, p. 89. Then great stress seems to have been laid on the earlier cases, in the time of Judge Buller, for instance, upon the fact of retention of possession by the mortgagor; such was held to be conclusive evidence of fraud not susceptible of explanation. But Mr. Jones, in the article above referred to, says: "The modern English doctrine, (citing numerous authorities in note 2, p. 97,) and that more generally adopted by the American courts, (see cases cited in note 3, p. 97,) is, that possession by a vendor as mortgagor, is only prima facie a badge of fraud; that the presumptions arising from that circumstance may be rebutted by explanations showing the transactions to have been fair and honest; and that the question of fraud is always one of fact for a jury to determine."

And so Mr. May, on Fraudulent Conveyance, p. 101, says: "It by no means follows, though, that because there is no possession given, a transfer is fraudulent, for those cases in which the judges have said that if possession was not given, it was fraudulent, must be taken with reference to the circumstances of each case. The question of possession is one of much importance, but that is with a view to ascertain the good or bad faith of the transaction." In Arundell v. Phipps, 10 Ves. 139, Lord Eldon said that the mere circumstance of the possession of chattels, however familiar it might be to say that it proves fraud, amounts to no more than that it is prima facie evidence of property in the man possessing until a title not fraudulent is shown under which that possession has followed—that every case from Twyne's Case downward supports that, and there was no occasion otherwise for *the statute of King James. There was no sufficient authority for saying that the want of delivery of possession makes void a bill of sale of goods and chattels; it is prima facie evidence of a fraudulent intention, and if it be a badge of fraud only, in order to ascertain whether a deed be fraudulent or not, all the circumstances must be taken into consideration.

I suggest with the greatest diffidence and at the risk of being charged with iconoclasm, some further observations upon the subject of fraud. There appears to me to be some confusion and much injustice of distinction in the meaning of the familiar terms, legal fraud or fraud in law, and actual fraud or fraud in fact. This enforced distinction has sometimes involved its advocates in the manifest absurdity of maintaining a transaction to be fraudulent in law which they are forced to admit is bona fide in fact. Surely the law, which is boastfully said to be the perfection of human reason, if properly understood and rightfully administered, can effect no such result.

Actus legis nemini est damnosus. Would it not be more consistent with the perfection of human reason and with the harmony of legal science, to say that the only real distinction is to be found in the means and manner in which fraud is made to appear? Illustration is sometimes more convincing than argument. Suppose A. should convey his entire estate (being indebted) to B. for very inadequate consideration, and should stipulate in the deed of conveyance for the return of the usufruct to himself. That transaction would be hastily adjudged, and properly, to be fraudulent, fraudulent per se. Suppose an adequate consideration were stated in the deed, but neither paid nor secured to be paid, and the matter of the usufruct were made the subject of a private bargain or arrangement, and B., put upon the stand, disclosed the whole truth about it—the latter too would be adjudged to be fraud, fraud in fact, and by the casuist would be regarded an act of greater moral turpitude on account of the baser means used to accomplish the same purpose as in the former case. But the same law adjudges both transactions, and pronounces precisely the same judgment on each, by declaring both to be utterly fraudulent, null and void.

These illustrations are of extreme cases, it is true, and intermediately are to be found in the multitudinous transactions of men, the infinite diversity of fraudulent acts which so obscure our minds.

To one who marveled what should be the reason that acts and statutes are continually made at every parliament without intermission and without end, a wise man made a good and short answer, which is well composed in verse:

Quesitur ut crescant tot magna volumina legis?

In promptu causa est, crescit in orbe doctus.

Having already referred to the able article of Mr. Jones in the So. Law Rev., supra, in which the authorities are collected, and to the same writer's work on Chattel Mortgages, it is but fair that I should refer to a collation of the authorities, which support the views contended for by the plaintiff here; these are collected with great care by Mr. James O. Pierce in an article in the same Review, Vol. 2, p. 731; and also to Herman on Chattel Mortgages, passim. It is not consistent with the proper limits of this decree to do more than give these references, make the promised observations upon the case of Robinson v. Elliott, and review as briefly as I can the case of Griswold v. Sheldon, 4 N. Y. 581.

This case is selected for the reason that it stands at the head of the many cases containing the doctrine contended for by the plaintiffs here, and may justly be considered a Pandora's box out of which has come a multitude of evils and distempers, increasing the law's uncertainty. Judge Lowell, an eminent district judge of the United States Court for the district of Massachusetts, in the case of Brett v. Carter, reported in Vol. 3, No. 18, Cent. L. Jour., p. 286 [Fed. Cas. No. 1,844] referring to this case in 4th Coms., supra, says: "This doctrine has had a remarkable vitality, considering the feebleness of its birth, to have become the law of New York, Ohio, Illinois, and probably of some other States. It is not the law of England, Maine, Massachusetts, Michigan, Iowa, and probably of some other States."

Mr. Jones, the author of the valuable works already referred to, makes the enumeration more fully, as already stated. By reference to the case of Griswold v. Sheldon, supra, it will be seen that Judges Brown,

Ruggles, Jewitt and McCoun, sustained the views of the plaintiffs here, opposed by Judges Mullet, Gardnier, Gray and Paige—an equally divided court. By Sec. 5, 2d Rev. Stat., p. 136 (New York), it is provided that when the possession of the mortgage is not changed, the mortgage in law is presumed to be fraudulent. Similar statutory enactments are to be found in others of the thirteen States which have adopted the New York doctrine, extending the provision of the statutes of Elizabeth, and the doctrine of Twyne's Case to conditional sales.

In South Carolina there has been no statutory enlargement, and the current of decisions by our own courts is unbroken in holding that the possession by the mortgagor, after condition broken, is not regarded even as a badge of fraud. Gist v. Pressley, 2 Hill Eq. 323; Maples v. Maples, Rice Eq. 300; Bank v. Gourdin, Speers Eq. 439; Fishburne v. Kunhardt, 2 Speers 556; Smith v. Henry, 1 Hill 16, and the class of cases attaching so much and such just importance to the fact of possession by the vendor, will be found upon examination to be cases of absolute sale and obnoxious to the statutes of Elizabeth, made of force here by statute, and re-enacted in the general statutes of the State, but without enlargement.

The plaintiffs here, however, are not content to claim the retention of the possession by Elias, the mortgagor, as merely a badge of fraud or a presumption of fraud, but urge such retention as a conclusion of law that it is fraud per se, and, as such, not susceptible of explanation. Such, it is true, is the nature of a conclusion, for it means, "determination, final decision," and, as such, I maintain that its basis should be irrefragable truth. It should be so potential, so comprehensive, and so complete as to exclude all reasonable possibility of the existence of a state of things different from that which it determines. Whenever, through its operation, the law destroys the right or privilege of a citizen, it becomes the oppressor of those whom it is its duty to protect, and is as merciless, as cruel, and as unjust as the bed of Procrustes. To this doctrine I cannot yield assent. It is not in harmony with the principles of justice; it is not consistent with truth, which, for a time, at least, it may crush; and it may be well to consider, lest in intemperate zeal to prevent fraud, we do err in that more reprehensible extreme of perpetrating a judicial wrong.

Robinson v. Elliott, 22 Wall. 513 [22 L. Ed. 758]. If this decision of the Supreme Court of the United States were conclusively in favor of the doctrine contended for by the plaintiffs here, while from the manifest difference in the manner and purpose, and length of time of the retention of the mortgagor's possession, I hold it to be altogether otherwise; I am by no means prepared to admit that it would be my duty to surrender unconditionally my convictions to a decision made even by that august tribunal. I should feel constrained to do so if the contention were upon a matter of which that court might or would have in the orderly progress of the cause the right of final arbitrament, in a case, for instance, involving a constitutional question, wherein the right of appeal would be finally to that court. But in all other cases (and this one is such) it seems to me that the decisions of the court, whilst entitled to the profoundest respect, are to be followed by the State courts only on account of the cogency and value of their reasoning.

If Judge Lowell, of the District Court of Massachusetts, in the case of Brett v. Carter, already referred to, could venture "to doubt, both the generality and the justice of the doctrine," as laid down by Mr. Justice Davis in Robinson v. Elliott, of whose court that of the learned district judge is an appendant, it could hardly be regarded as an act of judicial rebellion in me to do likewise. I cannot say, however, that I am prepared to distrust the justness of that decision or its correctness in view of the peculiar facts of the case, nor is it necessary, in my opinion, to do so in order to sustain the validity of the mortgage under consideration here.

I claim, to the fullest possible extent, the right to adjudge, as matter of law, the existence of legal fraud wherever it appears upon the face of the instrument itself. The true question is as to the degrees of conclusiveness (so to speak). Was it a presumption of fraud to be explained or rebutted by proof on the part of the mortgagors, or was it a legal conclusion of fraud, not susceptible of explanation? The learned Justice held the latter view; and under the fierce light that beats upon every judicial *trial, always so much brighter than the most luminous report that can be made of it, it would be as far from me as it would be unbecoming to say that the decision was not right. But the facts and circumstances of the case differ widely from those of the case at bar. The main inquiry in both, as in all such, is, for what purpose was the mortgage in fact given? Was it given as a security, pure and simple, or was it for this and something more, such as a personal benefit to the mortgagor, or an injury in the shape of obstruction or hindrance to other creditors?

Mr. Justice Davis found both of these obnoxious features on the face of the Cooledge mortgage. He says: "Manifestly it (the mortgage) was executed to enable the mortgagors to continue their business, and appear to the world as the absolute owners of the goods, and enjoy all the advantages resulting therefrom"—this was the unlawful benefit to the debtors. Again he says: "Whatever may have been the motive which actuated the parties to this instrument, it is manifest that the necessary result of what they did do was to allow the mortgagors, under cover of the mortgage, to sell the goods as their own, and appropriate the proceeds to their own purposes, and this, too, for an indefinite length of time." The Italics are mine. This is the other feature of hindrance to creditors.

Upon the face of the mortgage the covenants for further endorsements are renewals by Robinson for other amounts, and the renewal from time to time of the notes to Mrs. Sloane gave to the transaction the character of continuance, permanency; and it might well have been questioned if, in the face of these covenants, before a renewal occurred, or a further endorsement was made by the mortgagors, they would have been permitted to enforce their mortgage at all. The transaction stipulating for "further endorsements," and "renewals from time to time," extended over a space of twenty-five months; and the catastrophe finally occurred upon the death of one of the mortgagors and the discovery of the firm's insolvency. Neither the sum to be secured nor the time for enforcing the payment was fixed. Such uncertainty of amount, such indefiniteness of time could not be cured by the maxim, "id certum est," etc., especially so when these qualities of certainty and fixedness are absolutely indispensable in determining the question, whether or not the mortgage is a security pure and simple, or a security and something more, that something more being abhorred by the law.

In the case at bar it appears that early in December, 1878, Israel became uneasy upon the subject of Elias' indebtedness to him, and went to Columbia to see about it. He held Elias' notes then for $1,500, soon to become due. Elias wanted more money. Israel agreed to let him have $500 more if he would secure him with a mortgage covering that sum and also the $1,500. Was it more or less than the old, old story of sending good money after bad—sometimes wise, sometimes otherwise, always lawful, not always expedient? Elias was a merchant, and the mortgage given was for merchandise estimated at the time as more than double in value the amount of the mortgage debt. It was duly recorded within the time prescribed by the statute, and the plaintiffs were then bound with notice of its contents. On January 10th, more than two weeks after Israel's mortgage was recorded, the plaintiffs took from Elias the note secured by mortgage of the same stock of goods with which they have come into court. Their mortgage differs from Israel's only in the amount of debt secured, in date, and in the absence of a provision to subject accretions of merchandise to its lien. It was taken on January 10th, held without recording to January 24th, and, so far as appears from the pleadings and proof, no steps were taken for its enforcement until after the seizure of the goods under Israel's mortgage on February 10th. It was four days after this, to wit, on February 14th, that plaintiffs' action was begun.

Thus it appears as matter of fact that

Elias' retention of possession ended four days before the plaintiffs' suit was begun, and it might be interesting to inquire how far this reduction into possession by Israel of the mortgaged goods, would go to cure the vices of his mortgage, if it had any. Authorities to sustain this position may be abundantly found in the decisions of other States, and in the further stages of this case such inquiry may not be unprofitably pursued.

Without referring again to the various allegations of fraud in fact, so-called, these having been disposed of by concurrence *in the master's findings, it only remains to consider that which is claimed to be the especially vulnerable part of Israel's mortgage, and this the plaintiffs allege is to be found in the effort on Israel's part to subject the accretions of merchandise acquired by Elias in the course of trade to the lien of the mortgage; and, on this account, it is urged that the mortgage is fraudulent upon its face. This is the only feature (save in date and amount) in which Israel's mortgage differs in form from that of the plaintiffs, and both, it appears, allowed Elias to retain possession of the goods after condition broken. I am not able to see anything more in this than what may or may not have been a vain effort on the part of Israel to increase his security and so provide against loss. The pleadings and proof in the case have not presented this matter in such manner as to make it a living issue in the case. If Elias' retention of the goods had been of such duration as to have enabled him to dispose of the stock actually mortgaged, and the accretions amounted to a substitution of another stock in its stead, and the proof had made this apparent, this vexed question would have required an answer; but I cannot attach to this provision of the mortgage the character and importance of a shibboleth, and condemn Israel to the loss of his debt either for pronouncing it or for not pronouncing it.

How far such accretions would be affected by the principle decided in the case of Moore v. Byrum, 10 S. C. 452 [30 Am. Rep. 58], or the late case of Parker & Co. v. Jacobs, 14 S. C. 112 [37 Am. Rep. 724], it is scarcely necessary to inquire; for, as I understand the case, the question of the lien of the mortgages upon accretions to the stock (there being no proof of such) does not arise here, the attempt to bind the accretions by Israel's mortgage having been urged only as evidence of fraud upon the face of the mortgage itself; and for this, in my judgment, it is not sufficient.

Therefore it is adjudged and decreed that the master's report herein, dismissing the plaintiffs' complaint, be and the same is hereby affirmed, that the defendant have judgment against the plaintiffs for their costs, and that the defendant Israel have leave to move the court for such orders, touching the funds in the sheriff's hands, arising from the sale of the mortgaged goods

*as he may be advised are necessary to accomplish the proper distribution of the same.

The points made by the exceptions are sufficiently stated in the opinion of this court.

Mr. J. P. Carroll, for appellant.

Messrs. Melton, Clark & Muller, contra.

October 31st, 1882. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McIVER. The main object of this action is to set aside, on the ground of fraud, a mortgage on a stock of goods, wares and merchandise, given by the defendant, Charles Elias, to his co-defendant, Morris Israel.

It is conceded that there are only two questions presented by this appeal, one of fact and the other of law. The first is whether the evidence was sufficient to show that the mortgage in question was executed with intent to hinder, delay and defeat the other creditors of the mortgagor; and secondly, whether the mortgage is not, as matter of law, fraudulent and void because it covers not only the stock of goods on hand at the date of the mortgage, but also "such goods, wares and merchandise as may from time to time hereafter be acquired in lieu and place thereof in the current business of the said mercantile establishment;" thereby plainly evincing an intention that the mortgagor should continue business by selling the goods in the usual course of trade, and replenishing the stock from time to time as occasion might require.

The first question is one of fact and it has been determined adversely to the appellants by the master, to whom all the issues in the action were referred, and his conclusion has been concurred in by the Circuit judge. Under these circumstances this court, according to the well settled rule, will not interfere unless the conclusion below is without any testimony to sustain it, or is manifestly against the weight of the evidence. It certainly cannot be said that there is no testimony to sus-tain the conclusion reached by the master and concurred in by the Circuit judge; and we think it quite clear that such conclusion is not manifestly against the weight of the evidence. On the contrary, it seems to us that there was but little, if any, evidence of any fraudulent intent on the part of the defendant Israel. If his testimony is to be credited, (and it is not impeached; but, on the contrary, is corroborated in a very material part by the testimony of Mr. Melton,) the transaction, so far, at least, as Israel was concerned, was a bona fide effort to secure a debt justly due him, and we are unable to discover any sufficient reason for imputing any fraudulent intent to him. We do not, however, propose to enter into a discussion of the testimony, as it is sufficient for us to say that the argument here, together with a careful examination of the testimony, has failed to show any error in the conclusion reached by the master and affirmed by the Circuit judge.

The next question, though much discussed elsewhere, with varying results, has never been determined in this State, so far as we are informed. We do not deem it necessary to go over the discussion, for the very full, satisfactory and conclusive argument of the Circuit judge leaves us nothing to add, and we are quite content to rest our conclusion upon the reasoning employed and the authorities adduced by the Circuit judge in his able and exhaustive decree.

It is alleged, however, that the Circuit judge has fallen into two errors of fact: one in stating that the mortgage to the plaintiffs allowed the mortgagor to retain possession of the mortgaged goods after condition broken; the other in stating that the mortgagor made no additions to his stock of goods after the execution of the mortgage to Israel: and these, perhaps, should be noticed.

Even conceding these allegations to be well founded, we are unable to perceive how this could affect the conclusion reached by the Circuit judge. His argument to show that the mortgage in question was not to be adjudged fraudulent, simply because it contained a provision authorizing the mortgagor to continue business, selling and replenishing his stock in the usual course of trade, does not rest upon either of these statements, which were *simply thrown in—one, perhaps, for the purpose of showing that the mortgage of plaintiffs was subject to the same objection as they were urging against the mortgage to Israel, and the other for the purpose of showing that the position which seemed to have been practically abandoned before the master, that the mortgage of Israel must be postponed to the mortgage of plaintiffs, so far as the goods acquired subsequent to the execution of Israel's mortgage were concerned, did not have the requisite basis of fact to rest upon. This, however, was an independent question, and one which could in no way affect the main question, as to whether a mortgage containing a provision like the one in controversy would thereby be rendered fraudulent per se.

We agree with the Circuit judge that the pleadings and evidence did not present this matter in such a way as to make it "a living issue in this case." In order to present the question fairly whether the lien of the mortgage to Israel should be postponed to that of the plaintiffs, so far as any additions to the stock of goods were concerned, it would not be sufficient to show that such additions were made after the date of the mortgage to Israel, but it would be necessary to go further, and show that such additional stock was in the store at the time of the execution of the mortgage to the plaintiffs, for their mortgage does not purport to cover any goods except such as were in the store at the time their mortgage was executed. Upon this point the testimony is silent. There was evidence that additions to the stock had been made after the execution of the mortgage to Israel, but when such additions were made, whether before or after the mortgage to the plaintiffs, does not appear; nor does it appear what portion, if any, of such additional stock was in the store at the date of the mortgage to the plaintiffs.

But waiving all this, it seems to us that under the doctrine established by the case of Parker v. Jacobs, 14 S. C. 112 [37 Am. Rep. 724], the lien of Israel's mortgage covered as well the subsequently acquired goods as those in the store at the time it was executed. His mortgage was not given to secure future advances, but an existing debt, and the lien took effect so soon as the goods were acquired by the mortgagor, and is not postponed to the lien of the junior mortgage, as might be the case if the advances were *made and the debt arose subsequently to the execution of the second mortgage, under the principles announced in Walker v. Arthur, 9 Rich. Eq. 401.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

October 21st, 1882. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. This was an indictment for murder, in which Isaac Putman was charged with shooting Giles Guess, and the other defendants, Lilly Putman and Silas

Putman, were present aiding and abetting therein. The indictment then concludes, "and the jurors aforesaid, upon their oaths aforesaid, do say, that the said Isaac Putman, the said Silas Putman and the said Lilly Putman, him, the said Giles Guess, in manner and form, and by the means aforesaid, feloniously, willfully and of their malice aforethought, did kill and murder," &c. The jury found a verdict "guilty of manslaughter, Silas Putman and Lilly Putman recommended to the mercy of the court."

The defendants, Silas Putman and Lilly Putman, moved in arrest of judgment and to set aside the verdict as to them, and failing, then for a new trial upon the following ground: "Because the jury having found a verdict of manslaughter as to Isaac Putman, who did the shooting, sudden heat and passion, the elements of manslaughter, could not be attributed to Lilly and Silas. Therefore the jury erred in finding them guilty in the same degree as Isaac." The judge refused all the motions, and Silas and Lilly appealed to this court upon the ground that his Honor erred in not arresting the judgment.

This was an indictment for murder against three persons, alleging that one of them did the act, and that the other two were present aiding and abetting therein. It did not charge one as principal and the others as accessories before the fact, but all as principals; as it is sometimes expressed, one in the first and the others in the second degree. There can be no doubt that with reference to the crime of murder the indictment was correctly framed and in exact accordance with established forms. State v. Rabon, 4 Rich. 264.

In that case three persons were indicted for murder. The indictment alleged that the fatal wound was given by Abram Rabon, the younger, and that Abram Rabon, the elder, and Duke Rabon were present aiding and abetting in the felony. All the defendants were found guilty, and in delivering the judgment of the appeal court, Judge Evans said: "The defendants might have been charged as principals in the first degree. In Arch. C. P. 396, it is said that the pleader may charge the principal in the second degree as a principal in the first degree (for proof that he was present aiding and abetting will, in such case, maintain an indictment charging him with having actually committed the *offense), or, at his option, as being present aiding and abetting. The better mode, however, is to describe the part which each had in the crime, according to the proof of the facts as is the universal practice, and as has been done in this case. When this mode of pleading is adopted the indictment consists of three parts: 1. That Abram Rabon, the younger, feloniously, willfully and of his malice aforethought, gave the mortal wound. 2. That the other persons were feloniously present aiding and abetting and assisting in the commission of the murder; and 3. The conclusion which the law draws from the parts stated, that all of them are guilty of the murder." The indictment in this case was drawn in accordance with the form here recommended, and if the defendants had all been found guilty of murder, there could have been no question about the sufficiency of the indictment to support the finding.

But conceding that the indictment is according to the most approved form in reference to the crime of murder charged, it is suggested that, the jury having found that no murder was committed—only manslaughter—the condition of things is entirely changed, and the indictment must be read as if it charged only the crime of manslaughter, and that with reference to that crime, which is in its nature sudden and unpremeditated, there cannot be a principal in the second degree, and therefore the allegation in the indictment as to the parties aiding and abetting, should be ignored or stricken out as inappropriate, and the judgment arrested as to Silas and Lilly. This is plausible, but it seems to rest on the view that the charge of being present, aiding and abetting, is equivalent to that of being accessory before the fact.

It is conceded that there can be no accessories before the fact in manslaughter, but the authorities do not sustain the view that being present, aiding and abetting, is identical with an accessory before the fact, which consists in counseling, advising or procuring the act to be done, and may be a great while before. The charge of being present, aiding and abetting, is but one of the forms of charging the parties as principals. "The distinction of principal in the first and second degree was a mere distinction in fact, and is no longer recognized." State v. Fley and

Rochelle, *2 Brev. 338 [4 Am. Dec. 583]; State v. Posey, 4 Strob. 138, and in a note, State v. Green [4 Strob. 128]. In the case of Fley and Rochelle, Judge Brevard said: "All persons present, aiding and abetting a murder, are regarded as principals, and equally guilty. The actual perpetrator is regarded as the agent or instrument by which the crime is perpetrated, not as the chief criminal or more guilty than his associates. It sometimes happens that he is comparatively less guilty than those who stimulate or persuade him to be their instrument. The distinction between principals in the first and second degree has been long since exploded; it is now considered a distinction without a difference."

Upon an indictment for murder the jury may find a verdict for manslaughter. Indeed, this is so well established that an indictment for manslaughter, as such, is rarely, if ever, given out. This being the universal practice, it would seem strange, if the view suggested is sound, that the question made here has never arisen before. The court has not been referred to any case upon the point, and in the short search which the press of business has enabled us to make we have not been able to find one. If a verdict for manslaughter can be rendered upon an indictment for murder against the perpetrator of the deed, why may not the same verdict be rendered against those who are charged as principals in aiding and abetting the crime. This must be allowable, unless the character of the crime of manslaughter is such as necessarily to exclude the possibility of participation or co-operation on the part of others present at the act.

It is true that the characteristic element of the crime of manslaughter is that, although a homicide, it is committed in sudden heat and passion and without malice aforethought. It is defined to be "the unlawful killing of a human being upon sudden heat and passion arising from reasonable provocation." But, as we understand it, this does not necessarily limit the offense to the persons who actually did the deed when several were present and engaged in a common quarrel. The provocation given may extend to others as well as to the principal actor. Although the crime is said to be "sudden and unpremeditated," it need not be on the instant the provocation is received. In its regard for the weakness of human nature the law allows a certain time—reasonable time—for the transport of passion to continue before "cooling," and during that time it does not seem to us impossible for others present, affected by the same provocation and passion, to stimulate and incite the principal actor to the perpetration of the deed.

The particular facts of this case are not before us. None of the circumstances of the killing are in the brief. All we know is from the allegations of the indictment that Isaac was charged with doing the act, that Lilly and Silas aided and abetted therein, and that all were found guilty of manslaughter. The jury found that Silas and Lilly co-operated with Isaac in committing the homicide, and we cannot say that such finding was so impossible or unauthorized as to justify us in arresting the judgment as to them.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

Before Kershaw, J., Abbeville, February, 1881.

Action by Amanda B. Carter against J. F. C. DuPre, commenced December 29th, 1879.

*180

The opinion fully states the case, *but it may properly be added that the cotton made on the leased premises, according to the testimony, was eight bales, exclusive of the seed cotton seized by the sheriff; and that the brief does not show that the presiding judge was ever requested to charge the propositions stated in the second, third, fourth and fifth exceptions.

Messrs. Burt & Graydon, for appellant.

Messrs. Noble & Noble, contra.

October 21st, 1882. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. This action was brought by Amanda B. Carter against the defendant, sheriff of Abbeville county, for seizing 2,320 pounds of cotton in the seed, claimed to be her property. It seems that the plaintiff is the wife of Samuel E. Carter and the mother of Charles P. Carter, who lived in the house with his parents; that she claimed title to the land on which the cotton was made, and that she had rented it verbally to her husband, Samuel E. Carter, for the year 1879, for two bales of cotton.

On February 9th, 1879, Samuel E. Carter and his wife, the plaintiff, executed to John Knox an agricultural lien for guanos, provisions and other supplies to the amount of $150, and at the foot of the paper Mrs. Carter stipulated as follows: "I hereby agree that John Knox shall collect the above lien before I demand my rent." On March 6th, 1879, Samuel E. Carter and Charles P. Carter executed to George W. Williams & Co. an agricultural lien for $123.50, to be paid in cotton made on the place, for fertilizers. Under this junior lien George W. Williams & Co. issued an agricultural warrant, and had the cotton in question seized by the sheriff, and the plaintiff, alleging that the cotton had been delivered to her in payment of her lien for rent as landlord, brought this action for the cotton.

The real defendants are George W. Williams & Co., though the sheriff answered and put in a general denial. They denied that the plaintiff had rented the lands to her husband, or that she had any title to the cotton; but if so, they insisted that she was estopped from claiming it, for the reason that she had allowed *Knox to be paid first out of the cotton made on the place, and having done so it was inequitable in her to claim the little balance for her rent to the exclusion of their lien. The case came on to be heard before Judge Kershaw, who charged the jury: "That there must be a contract of renting, either written or verbal, between the landlord and tenant, before the landlord can have a lien for rent; that the plaintiff was not estopped from claiming the cotton in suit as rent by signing the lien to John Knox; that if Samuel E. Carter had delivered the cotton in suit to the plaintiff in payment of rent due, the jury must find a verdict for her, and that if so, the measure of damages was the highest value of the cotton sold at any time between the seizure and the trial, with interest from the date of seizure."

The jury found, for the plaintiff, the sum of $102.05, and the defendants appeal to this court upon the following grounds:

1. "Because the presiding judge erred in refusing to charge that there must be a contract, either written or verbal, between the landlord and tenant, for a lien upon the crop of the tenant, before the landlord can have a lien for rent such as will displace the rights of other lien creditors.

2. "Because the presiding judge erred in refusing to charge that the plaintiff was estopped from claiming the cotton in suit as rent by signing the lien of her husband, her alleged tenant, to John Knox for supplies.

3. "Because the judge erred in refusing to charge that the plaintiff was estopped from claiming the cotton in suit as rent by paying out of the crop the account of her husband and son with said John Knox, although in said accounts there were charges for whiskey and tobacco and other articles not agricultural supplies, and although her son had even given said John Knox a lien for supplies.

4. "Because the judge erred in refusing to charge that the plaintiff was estopped, or might be estopped, from claiming the cotton in suit as rent by allowing her husband and her son to sell cotton on the place, receive the money and use it, if they found as matter of fact that she allowed them to do so.

5. "Because the judge erred in refusing to charge that the plaintiff was estopped from claiming the cotton in suit as rent *by paying out of the crop the account of her husband and son with the said John Knox, contracted after the crop had been made and 'laid by,' and some of it after the crop had been gathered.

6. "Because the judge erred in charging the jury that if Samuel E. Carter had delivered to the plaintiff the cotton in suit, they must find a verdict for her, although, according to her own testimony, half the cotton was in the field at the time the levy was made, and although the defendant had made a levy under a valid lien, which was not disputed.

7. "Because the judge erred in charging that the measure of damages was the highest value of the cotton sold at any time between the seizure and the trial, although the defendant had in good faith paid for the picking and ginning, and expended money in good faith for the bagging and ties which went to make up the proceeds of sale, and although the plaintiff consented to the ginning and selling."

Much evidence upon questions of fact is printed in the brief, but this being a law case tried by a jury, this court has no right to consider the proper force and effect of that evidence. We are limited to the inquiry whether there was error of law in the charge of the judge.

As to the first exception there seems to be some misapprehension. The judge did charge "that there must be a contract of renting, either written or verbal, between the landlord and tenant before the landlord can have a lien for rent." But if it is meant that the judge should have charged that there must be an express contract also for a lien to secure it, we agree with the judge that no such contract was necessary. As between landlord and tenant the contract for rent once established, proprio vigore, gives the lien by force of the statute, which declares, "that each landlord leasing lands for agricultural purposes, shall have a prior and preferred lien for rent to the extent of one-third of all crops raised on his lands and enforceable in the same manner as liens for advances, which said lien shall be valid without recording or filing. 16 Stat. 411; Kennedy v. Reames, 15 S. C. 550.

Exceptions 2, 3, 4 and 5, upon the subject of estoppel, will be considered together. It is claimed that as against George W. *Williams & Co., the plaintiff should be estopped from claiming this cotton as her rent, for the reason that she allowed Knox to be first paid, and in other ways allowed the crops subject to the liens to be disposed of and reduced to the remnant in controversy, which is not enough for both. We cannot say that the judge erred in refusing so to charge. This is not a case for the application of the principle of estoppel. As we understand it, the doctrine of estoppel by conduct "is where one party has been induced by the conduct of the other to do or forbear doing something which he would not or would have done but for such conduct of the other party. The conduct which is claimed to operate as an estoppel must have induced action the disavowal of which would be inequitable." Bull v. Rowe, 13 S. C. 370.

Let us apply this rule. What action of George W. Williams & Co. was induced by the conduct of Mrs. Carter in waiving her claim for rent so far as Knox was concerned? She did not sign the lien of the defendants, and had no relation to them which placed her under obligations to husband the crop for their benefit. She had a lien for rent, which she had a right to waive in favor of Knox, and not in favor of George W. Williams & Co. Besides, as the lien of the defendants was junior to the other liens, and, as we suppose, was last registered, it may be that they had notice of the agreement of Mrs. Carter to give way to Knox; but, however that may be, both the liens of the plaintiff and Knox were superior to that of the defendants, and we cannot see that they were induced to take any step by the conduct of the plaintiff, which is complained of.

The jury were instructed that if the cotton had been delivered by Samuel E. Carter to the plaintiff in payment of rent due her, then she was entitled to recover; but he left it to the jury to say whether the cotton had been so delivered. In the view that it had been so delivered to her, it was a trespass to take it even under legal process, and she was not only entitled to recover, but to recover such damages as were recoverable in an action of trespass or trover. "In trover, the jury is not limited to find the mere value of the property at the time of conversion, but may find, as damages, the value at a subsequent time at their discretion." 3 Steph. N. P. 2711.

The jury may give the *highest value up to the time of trial. Kid v. Mitchell, 1 N. & McC. 334 [9 Am. Dec. 702]. In Burney v.

Pledger, 3 Rich. 191, Judge O'Neill says: "That the plaintiff is entitled to recover for the value of the property, at the time of the trial, with interest, or for the value of the property at the time of the trial, with hire from the conversion, as may be most beneficial." And in Rogers v. Randall, 2 Speers, 38, it was held that the jury have a discretion between the highest and lowest estimates. Harley v. Platts, 6 Rich. 318.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

[This case is also cited in Early v. Early, 75 S. C. 18, 54 S. E. 827, as to trusts under assignment.]

Before Hudson, J., Aiken, March, 1882.

This was an action by William S. Howard, Sr., against J. R. Henderson and J. F. Henderson, commenced in September, 1881, to recover the rents of the tract of land described in the deed, which is stated in the opinion of this court. J. R. Henderson died pending action, and his administrator answered, *raising no issue of title. J. F. Henderson claimed to be the lessee of W. S. Howard, Jr., and, therefore, that he owed no rent to the plaintiff. The main issue in the case was whether the legal title was in W. S. Howard, Sr., or in W. S. Howard, Jr. Upon that point, his Honor charged the jury as follows:

The plaintiff contends that it is a deed of such purport as to confer upon the cestui que use, W. S. Howard, Sr., a legal estate for life, and not an equitable estate, i. e., that the use is executed by the statute in such case made and provided. The defendant, Henderson, on the contrary, insists that the legal estate vested thereby in the trustee, W. S. Howard, Jr., still abides in him, and for the purposes of the trusts or uses must continue to so abide in him. Therefore he insists that W. S. Howard, Jr., rightfully leased the premises to him for the year 1881, and that to him as his landlord he is alone responsible for rents.

I concur in the construction of the deed contended for by the defendant, J. F. Henderson. The consideration of the deed is chiefly the love and affection of the grantor for the wife and children of his son, W. S. Howard, Jr., and their welfare is the leading object of the deed. The courts have generally held that the statute does not execute a use for the benefit of a married woman, nor in a case where the preservation of contingent remainders is necessary, nor where future duties are devolved upon the trustees. Nearly all these features appear upon the face of this deed, and to execute the use so as to confer a legal estate on W. S. Howard, Sr., for life would evidently be dangerous to, if not destructive of, the estates in remainder, the leading one of which is for a married woman for life.

I hold, therefore, that the legal estate in this land is, under this deed, in the trustee, and in the beneficiaries only an equitable estate, until in the contingent remaindermen the entire estate in fee with the rights of possession shall fully vest.

It is the duty, however, of the trustee to suffer the life-tenant to occupy, use and enjoy the premises during his life, so long as the same can be done consistently with the welfare of the life-tenant, and the preservation of the property for the remaindermen, and this use and enjoyment would be secured to the life-tenant by a court of equity, if necessary. Furthermore, *should the life-tenant remove from the premises or abandon the same, and the trustee, from these or any other good causes, sees fit to lease the premises, he would be bound to account to the life-tenant for full, fair and reasonable rents and profits; and to enforce such accounting, the court of equity is always open to the cestui que use. In the event, however, that the trustee should, for good cause appearing to him, lease the premises to any one whilst the same are not occupied by the cestui que use, then the cestui que use can bring no action at law against such a tenant of the trustee for rent nor for use and occupation, because there is no contract betwixt them, either express or implied. The trustee alone has the right of action upon the lease, and the remedy of the cestui que trust is against the trustee, and in an equitable action. To such an action, he might, if needs be, make the tenant a party.

The exceptions, so far as they relate to matters considered by this court, raise, in several forms, the one question: Whether the legal title under this deed was in W. S. Howard, Sr., or in W. S. Howard, Jr.

October 25th, 1882. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. This action was brought by the plaintiff, appellant, to recover the rent for the year 1881 of a certain tract of land in Aiken county, of which the appellant claimed to be the legal owner. The defendants, respondents, denied the title of the appellant, and alleged that W. S. Howard, Jr., as trustee of appellant, was the legal owner of the land, and that the rent was due to him instead of to the appellant. Although several other questions were raised in the progress of the case, yet the question of title was the main question, and the solution of this question depended upon the construction of a deed, introduced in evidence by the defendants, of which the following is a copy:

"This indenture, made the 28th day of October, in the year of our Lord eighteen hundred and seventy-three, between William S. Howard, Sr., of the county of Aiken, and State of South Carolina, of the first part, and William S. Howard, Jr., of the county and State aforesaid, as trustee, as hereinafter set forth, of the second part, witnesseth, that the said party of the first part, for and in consideration of the love and affection he has for Mrs. Georgia V. Howard, wife of the said Wm. S. Howard, Jr., and her children, as well as in consideration of the sum of ten dollars to him in hand well and truly paid by the said party of the secand part, at and before the sealing and delivery of these presents, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, has granted, bargained, sold, released, conveyed and confirmed, and by these presents does grant, bargain, sell, release, convey and confirm unto the said party of the second part, his successors and assigns, all that lot of land lying in said Aiken county, bounded * * * containing two hundred and fifty acres, more or less, and being the homestead or residence of W. S. Howard, Sr., in trust, nevertheless, for the use, benefit and behoof of the said William S. Howard, Sr., during the term of his natural life, with remainder at his death to the said Georgia V. Howard, during the term of her natural life, and upon her death to such child or children of the said William S. Howard, Jr., and the said Georgia V. Howard, as may be living. Together with all and singular, the rights, easements, ways, members and appurtenances to the said lot of land being, belonging, or in any wise appertaining, and the remainders, reversions, rents, issues and profits thereof, and every part thereof. To have and to hold the said lot of land, and all and singular the premises and appurtenances thereunto belonging as aforesaid, and every part thereof unto the party of the second part, his successor in trust, and assigns forever, for the uses and upon the trusts hereinbefore mentioned," concluding with the usual warranty.

The defendants relied upon this deed as conveying the legal title to the land in question to the trustee, W. S. Howard, Jr., *and, inasmuch as the defendant, J. F. Henderson, had rented the said land for the year 1881 from W. S. Howard, Jr., as trustee, by written lease, which was introduced in evidence, they claimed that the action of the plaintiff could not be sustained. On the other hand, the plaintiff also relied upon this deed, contending that the use provided for in the deed had been executed by the statute, and a legal estate for life had thereby been conferred upon W. S. Howard, Sr., the plaintiff, and that he was, therefore, entitled to his action. The presiding judge concurred in the construction contended for by the defendants, and charged the jury to that effect. Under this charge the jury found for the defendants.

The leading question in the case, as has already been stated, arises upon the construction of the deed of appellant, W. S. Howard, Sr., to his son, W. S. Howard, Jr., above referred to. We think, upon the authority of the cases hereinafter cited, that the judge was in error in his construction of this deed. In our opinion, the statute 27 Henry VIII., executed the use and transmitted a legal estate for life to the appellant, W. S. Howard, Sr., in the land in question. McNish v. Guerard, 4 Strob. Eq. 66; Ramsay v. Marsh,

2 McC. 252 [13 Am. Dec. 717]; Bouknight v. Epting, 11 S. C. 76.

In McNish v. Guerard, supra, the conveyance was to John McNish "to have and to hold in trust for the aforesaid children [naming them], and such other children as may be born of the body of Ann McNish, and to be divided among them equally, * * * and until such division, to be occupied and used entirely and especially for the maintenance and support of the aforesaid children." The court, after a careful review of the authorities and the principles applicable to such cases (Chancellor Johnston delivering the opinion), determined that the legal estate in the land, by virtue of the statute of uses, vested, not in John McNish, the trustee, but in the existing children named in the deed, subject to open and admit such other children as Mrs. McNish might have.

In the case of Ramsay v. Marsh, supra, Col. Laurens by his will devised to Dr. Ramsay and wife all his lands at Long Cane, &c., to hold the same to them and their heirs in trust to and for *the use and behalf of his granddaughter, Francis E. Laurens, during her life, and in case she should have a child or children, or grandchild or children, living at her death, then he devised the same to such child and to their heirs forever. The court held that the legal estate vested by the statute of uses in the cestui que use.

In the case of Bouknight v. Epting, supra, the terms of the deed were, * * * "In consideration of the sum of $800 to me paid by John Chapman, * * * have granted, bargained, sold and released unto the said John Chapman, for his daughter Elizabeth, wife of George Epting, a certain tract of land, containing, &c., to have and to hold all and singular the premises before mentioned unto the said Elizabeth Epting, wife of George Epting, daughter of the above named John Chapman, her heirs and assigns forever." The court held (Mr. Justice McIver delivering the opinion), that the statute executed the use and that the legal title passed to Mrs. Epting.

The general rule is, as extracted from these and numerous other cases cited and discussed therein, in the language of Mr. Justice McIver: "That where land is conveyed to one for the use of another, or in trust for the use of another, and the person to whom the conveyance is made (the trustee), has no duties to perform, or where there is nothing for him to do requiring that the legal estate shall remain in him in order to enable him to do what is required, there the statute executes the use and the legal estate passes to the person for whose use the grant or conveyance was made." Bouknight v. Epting, supra, 75. Or, as was said in Jenney v. Laurens, 1 Speers 356, "a use will be executed unless the purpose of creating it would be defeated by the execution, as in cases of trusts for married women, or to preserve contingent remainders, or where the trustee has some discretion to be exercised in relation to the estate or the manner of applying the proceeds."

The usual test applied is the latter branch of the above rule, to wit, whether the trustee has been invested with discretion to be exercised in relation to the estate, or the manner of applying the proceeds. If he is directed to receive and pay over rents and proceeds to the cestui que trust, then the legal estate remains *with him so as to enable him to perform this duty. If, however, under the deed, the cestui que trust can act for himself in this matter, there being no necessity for a trustee, the use is at once executed, such being presumed to be the intention of the parties.

Now if the deed before the court is tested by this portion of the rule, there can be no reasonable doubt as to its construction. No direction whatever is given to the trustee as to the rents and profits of the land. He is not required either expressly or impliedly to collect and pay them over. He is not charged with any duty whatever in reference thereto. In fact, the implication derived from the circumstance that the land conveyed was the homestead and residence of the grantor, W. S. Howard, Sr., is that he was still to remain in possession during his life, enjoying the rents and profits as formerly.

The Circuit judge, however, bases his ruling upon the idea that the trust created were in part at least for a married woman, Mrs. Georgia V. Howard, and also that contingent remainders were created for such of her children as might survive her, for the preservation of which a trustee, invested with the legal title, was necessary. In order to prevent the statute from executing the use in such cases, it must appear, first, as to a married woman, that the estate conveyed was a separate estate intended for her sole use and benefit free from the debts and all control of her husband, and, secondly, as to preservation of contingent remainders, the terms of the deed must show that such was the purpose of interposing a trustee.

In the case of Bouknight v. Epting, supra, the deed was for the benefit of a married woman, and yet the court held the trust executed, there being nothing in the terms of the deed indicating a purpose to create a separate estate in Mrs. Epting. This was distinctly held necessary in that case to prevent the operation of the statute. Mr. Justice McIver, in discussing that question, says with great force: "It cannot be claimed that it was necessary in order to preserve the separate estate of the wife, for, as we shall presently see, no such estate is provided for in the deed, so that there is nothing in the fact that the conveyance is nominally made to a third person for the use of the wife." Chancellor *Dunkin, in Wilson v. Bailer, 3 Strob. Eq. 260 [51 Am. Dec. 678], in considering the same question, said: "The absolute terms in which the property is given to the wife, or the amplitude of her enjoyment, has never been deemed sufficient to create a separate interest in derogation of the common law right." He proceeds, further, to say: "The implication is, however, necessary when the estate is declared to be for the sole and separate use of the wife, although the words independently of her husband, or without the control of her husband, are not superadded."

Now there are no words in the deed under consideration which could possibly be construed as indicating a purpose to create a separate estate in Mrs. Howard. A life estate is first conveyed for the "use, benefit and behoof" of William S. Howard, Sr., with remainder at his death to the said Mrs. Howard, during her natural life, not even for the sole use and benefit of Mrs. Howard, but simply with remainder to her. These terms fall far short of creating a separate estate, and, under the ruling of Bouknight v. Epting, would have presented no obstacle to the operation of the statute of uses, even before the adoption of the constitution of 1868, with the provision therein in reference to the estates of married women.

The deed under consideration, however, was made in 1873, long after the adoption of the constitution of 1868. Section 8, Article XIV., of that instrument makes all property acquired by a married woman, after her marriage, a separate property. So that this deed could not have been intended primarily to create an estate of that sort. The constitution had this effect without any express intention to that end in the terms of the deed itself. The deed then must have been used simply as a mode of conveyance by which the legal title was vested in Mrs. Howard through the operation of the statute, protected and shielded to her by the constitution, although possessed of the legal title.

But the question at last, in this case, is not as to the character of the estate of Mrs. Howard, but that of W. S. Howard, Sr., the plaintiff. Where estates are conveyed to different parties in the same instrument, the statute may execute one and not the other. In the case of Williman v. Holmes, 4 Rich.

Eq. 476, an *estate was granted in trust "for the sole use, behoof and benefit" of a married woman, Mrs. Davidson, for and during the term of her natural life, with remainder after her death. The court held that this was a separate estate for life in Mrs. Davidson, which the statute on that account did not execute; but that the remainder was executed, and although the fee was conveyed in terms to the trustees, the apt words to that end, to wit, to "their heirs and assigns forever" being used, yet the estate in the trustees was cut down to an estate per autre vie under the principle that the law will not permit the trustees to take a larger legal estate than is necessary to the performance of the executory trusts conferred upon them, it being an established rule, as was said by the court, "that trustees shall hold legal estates commensurate only with the necessities of the trusts. If the estate given to them is deficient, it will be enlarged by implication; if in excess, it will be cut down by the operation of the statute of uses, and such excess will pass to those in remainder."

So that whatever may be the proper construction of this deed in reference to the application of the statute of uses on the estates of Mrs. Howard and the children in remainder, there is no reason why it should not execute the estate of W. S. Howard, Sr., the plaintiff, vesting in him a legal estate for life, the fee possibly remaining in the trustee for the benefit of the married woman, and for the preservation of the contingent remainders to the children.

It does not follow, however, that because the remainders to the children are contingent remainders, the statute of uses could not apply. In the case of Faber v. Police, 10 S. C. 385, this very question was discussed, and the conclusion reached, sustained by a well-considered opinion and abundant authority, that notwithstanding the contingency of the remainders, yet the estate was executed in the life-tenant. That case was very similar to this, except that there was no married woman involved. It was a devise in trust for the use of A. during his life with contingent remainders over. The court held that under the statute of uses the legal estate vested in A.; that although the remainders provided for were evidently contingent, yet there being nothing in the terms of the will showing that

*the trust created to preserve these contingent remainders, such a trust could not be implied. In answer to the argument, that such an implication should arise on account of the contingency of the remainders, Mr. Justice McIver, who delivered the opinion of the court, said: "We know of no authority for such a position, and none have been cited. We are at a loss to conceive by what right a court could undertake to add to the words of a will, by which additional trusts to those which the testator has seen fit to declare, should be raised."

In our opinion, the use to W. S. Howard, Sr., was executed by the statute, through the operation of which he became the legal owner of the land in question for life. It will not be necessary to discuss the other questions raised in the appeal, as they all, more or less, hinge upon the matter herein above.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed, and that the case be remanded.

*This was an action in the Court of Probate to require Uriel X. Gunter, sole qualified executor of the will of Daniel B. Gunter, to carry out its provisions. The will was as follows:

In the name of God, amen! I, Daniel B. Gunter, being of sound mind, and knowing the uncertainty of life, and the certainty of death, do make, declare and publish, this, my last will and testament, that as soon after my death as is convenient, that my funeral and burial expenses be paid. I then give and bequeathe unto my beloved wife, Amanda C. Gunter, and my two children, use of my home place on which I now live, to cultivate only, also all my farming tools, gears, hoes, axes, wagons, carts, stock of provisions now made and on hand, my mule, oxens, cows, hogs, household and kitchen, furniture, and one hundred dollars in money.

The above mentioned articles and property, I give to my wife as before mentioned on the following conditions, that is: she is to have it so long as she remains a widow and does not marry; but if she marries any one then she forfeits her claim to all I give her. I direct that my executors on her marrying, sell the property given her, and place it to the benefit of my two children above mentioned. The above property to be appraised by three persons, so that my executors may know the amount given her. The balance of my property, excluding my monies, notes, accounts on books, and otherwise, cotton, goods, and all kinds of merchandise, in store, and all that I may leave, from any source including my mothers and brothers estates, and all lands excepting my home place above mentioned, I direct my executors to convert into money, and place in bank or safe hands, as they may think best, the interests to be applied for the education and maintenance of my two children above named, and if my executors think or is satisfied that the above interest and what I have given my wife is not sufficient for education, clothing, and other needs, they are to draw on the principal sufficient for the above requirements. My two children to share and share alike, and in case one should die, before becoming of age, or has any lawful children, then the other to heir the deceased one's share, and in case of the death of both, before becoming of age, or having any lawful children, in that case I direct that all my property, both personal and real, shall go to my two brothers Ucal and U. X. Gunter, and their heirs to share and share alike. Now that this my last will and testament, may be understood, I again repeat, that I have given to my wife, household and kitchen furniture, plantation tools, mule, oxen, cows, hogs, carts, provisions, and one hundred dollars in money, as above mentioned, during her *widowhood, but if she marries she forfeits her claim to it, and to be disposed as I have directed. The remainder of property both real and personal including all monies, notes, accounts, cotton on hand, goods and merchandise in store, or on hand, and all that may come to me from heirship, rents or any wise, to be converted into money, by my executors, and put in bank or safe hands, for the use of my two children as they may think best, and in case of the death of my two children, as above mentioned, then my two brothers and their heirs to have all my property, both personal and real.

*195

And I do hereby appoint my beloved brother Uriel X. Gunter and my relatives and friends, Seaborn Jones, John E. Jones and W. A. Lybrand, executors to this my last Will and testament.

Given under my hand and seal this 22d day of January, in the year of our Lord, one thousand eight hundred and seventy-three.

The case is otherwise fully stated in the opinion of this court.

Messrs. Croft & Dunlap, for appellant.
Messrs. Henderson Bros., contra.

October 25th, 1882. The opinion of the court was delivered by Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. Daniel B. Gunter, late of Aiken county, died in 1873, leaving a will. [Here follows a statement of the will.] At the death of the testator, his two children were infants of tender years, being, respectively, at the time of the filing of the petition below, nine and twelve years of age. Shortly after the death of the testator, his widow, Mrs. Gunter, seems to have been placed in possession of the home place, and the personal property bequeathed to her, the executors offering to her, from time to time, some little assistance in money for the maintenance of the children.

Things remained in this condition until 1881, some eight years after the death of the testator, when Mrs. Gunter, in her *own right, and as guardian ad litem of her two children, filed a petition in the Probate Court for Aiken county, complaining that the executor had not complied with the will in several particulars, and especially that he had failed to contribute to the education and support of the children out of the interest of the funds, directed to be put at interest for their benefit, and praying that the said executor might be required to account, and that she should have such relief as justice and equity demanded. The case was heard by the Probate judge, and after full investigation it was developed that the only matters of real contest were, whether the executor should be required to pay to Mrs. Gunter any sum for deficiency in the support, maintenance and education of the children for the eight years preceding the petition, and whether anything should be allowed in the future until the further order of the court, and if so, how much, in each case, per annum.

The Probate judge, upon the testimony, decreed that the executor should pay to the petitioner the sum of $180 for the support of the children for the six years next after the death of the testator, $140 for their support and education for the two succeeding years, and that in the future he should pay, annually, the sum of $75, until the further order of the court, making the amount due the petitioner for past support and education, $320, which, added to $295.80, about which there was no dispute, amounted to $615.80. From this decree the defendant appealed to the Circuit Court, alleging error in the findings of the Probate judge as to the amounts allowed the petitioner, and claiming as matter of law that it was in the discretion of the executor to make such allowances as he deemed to the interest of the children, having due regard to their estate. The Circuit Court affirmed the judgment of the Probate Court in all respects, and dismissed the appeal, with costs. From this judgment of the Circuit Court, the case now comes before this court on appeal.

Two questions are presented for our consideration, first, whether the amount decreed to the petitioner for the past and future support and education of the children, is more than the evidence justified; and, second, whether the discretion of the executor, as to this matter, was subject to the control of the *court. The first being a question of fact, found by the Probate judge in the first instance and concurred in by the Circuit judge, this court will not disturb it under the decisions, unless there is manifest error in the finding, or the preponderance of testimony is against it. In looking through the evidence we see no such error; on the contrary, we think the evidence was quite sufficient to support the decree in this respect.

As to the second question, if it appeared from a proper construction of the will that the testator intended to leave the application of the interest on the fund which he directed to be invested for the benefit of his two children, entirely to the discretion of the executor, then the courts would not undertake to control that discretion, unless there was a manifest and flagrant refusal to exercise it, and with the view to defeat the intent and purpose of the will. A testator who, during his lifetime, has accumulated property, has the legal right to dispose of it as he sees proper, and, when he has done so, it would be an unwarranted and arbitrary exercise of power for any court to undertake to change, alter or modify in the least, such disposition. The law authorizes the citizens to make wills, but not the courts.

The question, then, in this case is: Did the testator leave the application of the interest on the fund mentioned solely to the discretion of the executor, and are the rights of the children as to that application dependent upon his will alone? On reading the will it cannot escape attention, that the children of the testator were especially and almost exclusively the objects of his bounty. He seems to have been so solicitous about their welfare as almost to have forgotten his wife, their mother. He gave his wife nothing, except the household furniture, some little stock and $100 in money, and the right to cultivate for herself and the children the home place—all this to be forfeited to the children in the event of her second marriage. He then directs the balance of his property, both real and personal, to be converted into money, the interest to be applied to the education and maintenance of his two children, with the power on the part of the executors, if they thought best, or became satisfied that this was not enough, to encroach upon the capital.

This direction is in the second clause of the will. Under it, *if not subsequently modified, the children would have a right to appeal to the courts in case the executor neglected or declined to furnish aid to their annual support and education, and the matter would not depend upon the mere will of the executor, but upon the evidence as to the needs and wants of the children. The interest on the invested fund was to be theirs, as their wants and necessities might demand, and upon a proper showing that such necessity existed in each case, the courts could not hesitate to afford relief, because such would evidently be the intent of the testator, and the intent in all cases governs.

Was this portion of the will subsequently changed or modified so far as the rights of the children were concerned? Lower down in the will, the testator repeats his direction for the conversion of the remainder of his property into money, and that it be invested for the children, using this language, "that it be put in bank or safe hands, for the use of my two children as they may think best." Did the testator intend to apply the words "as they may think best" to the investment in the bank or safe hands, or to the use of the children? Standing alone and unaided by the previous bequest of this interest for the benefit of the children, this question would not be entirely free from doubt; perhaps the strict grammatical construction might require that the use of the children should be qualified by these words, "as they, the executors, may think best."

But in construing a will, all the parts must be considered, and effect given to each in harmony, if possible. Governed by this rule, and looking to the specific direction of the first portion, that the interest of the invested fund should be applied to the education and maintenance of the children, with direction to the executors to draw upon the principal, if that was not sufficient, we think it was the positive duty of the executors to apply the interest, and in case they declined, that the children had the right to apply to the courts, to enforce its performance, their right to relief being dependent upon the evidence submitted as to their wants and necessities. That course has been adopted in this case, and both the Probate Court and the Circuit Court having found, after full investigation, that the necessity existed to the amount decreed, this court will not disturb that judgment. *It appears that the amount decreed for past support will not encroach on the original capital, nor will the allowance for the future support.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

B. sold to C. in 1862 for confederate money, and applied it to the payment of his bonds and mortgage, which were marked satisfied. C. then mortgaged this land to H. Afterwards, in suit brought in the United States Court by the heirs of A. against B. and C., and the executors of A. (H. not being a party), the payment by B. in confederate money was held by the Supreme Court to be fraudulent and void, and foreclosure was decreed of the mortgage of B. to the executors of A., the rights of H. being expressly declared to be not affected. In subsequent action by H. for foreclosure of his mortgage, held, that the validity of B.'s mortgage was not res adjudicata as to H.

Before Pressley, J., Charleston, June, 1880.

This was an action by the executors and devisees of Edmund Hyatt, deceased, of the *200

State of New York, against William *McBurney, William Hasseltine, Alfred L. Gillespie and T. R. McGahan, members of the late firm of Hyatt, McBurney & Co., and Caroline Carson. The purpose of the action and the facts generally are stated in the opinion.

The petition for removal of the cause to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of South Carolina, was based upon the allegation that the plaintiffs were citizens of New York and Spain, and the petitioner, Mrs. Carson, a citizen of Massachusetts, and the other defendants of South Carolina, Tennessee and California. The petition was not verified, but was supported by the affidavit of her attorney, James Lowndes, duly sworn to before a notary public, of Washington, D. C., which was as follows:

Personally appeared before me, James Lowndes, and made oath that he is the attorney of Caroline Carson, and has read her petition for the removal of the said cause to the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of South Carolina, and that the facts therein stated are true, to the best of his information and belief, save that he cannot aver that Dean Hall is of greater value than $5,500; that his information as to the domicile of Hasseltine is drawn from a statement made to him by some person, whose name he cannot recall; that his information as to the domicile of Caroline Carson is drawn from these facts, viz., that about July 1st, 1877, he received in due course of mail a letter from the said Caroline Carson, dated at Brookline, Massachusetts, in which she informed the deponent that she had made a declaration or affidavit of her change of domicile from New York to Massachusetts; and that deponent continued to receive letters from her in the latter State during the month of July, 1877, and he knows her purpose to have been to become a citizen of Massachusetts; and he knows that she has not, in fact for many years, resided in New York.

Upon this petition, Judge Pressley signed the following order:

The plaintiffs in this case, except one, a Spanish subject, are citizens of the State of New York, and the controversy, as appears by the pleadings, is wholly between them and the defendant, Caroline Carson, who, in her answer, states that she is also a citizen of that State. She has also filed with her *answer an exhibit of a previous case in the United States Court relating to the same matter; in which case she was plaintiff, suing as a citizen of the State of New York. No motion has been made by her for leave to amend or withdraw her answer, nor has any affidavit or other testimony been submitted showing that her answer was erroneous and the matter therein in reference to her citizenship was inserted by inadvertence or mistake.

After this case had been referred to the master, and after the filing of her said answer by the said defendant, and the master, attended by the attorneys for plaintiffs and said defendant, had finished taking the testimony offered by the plaintiffs, the said defendant filed a petition in this court praying a removal of this case to the Circuit Court of the United States, and alleging that she is a citizen of the State of Massachusetts. That petition is not properly verified, and the insufficient affidavit by her attorney does not state any matter which would justify me in disregarding the positive statement in her answer and exhibit.

I, therefore, hold that the controversy in this case is between a citizen of the State of New York on the one side, and other citizens of the same State and a Spanish subject on the other side; and, further, that the petition of defendant for the removal of the case was not filed until after the trial had commenced. She is, therefore, not entitled to have the case removed from this court, and her motion to that effect is refused.

Upon the merits, Judge Pressley filed the following decree:

In this case plaintiffs seek to foreclose their mortgage on Dean Hall plantation, which secures a debt due them by McBurney & Co. Their co-defendant, Mrs. Carson, held an older mortgage on said plantation, which one of the executors to whom the mortgage was given, satisfied during the late war. That satisfaction was set aside as fraudulent and void by the Supreme Court of the United States, in a case to which McBurney & Co. were parties, but plaintiffs here were not parties to that case.

I find here, not a shadow of fraud, either in the circumstances attending the said satisfaction, or in the nature of the payment, and the very high character of all parties to that transaction, would rebut even strong proof of fraud, if such had been produced in the case. In the absence of all proof in that respect, I *follow the decisions of the Supreme Court of this State, and hold that plaintiffs have a valid mortgage on said plantation, discharged of the said older mortgage.

But the obligors of the bond which plaintiffs' mortgage secures, being parties to the decision of the United States Court, are bound by it. It is a final adjudication of their rights, which I am bound to respect. In doing so, I must give it full effect if that can be done without impairing the lien of the plaintiffs. They are not entitled to enforce payment of their bond out of property which the said decision gives to Mrs. Carson, if they can, without difficult or expensive litigation, enforce payment by the obligors, who are bound by the said decision. Were I to decree that, my profession of respect for that decision would be only a flimsy pretense.

It is, therefore, ordered that this case be recommitted to Master Clancy, to take testimony and report whether the plaintiffs can, without difficult or expensive litigation, procure payment from the obligors of said bond otherwise than by the foreclosure of their said mortgage.

The code, as construed by the Supreme Court of this State, requires that every case, without regard to the pleadings, be decided according to right. To that end leave must be granted to amend the pleadings, even after the hearing. If Mrs. Carson be advised that amendment of her answer be necessary, leave to amend it according to the claim set up by her at the hearing, is hereby granted.

An appeal taken by plaintiffs from this decree has been heretofore heard by this court, and will be found reported in 15 S. C. 393.

To this decree the defendant, Mrs. Carson, also excepted, but did not at that time prosecute her appeal. Her exception was as follows:

The defendant, Caroline Carson, excepts, for the purpose of an appeal to the Supreme Court, to so much of the decree of his Honor Judge Pressley as decides that the plaintiffs have a valid mortgage on the property mentioned in the pleadings, or any lien thereon, superior to the mortgage of Ball to the executors of Carson; which, in the case in the Supreme Court of the *United States, to which McBurney, the mortgagor, was a party, was adjudged a subsisting mortgage when McBurney became purchaser of the property, and prior to the date of the mortgage to the plaintiff's testator.

Upon the return of the cause to the Circuit Court, Judge Kershaw passed an order for foreclosure and sale, and defendant, Mrs. Carson, excepted and appealed upon the grounds stated in the opinion. A motion by plaintiffs to dismiss this appeal was refused. 17 S. C. 145.

Messrs. A. G. Magrath, H. E. Young, for appellant.

Messrs. McCrady & Sons, contra.

October 28th, 1882. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. The facts of this case, not controverted, are as follows: Edmund Hyatt, late a citizen of the State of New York, together with William McBurney, William Hasseltine, Alfred S. Gillespie and Thomas R. McGahan, in December, 1862, and for some time prior, were copartners, doing business under the name and style of Hyatt, McBurney & Co., in the city of Charleston. In December, 1862, this firm purchased from one Elias N. Ball a certain plantation, located in Charleston county, known as Dean Hall, for $100,000, which was paid in confederate treasury notes. This land had been purchased by Ball in 1857 from the executors of William A. Carson, deceased, partly for cash and partly on a credit, the credit portion being secured by a mortgage of the premises executed to said executors, and it was the understanding between McBurney & Co. and Ball, that he would extinguish this debt, and have the mortgage delivered up and canceled. This was done by Ball, with so much of the confederate money received by him from McBurney as was necessary. This transaction took place between Ball and one of the executors, Robertson, the other of the two who had qualified having, before that time, left the State.

In May, 1863, the copartnership of Hyatt, McBurney & Co., being about to expire, Hyatt sold his interest in the concern and

*204

*in the "Dean Hall" place to the other members of the firm, in consideration of $40,000, and withdrew, this sum being secured to the said Hyatt by the bond of the new firm, with a mortgage of the "Dean Hall place."

This place had formerly belonged to William A. Carson. Carson died in 1856, testate, leaving a widow, Mrs. Caroline Carson, and two minor sons, William and James Petigru Carson. In his will he appointed Alexander Robertson and John Freer Blacklock his executors, and, after making certain specific bequests, he directed his executors to sell the residue of his estate, the proceeds to be applied, first, to the payment of his debts, and then the balance to be divided into three equal parts, one-third to be held by them in trust for his wife, Caroline, during her life, and the other two-thirds for his sons, William and James Petigru, to be paid to them, absolutely, on their attaining their majority. Under this power of sale, with which the executors were invested, Alexander Robertson and John Freer Blacklock, after qualifying, proceeded to sell the estate, selling the "Dean Hall place" to Elias N. Ball for $50,000, the larger portion being on a credit, which was secured by mortgage of the premises, executed on March 2d, 1857.

After the late war between the States had ended, to wit, on August 11th, 1866, Mrs. Carson, who had become the owner of her sons' interests under the will of their father, and who was living in the State of New York, instituted in her own name proceedings in the Circuit Court of the United States for the District of South Carolina, to have the bonds of Ball surrendered by Robertson, the executor, declared valid and subsisting securities and the mortgage given to secure them a valid and subsisting lien on "Dean Hall" (notwithstanding it had been canceled), and praying a foreclosure thereof.

To this proceeding, all of the members of the late firm of Hyatt, McBurney & Co., were made parties, except Hyatt, who could not be impleaded, because he was a citizen of New York, of which State the plaintiff was also a citizen. The case was, however, heard as to the other parties, the Circuit Court sustaining the complaint of the plaintiff, and ordering the foreclosure, which decree, upon appeal, was ultimately affirmed by the *Supreme Court of the United States, at its October term, 1878. 99 U. S. 571 [25 L. Ed. 378]. The judgment of the court was based in part on the ground of fraud, in the transaction between McBurney & Co., Ball and Robertson expressed in the following strong terms, as found in the opinion: "There was evidently a plot; McBurney & Co. were its contrivers, Ball was its instrument, Robertson was their dupe, and the Carsons the victims." Under this decree, "Dean Hall" was sold by the marshal for the District of South Carolina, on November 26th, 1879, Mrs. Carson being the purchaser.

*205

In the meantime, to wit, on October 15th, 1879, the plaintiff, as executrix, executor, and heirs-at-law of Hyatt, then deceased, instituted the action below, for the foreclosure of the mortgage from McBurney and Gillespie to the said Hyatt, above referred to. To this action Mrs. Carson was made a party defendant, who, failing to answer within the required time, the case as to her was placed on Calendar 6, for judgment. She, however, afterwards appeared, and was granted on December 16th, 1879, further time to answer, she consenting to an order of reference. The answer was filed on January 31st, 1880, thereafter.

In this answer, Mrs. Carson, after stating the death of her husband, the fact that he left a will, the sale by his executors of the Dean Hall place to Ball, and several other unimportant facts, avers, that on and before June 4th, 1857, all the debts of the estate having been paid, the executors made distribution of the assets, and transferred to themselves, as trustees under the will, the Ball bonds and mortgage, to wit, to themselves, as trustees of herself, one bond of $9,000, and one-third interest in one bond of $4,000, and to themselves, as trustees of her two sons, the same amount for each in bonds, making, in the aggregate, $31,000 in bonds, and that they then took and held, as said trustees, the mortgage of Dean Hall, securing the said debt of $31,000. That the said mortgage was not satisfied until July 21st, A. D. 1866, when, she alleged that, Robertson alone, and at the instance of McBurney, executed a satisfaction on it. That at the time of the surrender of the Ball bonds by Robertson, they could have been exchanged in the market for more than double the amount in confederate treasury notes of their *face value; and, finally, she interposed the decree of the Supreme Court of the United States, and claimed that the plaintiffs were estopped by that decree from denying the validity of the said bonds and mortgage, held by Robertson, as trustee as aforesaid, or their priority to that of plaintiffs, and that this plaintiff could not enforce their mortgage without first redeeming the Ball mortgage.

The case, as has been stated, was referred to the master, who proceeded to hold the reference, when, after one or two sittings, Mrs. Carson, through her attorney, gave notice to the master, that he had that day filed a petition in the clerk's office, praying, among other things, the removal of the cause into the United States Court, and that he would not continue the reference before him. Whereupon the attorney of the plaintiffs moved that the master file his report of the testimony taken.

Under this state of things the case came on for hearing before Judge Pressley, who dismissed the petition for removal, holding that the defendant, under the circumstances, was not entitled to the motion, it appearing in the answer by her own statement that she was a citizen of the same State as the plaintiffs, the State of New York, and no affidavit being submitted that this statement was erroneous or inserted by mistake; and, further, that the petition came too late, it having been presented after the filing of her answer in the cause, and after the master, attended by the attorneys on both sides, had finished taking the testimony offered by the plaintiffs; and, moreover, that the petition was not properly verified, the affidavit of the attorney not being sufficient to justify him in disregarding the positive statement in the answer of Mrs. Carson as to her citizenship.

Judge Pressley then proceeded to hear the case on its merits, finally pronouncing a decree, in which he stated, "that he found not a shadow of fraud, either in the circumstances attending the satisfaction or in the nature of the payment, * * * and that, in the absence of all proof in that respect, he would follow the decisions of the Supreme Court of this State, and hold that plaintiff had a valid mortgage on said plantation, discharged of said older mortgage." Upon the findings in this decree, a judgment of foreclosure in favor of the plaintiffs was ultimately pronounced by the Circuit Court. And now from this judgment this appeal has come.

The appeal is urged upon four grounds: First, that the judgment of the Supreme Court of the United States, in McBurney v. Carson, 99 U. S. 571 [25 L. Ed. 378], is conclusive of the case, on the principle of res adjudicata; second, that the court below should have let go its jurisdiction upon the filing of the petition for removal by the defendant, and upon the facts therein stated; third, "that Judge Pressley erred in holding that he found not a shadow of fraud either in the circumstances attending the satisfaction of the mortgage or in the nature of the payments," and, fourth, that he erred "in holding that the plaintiffs had a valid mortgage on said plantation, discharged of the said older mortgage." These grounds we will consider in the order in which they are stated.

We have been somewhat surprised at the earnestness with which the appellant has pressed upon the court the first ground of appeal, in the face of the language of the decree which she invokes. How could the Supreme Court of the United States have expressed more distinctly its own opinion, that the rights of Hyatt were not being adjudicated in the cases of Carson v. Robertson [Fed. Cas. No. 2,466] and McBurney v. Carson, than in the following language found in the opinion: "If he (Hyatt) shall not be made a party and the complainant shall be successful, his rights will not be affected by the decree. In such case he can file a new and independent bill, and renew the litigation as to all the questions touching the prior mortgage which are involved in this controversy. The complainant has the option to make him a party, or to proceed without him, and take the hazard of the consequences." Robertson v. Carson, 19 Wall. 106 [22 L. Ed. 178]. Could language be stronger, or more direct to the point?

Again, the court said: "This court has held that Hyatt was not an indispensable party, as the decree would not affect his rights." McBurney v. Carson, 99 U. S. 569 [25 L. Ed. 378]. Mr. Justice Swayne, who delivered the opinion of the court in both of these cases, in support of the principles announced, refers to Haines v. Beach, 3 Johns. Ch. 459, where Chancellor Kent, speaks as follows: "The necessity of making the subsequent encum-*brancers parties, or holding their rights unimpaired, appears to be much stronger, and is indispensable to justice in cases of decrees for sale according to our practice, for otherwise the mortgagor would take the surplus money, or the cash value of the equity of redemption, and defeat entirely the lien of the subsequent creditor. But their rights cannot be destroyed in this way, and the purchaser will take only a title against the parties to the suit, and he cannot set it up against the subsisting equity of those encumbrancers who are not parties." The court seems to have anticipated that the question of res adjudicata might arise in future as to Hyatt, and to prevent its interposition, and to free it from all doubt, these strong expressions appear to have been used. See also Horn v. Lockhart, 17 Wall. 570 [21 L. Ed. 657].

It will not do to say that these expressions were obiter, because the very question in the case of Robertson v. Carson was, whether Hyatt was an indispensable party, which necessarily involved the further question as to the effect of the judgment of the court upon Hyatt's rights and interests. Instead, therefore, of the case of McBurney v. Carson being res adjudicata against Hyatt, and concluding him, it is rather res adjudicata for him—rather a judicial determination that he has not been concluded—and that all the questions, both of law and fact, involved in that case, though decided against the parties before the court, were especially left open for him.

But, independent of this, the authorities relied on by the appellant, failed to sustain her position. It is true, no one can doubt the propositions announced in appellants' argument, to wit, that "such effect as would belong to a judgment of the courts of this State, should be given to the judgments of the courts of the United States, rendered under similar circumstances." Dupasseur v. Rochereau, 21 Wall. 135 [22 L. Ed. 588]. "That judgments of the courts of the United States, when relied on in the State courts, have the same effect as judgments of the other States." Story Conf. L., Sec. 609. That "Circuit and District Courts of the United States, certainly cannot be considered as foreign in any sense of the term, either in respect to the State courts in which they are, or as respects the Circuit or District Courts of another circuit or district. On the contrary, they are *domestic tribunals, whose proceedings all other courts of the country are bound to respect." [Turnbull v. Payson] 95 U. S. 423 [24 L. Ed. 437]. "That full faith and credit shall be given in each State to the public acts, records and judicial proceedings of every other State." Art. IV., Sec. 1 Const. of U. S.

These are all sound as general rules, and this court will never wantonly or heedlessly violate the spirit which they breathe. It fully recognizes the fact that the judiciary organized under the general government, as well as that of all the States, is engaged in the same great work for the advancement of the interests and the welfare of a common country, and not only will full faith and credit be given here to the proceedings of the courts elsewhere, but all due respect will be paid to their judgments.

In reaching our conclusions, we are willing to be aided from any quarter, and especially do we rely upon the opinions pronounced by learned and distinguished judges elsewhere. But do these principles warrant the conclusion, which the appellant seeks to draw from them, as applicable to the questions involved in her appeal? We think there is a wide gap between them as premises, and the conclusion which the appellant desires this court to enforce. She invokes, in substance, the plea of res adjudicata. The question for this court then to determine is not whether we shall pay proper respect to the judgment of the Supreme Court of the United States, but whether, according to the principles which govern the plea of res adjudicata, it is applicable to this case.

What are those principles? They have been recently laid down by this court, as we understand them, in the case of Mauldin v. Gossett, 15 S. C. 565. We held, in that case, for this plea to be effective, the concurrence of four conditions was required, first, identity of the thing sued for or in controversy; second, identity of the cause of action; third, identity in the persons or parties, and, fourth, identity in the quality of the persons for or against whom the claim is made. And this court said: "If any one of these unities is wanting, and especially the unity of parties, the plea cannot be made out, because, while *it is just and proper that litigation between the same parties, after they have once had their rights adjudicated by a competent tribunal without appeal, should end, yet, a thing done between others ought not to injure another. A transaction between two parties ought not to operate to the disadvantage of a third. The maxim, res inter alios acta nocere non debet, is as strong for the protection of those not before the Court, as that of res adjudicata for those who are present."

These four unities are all necessary to the plea of res adjudicata; but of the four, that of parties is perhaps the most important. In fact, it is absolutely essential, because the court has no jurisdiction over one not before it. Here, it was a recognized fact that Hyatt was not before the court. The necessity of his presence was one of the questions in the case, the court holding, as has already been stated, that this was not indispensable as to the rights of those who were present, but expressly declaring that Hyatt could not and should not be prejudiced. In several of the cases cited by appellant, the parties were the same in both courts. Such was the fact in Christmas v. Russell, 5 Wall. 290 [18 L. Ed. 475]; Mills v. Duryee, 7 Cr. 483 [3 L. Ed. 411]; and McElmoyle v. Cohen, 13 Pet. 324 [10 L. Ed. 177]. And the question was, what effect should be given to the proceedings of the first court in such cases. The principles announced in these cases are not controverted, but they have no application here.

In Dupasseur v. Rochereau, 21 Wall. 135 [22 L. Ed. 588], the facts were somewhat similar to the facts here. "Judgment had been rendered by the Circuit Court of the United States for a party, declaring that his mortgage was the first lien on the land, and the marshal sold the property clear of all prior liens, the mortgagee being the purchaser. This judgment and sale was set up by way of defense to a suit brought in the State court by another mortgagee, who claimed priority to the first mortgage, and who had not been made a party to the suit. The State court held that the plaintiff was not bound by the former judgment on the question of priority, not being a party to the suit. The case was brought to the Supreme Court of the United States by writ of error, and that court held that the State court did not refuse to accord due force and effect to the judgment; that such a judgment in the State courts would not be conclusive on the point in question, and the judgment of the Circuit Court could not have any greater force and effect than judgments in the State courts." Extract from syllabus of Dupasseur v. Rochereau, 21 Wall. 130 [22 L. Ed. 588].

In Green v. Van Buskirk, 5 Wall. 307 [18 L. Ed. 599], Van Buskirk was held bound by a proceeding to which he was not a party, and this, at first view, would seem in conflict with the position taken above, but upon an examination of the case, this, we think, will be found to be a mistake. Bates owned certain safes at Chicago. These he mortgaged to Van Buskirk, in the State of New York, but the mortgage was not duly recorded in Illinois, and possession was not delivered to Van Buskirk. Green attached the safes in Chicago, after the date of the mortgage to Van Buskirk, and sold them and received the proceeds. Van Buskirk sued Green, in New York, for these proceeds. Green pleaded the proceedings in Illinois. The court in New York disregarded the Illinois judgment, and decreed for Van Buskirk. The Supreme Court of the United States held that this was error, and that the judgment in Illinois was binding upon Van Buskirk, although he was not a party to that proceeding. This decision, however, was based upon the fact that in the proceedings in Illinois the court there had given construction to the law of Illinois as to recording mortgages and the necessity of delivery of property to pass the title, which construction, upon a familiar principle, was binding upon other courts, and, therefore, should not have been disregarded by the court in New York. But the court also held, that, notwithstanding the proceeding in Illinois adjudicating the safes to Green, Van Buskirk would still have the right to set up title to the property if he had such as was superior to that conferred by the attachment proceedings in Illinois, and, further, that he had the right to show that the property was not liable to attachment, from all of which he would have been barred had he been a party to that suit. In other words, he was bound by the construction of the Illinois statute by the Illinois court, but not by the facts of a case to which he was no party. This case, thus understood, fails to support the appellant.

*We feel constrained to overrule the first ground of appeal, both upon principle and authority.

Second. Did Judge Pressley err in refusing the removal of this cause to the Circuit Court of the United States for the district of South Carolina? Judge Pressley, in his order refusing the motion to remove, gives the reasons for his action. They seem to us to be quite sufficient, and to be sustained by authority. It did not appear from the record of the case, to the satisfaction of Judge Pressley, that the parties were citizens of different States. Nor was the petition filed within proper time, as required by the act of congress. Chief Justice Waite, in the Railway Co. v. Ramsey, 22 Wall. 328 [22 L. Ed. 823], said: "To obtain a transfer of a suit, the party claiming it must file in the State court a petition therefor, and tender the requisite security. Such petition must state facts sufficient to entitle him to have the transfer made. This cannot be done without showing that the Circuit Court would have jurisdiction of the suit when transferred. The one necessarily includes the other. If, upon the hearing of the petition, it is sustained by proof, the State court can proceed no further."

The facts stated in this petition were, perhaps, sufficient to entitle the petitioner to the order, had the petition been filed within proper time and had the facts stated been sustained by the record as a whole, but the petition broke down at both of these points. It was not filed as required by the act of congress (1875) at or before the term at which the suit could have been tried, nor did it appear upon the face of the record that the citizenship of Mrs. Carson was in Massachusetts. True, this fact was stated in the petition, but her answer distinctly states that she was a citizen of New York. Thus, the record on its face fails to show the important fact required for removal. Meyer v. Construction Co., 100 U. S. 457 [25 L. Ed. 593]. Hence, Judge Pressley had no other alternative but to dismiss the petition upon both of the grounds mentioned.

Third. Appellant insists that Judge Pressley erred in holding as follows: "I find here not a shadow of fraud, either in the circumstances attending the said satisfaction, or in the nature of the payments." We have carefully examined the evidence *reported by the master, and upon which Judge Pressley heard the case, and we not only fail to see that his finding of fact in this respect is either without evidence, or opposed to its preponderance, one of which is necessary under our decisions to reverse it; but, on the contrary, we concur with him, that there is not a shadow of evidence in the case tainting the transaction with moral fraud and corruption, either as he stated in the satisfaction of the mortgage, or in the nature of the payments. No one knowing the parties and having the testimony before him, which Judge Pressley had, especially that the late lamented James L. Pettigru, the father of Mrs. Carson, and grandfather of the other two beneficiaries, under W. A. Carson's will, not only had full knowledge of the whole transaction, but desired and approved its consummation, could, for a moment, believe that it was conceived and perpetrated in fraud.

It is true that the settlement was based on confederate treasury notes, which soon thereafter turned to ashes; but at that time, there was no other medium of exchange in this Southern country. The fortunes of war had driven every other from our midst. It had become, from necessity, the currency of the courts, judicial sales, banks and bankers, professional men, merchants, and all classes of business. It was received for labor and all kind of service, and property of every species, real and personal, constantly changed hands upon it. It paid notes, bonds and judgments, and was for years the very life-blood of the people in all their business relations. If simply the use of this money by them is enough to fix fraud upon McBurney, Ball and Robertson, in a legitimate transaction, thus completed in open day-light, and in the very presence of the nearest relative of the parties, who at that time was the acknowledged head, not only of the bar of South Carolina, but of the entire south, and with few equals anywhere, and equally as distinguished for his high personal integrity and abhorrence of fraud, then the people of the Southern States, as a whole, were steeped in fraud during the war, because everybody, without exception, used it then. We see no error in this finding of the Circuit judge, upon the evidence before him.

Fourth. Did the Circuit judge err in holding that the plaintiff had a valid mortgage on Dean Hall, discharged of the Ball mortgage? This part of Judge Pressley's decree is assailed upon three grounds, first, that the Ball bonds and mortgage had been transferred by the executors from themselves, as such to themselves as trustees, under Carson's will in 1857, and, therefore, Robertson, one of the executors, had no legal right to receive payment of these bonds, or to cancel the mortgage in 1862; second, that Robertson, as one of the executors, had no right to act alone, even if the bonds and mortgage were still in their possession as legal owners, because, being in that event joint owners, neither could act alone; third, that in no event could the debt of Ball be legally discharged by the executors in such currency, without the consent of the cestuis que trust. In other words, the appellant contends that the executors were trustees, and that, therefore, they could not, even as executors, receive payment of the Ball debt in anything but legal currency.

To entitle the first ground to consideration, the fact upon which it is based should appear as an established fact in the case, to wit, that the bonds and mortgage of Ball had actually been assigned by the executors to themselves, as trustees, before the payment by Ball. This was a question of fact involving at the same time the question of law, whether at the time of the alleged transfer it was legally competent for the executors to make such a transfer. The will directed that the proceeds of the sale of the property should first be applied to the payment of the testator's debts, and then the residue to be divided and held in trust by his executors for his wife and children. Under our law, executors and administrators are allowed one year to ascertain the indebtedness of the estate, and the courts will not take judicial cognizance of proceedings instituted for the purpose of making distribution of the estate of the deceased, until after the expiration of one year from his death. So said Chancellor Dunkin, in Adger v. Adger, MS. Dec., Charleston, 1850, p. 252. In this case, Carson died on August 17th, 1856. It is claimed that the transfer was made June 22d, 1857. This was within the year, and was premature.

But independent of this legal question, has the fact of the assignment been legally established in such way that Judge Pressley could not have disregarded it as a fact? Judge Pressley does not state his finding upon that question, but we think the testimony was hardly sufficient to establish this fact. The only evidence upon the subject was the returns of the executors filed in the Probate Court. There was nothing upon the original papers, which were the subject of transfer, showing the assignment. The executors had not been discharged by any official act of the Probate judge, nor any notice given that the duties of trustees had been assumed by them. The papers had been originally executed to Robertson and Blacklock, as executors, and they still appeared upon their face to belong to these parties in the same capacity.

Under this state of facts, in our opinion, the testimony was not sufficient to establish the transfer claimed, and, on that account, the ruling of Judge Pressley is not obnoxious to the first objection. But even if the transfer had been regularly made, would it defeat the payment made by Ball if that payment was free from fraud and collusion and otherwise legal? This would be a fraud upon Ball. Finding his bonds in the hands of those to whom he had executed them, with no mark of transfer and nothing whatever to excite suspicion, he was fully justified in acting upon the representation that they were still the legal owners. He knew no one in the transaction but the executors. They were his creditors. He found his bonds and mortgage in the possession of one of them, the other having left the State, and he paid off the debt and canceled the mortgage. If this payment was otherwise legal no court could disturb it. This was not a case where the debtor was bound to see to the application of the fund at his peril. The executors had full power under the will to sell the estate and receive payment, and it was no business of the purchasers to follow the funds to their directed destination. Laurrens v. Lucas, 6 Rich. Eq. 226.

It is not necessary to discuss the second ground above. It is familiar law, that executors are not bound to act jointly in receiving payment of debts due them as such, or the estate. In most respects, the act of one is the act of all. Either can release or pay a debt. 2 Wms. Ex. 946; Anderson v. Earle, 9 S. C. 460; Tompkins v. Tompkins, ante 1. This is not denied by the appellant. In fact it is admitted in the argument, and it has only been referred to herein, because, in the answer, the ground is taken that Robertson alone executed the satisfaction on the mortgage.

This brings us to the consideration of the last ground urged against this last holding of the presiding judge. Could the executors legally receive confederate currency in payment of the Ball bonds, and thereupon execute satisfaction of the mortgage? This is independent of the question of actual fraud, and raises the point whether it is competent for executors, or any other trustees having charge of the estates of others, to settle with the debtors of such estates, upon any other basis than legal currency. Not whether such settlement is a breach of trust on the part of the trustees, but whether the debtor can be discharged, except upon the payment of legal currency.

Many vexed and anomalous questions have grown out of the use of confederate currency during the war by the people of the Southern States, and numerous decisions are found in our own reports upon this subject, both before the adoption of the constitution of 1868, and since. While among these cases, several are found where trustees have been held liable (under certain circumstances) for a breach of trust in receiving this currency, not a single case appears where the debtor to the trustee has been made to repay his debt, once paid in such currency in the absence of all fraud and collusion between the parties. The old court, as organized before reconstruction, as well as the court as organized since, has invariably held that executors and administrators, being the legal owners of estates under their charge, have all the rights of such owners, so far as their relations to third parties are concerned; and while they may be held responsible to their cestuis que trust for failing to observe proper care and legal prudence in the discharge of their fiduciary duties, either in the collection or investment of the bonds under their control, or otherwise; yet, where the transaction is free from fraud, the cestui que trust, if he feels aggrieved, must look alone to the trustees for redress. He cannot push the trustees aside, and assail his debtor.

This seems to have been well settled in this State, so far as a *series of decisions of the court of last resort can settle a principle. Out of the many cases found in the reports in which the subject of confederate currency and confederate transactions has been discussed, the following are referred to as especially bearing on the question now before the court: McPherson v. Gray, 14 Rich. Eq. 128; Wiseman and Finley v. Hunter, Ib. 175; Mayer v. Mordecai, 1 S. C. 399 [7 Am. Rep. 26]; Sanders v. Rogers, 1 S. C. 452; Creighton v. Pringle, 3 S. C. 97; Cureton v. Watson, 3 S. C. 458; Chalk v. Patterson, 5 S. C. 290; Singleton v. Lowndes, 9 S. C. 465; and State v. Moseley, 10 S. C. 1—the two former of which were decided by the old court before the constitution of 1868, the others, since.

In most of the cases, the main question was whether the trustee had committed a breach of trust in receiving confederate money, and thereby discharging their debtors. The question being determined upon the principles applicable to the duties of the special trust, such as good faith, reasonable diligence, a proper observance of the terms of the trust, and of the law prescribing the duties of trustees; but in several the precise question under discussion was considered and adjudged; and, we think, that those of the first class, in which the trustee has been held liable, negatively sustains the discharge of the debtor, as fully as the second class does affirmatively, because the only ground upon which the trustee could be held responsible as for a breach of trust, is the fact that he has discharged the debtor. If the debtor has not been discharged, then no injury has been done, and no breach of trust committed. Thus all of these cases may be regarded as authority for Judge Pressley's holding, now under consideration.

In McPherson v. Gray, 14 Rich. Eq. 128, a decree on creditors bill, made in 1859, directed the master to sell testator's estate for one-third cash, and the residue on a credit, secured by mortgage, the debts to be paid out of the proceeds, and the residue, subject to the trust of the testator's will, to abide the future order of the court. The master made the sales, and took from the purchaser of a plantation his bond for a large sum of money, with mortgage. In January and March, 1864, the purchaser paid the bond to the master in confederate treasury notes—a *currency which at that time had greatly depreciated, but which was the only currency in the country. The court, concluding that the payment was made in good faith, held that neither the purchaser nor the master was liable to the beneficial owners of the bond, Wardlaw, A. J., delivering the opinion of the court.

There is a striking similarity between this case and the case now before the court. In both cases, land was sold before the war, partly for cash and partly on a credit, and a mortgage taken to secure the credit portion of the sale, the proceeds of the sale first to be applied to the debts, the residue to be held subject to the trusts of testator's will. In both, the purchaser paid the purchase money in depreciated currency—confederate notes—the first being paid in 1864, the latter in 1862. In both, there was an entire loss to the cestuis que trust. In both, the payments were made in good faith. In the first, the court, consisting of Dunkin, Wardlaw and Glover, the latter sitting in the place of Inglis, concurred in holding that neither the purchaser nor the master were liable to the beneficial owners of the bond, and why should not such be the holding in the present case? There is no difference whatever between the two cases, except that, in the present case, Robertson was an executor, deriving his authority to sell from a will; and, in McPherson v. Gray, Gray was the master in equity, deriving his authority to sell from an order of the court. The trusts to be discharged were the same, and both were trustees. Executors, we suppose, are trustees, and Mr. Justice Wardlaw said in terms that "Mr. Gray, the master, was a trustee." McPherson v. Gray, p. 130, supra.

In Wiseman and Finley v. Hunter, 14 Rich. Eq. 167, under an order made in June, 1861, to collect a certain bond, dated in January, 1860, with as little delay as possible, the commissioner, in August, 1862, received payment in confederate treasury notes. In May, 1863, the commissioner reported that he had collected the bond, and, on motion of the solicitor of the parties entitled to the fund, an order for distribution was made. Two of the parties resided in Tennessee, and did not receive their shares, and they sought to have the payments opened and to compel the obligor to pay their shares. The court held that the obligor was discharged by the payment, and that the transaction could not be opened. This was in 1868, when Dunkin, D. L. Wardlaw and Inglis composed the court. "Debtors have rights as well as creditors," said the president of the court (Dunkin) in delivering the opinion, and, further, "where a transaction has been consummated and rights vested, the repose of society demands that it should not be opened." True, in this case the commissioner had been ordered to collect with as little delay as possible, and, at the instance of the solicitor of the parties, by a subsequent order distribution had been directed, but there was nothing said in either of these orders about confederate treasury notes.

Mayer v. Mordecai, 1 S. C. 383 [7 Am. Rep.

26]. By deed made in May, 1860, three bonds secured by mortgages of real estate were assigned to B. in trust, to invest the proceeds as soon as received in such manner as the said B. may think proper, on consultation with the cestui que trust. The cestui que trust removed shortly afterwards from South Carolina, where the trust was created, to New York, and remained there during the war with the Confederate States. In 1862 and 1863, B. collected the bonds in confederate treasury notes, then much depreciated, and invested the proceeds in bonds of the Confederate States, without consultation with the cestui que trust. Held, that B. committed a breach of trust in receiving payment of the bonds in confederate treasury notes and in investing the proceeds in bonds of the Confederate States, and that he was liable to account to the cestui que trust for the sums received. Held, further, that the obligors on the bonds were not liable to account to the cestui que trust, for they were discharged by their payments to B.

Here, unlike the cases above, the trustee was held liable, on the ground that he had acted without consultation with the cestui que trust, which the deed expressly required, but the obligors, as in the other cases, were protected. This case was heard in 1869, when Moses, Williard and Hoge composed the court. Chief Justice Moses delivered the opinion, saying: "That although the trustee is not discharged from liability to account for the three bonds, yet the mortgage as against the original debtors cannot be set up as of force. The legal title to the bonds was in him, and with the investment of the proceeds they had no concern." And again: "If, according to the ruling in this State, a vendee is not bound to see to the application of the purchase money (Laurens v. Lucas, 1 Rich. Eq. 226; Lining v. Peyton, 2 DeS. 375), or a mortgagee, under the order of the court, that the money is appropriated to the purpose for which the mortgage was taken (Spencer v. Bank of State, Bail. Eq. 468), much less can a debtor who makes satisfaction to the creditor in a manner acceptable and agreed to by him, in the form of actual payment, be held to such requisition"—quoting what Mr. Justice Inglis said in the case of Austin v. Kinsman, 13 Rich. Eq. 265, to wit: "That a creditor, though entitled to demand payment in lawful money, may waive his right and accept any substitute he pleases, and by voluntary acceptance of such substitute as payment makes it so." Mayer v. Mordecai, p. 398, supra [7 Am. Rep. 26].

In Sanders v. Rogers, 1 S. C. 452, the trustee was held liable for collecting, in 1863, well secured bonds, and failing to invest as the instrument creating the trusts directed, but there was no intimation that the payment by the obligor was invalid, or that the bonds had not been extinguished thereby. The case of Creighton v. Pringle, 3 S. C. 77, is to the same effect. In Chalk v. Patterson, 5 S. C. 290, it was held that the commissioner in equity was not liable, and, in State v. Moseley, 10 S. C. 6, that the sheriff was exempt from responsibility in receiving confederate money in satisfaction of an execution in his office.

These cases (and many others might be cited) establish the principle that executors and administrators and quasi-trustees, such as commissioners, masters and sheriffs, had authority during the war to receive the only currency which was then in existence, in satisfaction of bonds, notes and mortgages under their control, where the payment was made by the debtors free from fraud and collusion. Clearly, that the payment was not ipso facto void on the ground that the trustee could receive payment only in legal currency. This principle discharges the debtor in all such cases. But whether the trustee shall be exempt from responsibility is another question, which will depend in each case on its own special facts, such as good faith, reasonable and *proper diligence and care, and the terms of the trust under which he acts.

In view of these authorities coming from the court of last resort in this State, it is needless to inquire elsewhere. In any event, these must control us, running as they do, in the same direction in an unbroken current, on the exact point involved here, from the close of the war, when these perplexing questions first arose, up to the present time. The case of McDuffie v. McIntyre, 11 S. C. 551 [32 Am. Rep. 500], is not in conflict. That case decided that a guardian had no power to sell a bond and mortgage belonging to the estate of the ward. That such property occupied the same position that any other property of the ward would, such as a horse, a watch, goods and chattels of any kind, or real estate. Of such property belonging to the estate of his ward, the guardian has no such legal title as would authorize him to dispose of it, without the order of the court. But there is a clear distinction between such a case and that of an executor or administrator who is authorized to sell the property of the estate and take notes therefor to themselves.

The cases from the Supreme Court of the United States, relied on by appellant, had other features, different from the above cases, which prevent conflict. In Fretz v. Stover, 22 Wall. 198 [22 L. Ed. 769] the bonds in no sense belonged to the party who collected them. He was simply an attorney in possession for collection, and the case turned upon the question, whether he had exceeded his powers in the manner of the collection. Not being the legal owner, he had no right to exceed his agency, and the court held the parties, who paid him in other currency than such as his agency authorized him to receive, responsible over to the principal who repudiated the unauthorized settlement. That principle does not touch the one here. Here, the executor was the legal owner, had full power at his peril to deal with the bonds in question as he chose, to exchange, release, or compromise, which being done without fraud and free from imposition, surprise, or undue advantage, would be final, and could not be opened to the prejudice of the debtor.

In Horn v. Lockhart, 17 Wall. 571 [21 L. Ed. 657] an executor in the State of Alabama was held responsible for funds of the estate invested *by him in bonds of the confederate government. This was upon the ground, that inasmuch as these bonds were issued for the avowed purpose of raising funds to prosecute the war, the investment was an act giving aid and comfort to the enemies of the United States, and, therefore, void. The question of the liability of the debtors to the estate, who had paid off their indebtedness, was not involved, and not passed upon.

We see nothing in Williams v. Bruffy, 96 U. S. 177 [24 L. Ed. 716], or in Ketchum v. Buckley, 99 U. S. 188 [25 L. Ed. 473] which touches the question raised here. It is said in Williams v. Bruffy, by Mr. Justice Field, that "debts can only be satisfied when paid to creditors to whom they are due, or to others by direction of lawful authority." This is not controverted, on the contrary is recognized as familiar law, but it is equally good and familiar law that when creditors to whom a debt is due extinguish the debt by the receipt of that which they have consented to receive as payment—whether it be money or any other commodity—there is no authority in the courts, or any other power, to revitalize it. It becomes an executed contract and passes out of existence. We think that Robertson occupied the position of a creditor. Ball was his debtor, and Ball having paid to Robertson the amount due him in such currency as Robertson was willing to receive, the payment being bona fide and free from fraud and collusion, the matter then reached a finality beyond resuscitation by this court or any other legal authority.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

Before Cothran, J., Richland, November, 1881.

*224

*This was an action by W. W. Chapman against T. J. Lipscomb, superintendent of the South Carolina penitentiary, commenced in August, 1879. The nature of the action and the pleadings are stated in the opinion of this court.

By consent of counsel, the cause was "referred to N. B. Barnwell, Esq., master for Richland county, to take testimony and determine all issues of fact and law in the above stated cause, and that he report his actings and doings in said cause with all convenient speed to this court." The master reported as follows:

This cause arises upon the following facts: On August 4th, 1879, one J. A. Bondurant sold and delivered to the plaintiff, for a valuable consideration (to wit, the right to manufacture and sell in certain counties in Georgia a certain article, known as a "cotton planter," the patent right to which was owned by the said plaintiff), the articles mentioned in the complaint, the said articles being then in the custody and control of the said J. A. Bondurant, who was, at that time,

†The brief does show that this testimony was objected to by defendant when offered, and that exceptions were duly taken to the master's ruling admitting it. We do not, however, understand this court to have overlooked those exceptions, or to hold that any further exception was necessary to bring this matter before the Circuit Court; but that an exception to the ruling or decree of the Circuit judge, upon this testimony, was necessary to bring before this court any error committed by him in overruling the exceptions noted by the master in his transcript of the testimony. It will be observed that the chief justice is confining himself to the exceptions taken to the Circuit decree, the first of which refers back to the exceptions taken to the master's report, and as the exceptions to the admission of this testimony are not to be found in the exceptions taken to the master's report, nor alluded to in the other exceptions to the Circuit decree, the question, although properly before the Circuit Court for determination, if there urged, was not raised by any of the exceptions upon which the appeal to this court was based.—REPORTER.

engaged in the manufacture of brick, upon a brickyard held by the defendant, under a lease from the Columbia Water Power Company, the said defendant having entered into a contract with the said J. A. Bondurant and one J. P. Bondurant, the father of the said J. A. Bondurant, the terms of which are set out in the answer in this case.

Being satisfied that this was a bona fide sale for value by the said J. A. Bondurant, acting for himself and the said J. P. Bondurant, to the said plaintiff, and there being no satisfactory proof before me of any fraud and collusion between the parties, it only remains to inquire whether, under the terms of the contract, the said J. A. & J. P. Bondurant had such right and title in the property sold as to enable them to give a good title to the plaintiff, without the knowledge and consent of the defendant thereto, it being admitted that the defendant knew nothing of the transaction between the plaintiff and the said J. A. Bondurant.

It is claimed by the defendant, that under the terms of the contract between himself and J. A. & J. P. Bondurant, that he, the defendant, became a partner with the said J. A. & J. P. Bondurant in the manufacture of the said brick, and that, until a division of the brick, the same remained partnership assets *and that the plaintiff, being fully informed, as it is admitted he was, of the terms of the contract, could acquire no right to the property until there had been an accounting between the defendant and the said J. A. & J. P. Bondurant. Under this view of the case on the part of the defendant, the defendant at first refused to give up any part of the property purchased by the plaintiff; subsequently, and after suit brought, the defendant permitted the plaintiff to take all of the articles except the 171,000 brick, being the one-half of a kiln of brick of 342,000 brick then upon the premises, the said brick having been made under the contract hereinbefore referred to. All the brick the defendant has taken possession of, and made such use of them as he thought proper, to wit, has used the whole kiln for the purposes of the South Carolina penitentiary.

Even if, under the terms of the contract, it could be held that a partnership existed, I am satisfied that the said J. A. & J. P. Bondurant had full authority and power to sell the one-half of the said kiln, without the knowledge or consent of the said defendant, to such person and for such price as seemed best to themselves. I am the more confirmed that this is the correct interpretation to be given to this contract, from the fact that this seems to have been the view held by the parties themselves in executing this contract, to be inferred from the fact that the said J. A. Bondurant did sell in such manner as he saw fit, without consultation with the said defendant, a large quantity of brick, to wit, more than 100,000, to such persons and at such prices as seemed proper to the said J. A. Bondurant, all of which was well known to the defendant, who only seemed to have taken notice of these sales to the extent of cautioning the said J. A. Bondurant against failing to be able to furnish the penitentiary with the amount of brick expected. But I am satisfied that the terms of this contract constituted no partnership between the parties, and that the remedy of the defendant is not against the property in dispute in any way whatever, but must be upon the contract against the parties thereto. Under this view, the right of the plaintiff to this property, without let or hindrance, accrued absolutely on August 4th, 1879, and it was the duty of *the defendant to have peaceably permitted him to take possession thereof.

The value of the brick I find to be $6 per thousand. The damages sustained by the plaintiff I assess at $250.

I find, as a conclusion of law, that the plaintiff is entitled to the possession of the property sued for, and if the same be not delivered, for the value thereof, to wit, the sum of $1,026, and for the sum of $250, his damages, and for the costs of this action.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

(Signed,) Nathaniel B. Barnwell,

March 31st, 1880.

Master.

The following was the contract between the defendant and the Bondurants:

The State of South Carolina, County of Richland—This indenture in duplicate, had, made and agreed upon, this 13th day of February, 1879, by and between T. J. Lipscomb, superintendent of the South Carolina penitentiary, of the first part, and J. A. & J. P. Bondurant, of Augusta, Ga., of the second part, witnesseth:

First. That the party of the first part, in consideration of the payment to him of a certain proportional share of bricks herein-after stipulated to be paid, and of the covenants hereinafter entered into by the party of the second part, doth hereby agree to furnish to said party of the second part fifty able-bodied convicts, for the term of seven months, daily, (Sundays excepted,) or their labor for 9,100 days in the aggregate in each year. The labor of said convicts to be used for the purpose of brick making on the Kinsler (or Green) brickyard tract, in Richland county.

Second. Said convicts, and a sufficient guard to guard them, to be furnished free of cost to said party of the second part. The feeding and clothing of said convicts, and the whole cost of maintaining the guard, to be defrayed by the party of the first part.

Third. The said party of the first part also agrees to assume the payment to the owner of the yard of the royalty of 100 bricks for every thousand bricks made.

Fourth. That the party of the second part agree to make three million (3,000,000) of bricks in each and every year during the terms of this contract, using only 9,100 days' labor of convicts in each year, and to turn over to the party of the first part at the brickyard, one-half of all the bricks made. Said bricks to be of average quality of the bricks burned in each kiln.

*Fifth. That the said party of the second part agrees to sell to said party of the first part 1,000,000 of bricks in the year 1879, if he needs them for the use of the South Carolina penitentiary, at the rate of five dollars ($5) per thousand on the yard, or six dollars ($6) per thousand delivered at the penitentiary.

Sixth. That the said party of the second part agrees to assume all other expenses consequent upon the manufacture of the brick, except the convict labor, guard, and royalty to the owner of the yard.

Witness our hands and seals, this 13th day of February, 1879. This contract to exist for two (2) years, with the privilege of five (5) years.

T. J. Lipscomb, [L. S.]

John P. Bondurant, [L. S.]

James A. Bondurant, [L. S.]

To the master's report, defendant excepted as follows:

1. That the master has not reported the testimony in the cause. 2. That his report does not contain a statement of the facts found and the conclusions of law separately. 3. To statement in pages 2 and 3 of copy furnished. 4. To findings. That this was a bona fide sale for value. 5. That there was no satisfactory proof of fraud and collusion between Bondurants and plaintiff. 6. That the Bondurants had full power and authority to sell one-half of the brick kiln mentioned, without knowledge or consent of the defendant. 7. To the reasons given for the preceding finding. 8. That the terms of the contract between the Bondurants and defendant constituted no partnership. 9. That defendant's only remedy is against the Bondurants only. 10. That plaintiff's right to this property, without let or hindrance, accrued absolutely on August 4th, 1879, and it was the duty of defendant to have peaceably permitted him to take possession thereof. 11. To the value of the brick found. 12. To the damages sustained by plaintiff found. 13. To the final conclusions.

The Circuit decree was as follows:

This was an action heard by the court at the fall term of the Court of Common Pleas for Richland county, November, 1881, upon exceptions to the master's report, the cause

*having been referred to him "to take the testimony and determine all issues of fact and law" therein. It appeared upon the trial before me that an appeal had been taken from the refusal of a former Circuit judge, to hear the cause upon the ground of want of jurisdiction of the master, to hear the matter upon reference, the defendant insisting that the provisions of the code, embraced in sections 294, 295, 296, 297 and 436, apply only to referees, and not to masters in those counties of the State where such had been appointed, and the office of referees abolished. The Supreme Court, by McIver, A. J., say in this case: "We are, therefore, unable to concur in the conclusion reached by the Circuit judge, that the master has no jurisdiction to hear this case; and, on the contrary, think that the parties were entitled to have the case heard upon the master's report and exceptions." And the judgment of the court was made in accordance therewith. 15 S. C. 470.

The master's report, which embraces a vast amount of testimony taken by him, as well as other testimony taken by commission, has been carefully considered; and, although there is much conflict between the parties and the witnesses for plaintiff and defendant, and some circumstances connected with the conduct of the plaintiff and J. A. Bondurant, especially of a character somewhat suspicious, I fail to find in these such proof of fraud as to overcome the presumption of integrity, which the law throws over and around the transactions of men in the ordinary affairs of business.

Concurring, as I do, in the conclusions reached and announced by the intelligent master who heard this cause, I can the more freely criticise the inartificial manner in which he has blended in the report his conclusions of fact and law. It would have been better to have separated these more distinctly than he has done. He finds, however, as matter of fact (1) that the transaction impeached by the defendant was bona fide; (2) that there was no partnership between the Bondurants and the defendant, as the representative of the penitentiary authorities (this latter I take to be a mixed question of law and fact); and, as further matter of fact, the value of the bricks sued for, and the damages sustained by the plaintiff; and, as a sole conclusion of law, the *plaintiff's right to recover the possession of the property sued for, to wit, $1,026, and his damages, the sum of $250, and the costs of this action. In all of these I concur.

Wherefore it is ordered, adjudged and decreed, that the exceptions to the master's report be, and the same are hereby, overruled, and that said report be confirmed and made the judgment of this court.

From this decree defendant appealed on the following exceptions:

1. On all the grounds which were exceptions to the master's report. 2. Because his Honor ordered those exceptions to be overruled, and confirmed said report, and made it the judgment of the Circuit Court. 3. On all the grounds on which the Circuit judge bases his conclusion, which are incorporated with those exceptions. 4. Because the proof shows, conclusively, fraud on the part of plaintiff and his associates.

Messrs. Bachman & Youmans, for appellant.

Messrs. Rion, Lyles & Barron, contra.

October 28th, 1882. The opinion of the court was delivered by Mr. Chief Justice SIMPSON. This case was heard below upon a report of the master, with the testimony upon which the report was founded. The action was an ordinary action for the recovery of personal property, or for the sum of $1,000, the alleged value thereof, in case a delivery could not be had, and for damages.

The property consisted of 179,000 bricks, more or less, alleged by the plaintiff to have been in his possession and wrongfully taken by the defendant. The defendant relied mainly upon a contract between himself and certain parties who had made the bricks, to wit, J. A. & J. P. Bondurant, under which the bricks had been made, alleging that these parties had failed to carry out this contract, and that by their consent he had taken possession of the bricks as of right under said agreement, and that no sale or assignment of said bricks, by these parties to the plaintiff, could bind him, except so far as there might be a surplus after a full accounting between the said J. A. & J. P. *Bondurant and himself; and he demanded an accounting. There was no averment of fraud in the answer as to the sale. The contract referred to will be found in the report of the case. [Here follows a statement of the master's report, the Circuit decree and the exceptions.]

This appeal was taken before the recent rule of this court, on the subject of exceptions presented in the general form of the first exception, to wit, simply by reference to exceptions taken elsewhere than to the decree or judgment itself. It is our duty, therefore, to look back to the master's report, and to take up the exceptions thereto and consider them seriatim. The first was disposed of by a subsequent order of the Circuit judge requiring a report of the testimony to be made, which was done, and the report filed. If that report was not satisfactory, there should have been a motion to recommit. This fact shows the confusion which may result from exceptions taken in this general and informal way, and vindicates the rule recently adopted, which rule the court hopes will not escape the notice of the profession in their preparation of appeals in the future.

The second exception is met by the cases of Bollmann v. Bollmann, 6 S. C. 44, and State, ex rel. Cathcart, v. Columbia, 12 S. C. 393. In the first case, it was said on this subject: "It may be enough to say that the language of the code is to be considered as directory and not mandatory." Again, "In addition to what has been said, if the separation was necessary to a better understanding of her rights, her course was not to except because of the omission, but to move for a recommitment of the report, that it might be re-produced in the desired form." In the second case, the principle was announced as follows: "The first exception has been previously disposed of by this court, holding that the neglect of the referee or Circuit judge to present distinct findings of fact and conclusions of law is not error." The court say further: "It is to be regretted that so little regard is paid to this salutary requirement; but the remedy is not by appeal to this court on the ground of error of judgment; what might be the effect of a motion refused to correct such irregularity as a foundation of an appeal, we are not called upon to say, as that is not the present case."

*The third exception questions "statements in pages 2 and 3 of copy furnished." We have no means of ascertaining the precise questions raised by this exception, and, therefore, pass it over.

The remaining exceptions question certain findings of the master, and which were adopted by the Circuit judge. These findings consist both of fact and of law. The findings of fact being, first, that a bona fide sale for value had been made of the bricks by the Bondurants to the plaintiff; second, that there was no fraud and collusion between Bondurants and the plaintiff; third, as to the value of the bricks, and, fourth, as to the damages found. The findings of law were, first, that the terms of the contract constituted no partnership between the Bondurants and the defendant; second, that the Bondurants had full power and authority to sell one-half of the brick kiln mentioned, without the knowledge or consent of the defendant; third, that defendant's remedy is against the Bondurants only.

As to the findings of fact, these cannot be reviewed by this court, however erroneous they might be. This court, as we have often had occasion to say, is for the correction of errors of law in cases at law, with appellate power only in cases of Chancery. In a law case, the facts are beyond our reach. The constitution gives them to the jury exclusively, except that the errors of the jury in this respect may be reviewed and overruled by the Circuit judge on motion for a new trial, and may, in an extreme case, reach this court on appeal from the action of the Circuit judge on such motion, where it involves an error of law. It is only in Chancery cases that we can review the facts, which must be brought here in such cases either by a "Case" made up for that purpose, or on a case with exceptions, which latter brings up both errors of fact and of law.

Now, to apply these principles, the question arises, is this a law case, or a case in Chancery? Whether it is the one or the other does not depend upon the form or mode of trial which the parties may have adopted. A law case, it is true, is usually tried by a jury, but the right to a jury may be waived, and the facts submitted to a master or referee, or to the court if the parties so consent, but the case is nevertheless a law case, and must *be governed by the principles applicable to cases at law. A case in Chancery is not different, under the code, from cases of that character before the code. The code has made no change as to causes of action, or as to the marked distinction which formerly existed between equity and law. These still exist, and the code leaving these untouched has dealt simply with the forms of action, having abolished all previous forms and prescribed one and the same for all classes of injuries or causes of action.

*232

The cause of action in the present case was the withholding by the defendant of the personal property of the plaintiff, and the plaintiff desired to recover his property with damages for its detention. His form of action before the code would have been trover, which is an action at law. His action is still of the same kind and on the law side of the court involving no principles of equity whatever. Such being the character of the case, the facts involved, whether found by a master, referee or the court, are beyond the jurisdiction of this court, and, in considering the legal questions involved, these facts must be taken as they have been found below.

It may be said, however, that the answer set up an equitable defense, and converted the case into a case in Chancery. A defendant cannot change the character of the plaintiff's action by simply interposing an equitable defense. If this could be done, it would give power to the defendant to deprive the plaintiff of the right of trial by jury at his pleasure, which would be placing that important constitutional right upon a very uncertain tenure. The former practice in such cases was for the defendant to go into the Court of Equity and enjoin the action at law, until the equitable defense could be heard. Now, the Court of Equity having been abolished, and the jurisdiction of that court having been conferred upon the Court of Common Pleas, equitable defenses, it is true, may be set up in that court, and be heard there with the legal action to which it is interposed as a defense, but the action and the defense are not consolidated into one and tried necessarily by the same tribunal; on the contrary, they still preserve their original and distinctive features, the one being still entitled to be tried by a jury and the other by the court under the forms of an equity proceeding.

*233

*In Adickes v. Lowry, 12 S. C. 108, the court, in discussing the nature of equitable defenses interposed in an action at law, said: "Such defense is equitable in its nature, and belongs to that side of the court which exercises the Chancery jurisdiction. Under the former practice, such defense could not have been set up in the action at law to try the title and recover possession. The defendant would have been obliged to file his bill in equity to restrain proceedings at law, and to seek such other relief as in equity he might have a right to demand. Under the Code of Procedure, all this may be affected by the pleadings in a single action, and new parties, if necessary, brought in; but at the trial, the legal and equitable issues must be distinguished and decided by the court in the exercise of its distinct functions as a court of law and a court of equity, and only those should be determined by a jury which are properly triable by a jury, while those which would formerly have been properly triable in equity must be determined by the judge in the exercise of his Chancery power."

The case before the court was referred to the master by consent, "to take the testimony, and determine all issues, both of fact and law, and to report his actings and doings to the court." The master was thus charged with the whole case, complaint and defense, law and equity; and discharging his duty under this consent order, he was invested with the functions, both of the jury and a chancellor—of a jury as to the facts upon which the plaintiff rested his case, and of a chancellor as to equities of the defense. The facts on the law side were those to which the defendant has excepted. As to these, as we have already said above, they are not before us.

We come, then, to the questions of law. The first and most important arises upon the construction of the contract. Did that constitute the defendant a partner with the Bondurants? We think not. The true test of a copartnership is that there must be a communion of profits and losses. Story, in section 19 of his work on Partnership, says: "It is often laid down in elementary works, as well as in common authorities, that to constitute a partnership there must be a communion of profits and losses between the partners; and this, in a qualified sense, is *perfectly true, when it is understood with proper limitations belonging to the statement." And in section 21: "That each partner must, at all events, share in the losses, so far, at least, as they constitute a charge upon, and diminution or deduction from, the profits, and in this sense it is regularly true."

*234

We see nothing in the contract which could subject the defendant to any losses which might overtake the business. Nor was he to have a certain portion of the products as profits. The benefit which he expected to derive was not dependent upon the successful operation of the business by the Bondurants, nor was it to await the payment of the expenses to be incurred. On the contrary, he was to have delivered to him by the Bondurants a fixed proportion of all the brick made on the yard, to wit, one-half—not one-half after the payment of debts and expenses incurred, but one-half of all made, the Bondurants agreeing also to sell to him 1,000,000 in the year 1879, at a certain rate. These stipulations were based upon the consideration that the defendant was to furnish a certain number of convicts as laborers in the yard. They are inconsistent with the idea of a copartnership, and we can see no error in the ruling of the court upon that subject.

Such being our conclusion upon the question of the partnership, it follows necessarily (the court below having found as matter of fact, that a bona fide sale had been made of the bricks in question by the Bondurants to the plaintiffs, and the sale free from fraud and collusion), that plaintiff's right to the property had been established, and he was entitled to a recovery. And the defendant's cause of action being for the breach of the contract on the part of the Bondurants, his remedy was against them only. The moment the court below construed the contract as constituting no partnership, the equitable feature in the defense vanished, and nothing was left but a plain and ordinary action at law for the recovery of personal property which depended solely upon the facts as developed in the testimony.

Some question is made in the argument of appellant as to incompetent testimony, but we find no exception among the thirteen taken to the report of the master, referring to this matter. Nor do we see that the judge made any ruling on this *subject, or that any exception to the decree raises such a question.

As to the damages, we see nothing erroneous in the ruling of the Circuit judge on that subject. The complaint was for the recovery of the property and damages for its detention. What amount of damages the plaintiff sustained was a question of fact exclusively for the jury, or other tribunal acting as a jury, subject to be corrected, if erroneous, by other proceeding than by appeal.

It is the judgment of this court that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

OLIVER v. WHITE.
(April Term, 1882.)

[1. Exemptions ⚡3.]

The act of 1870 (14 Stat. 380), allowing an exemption of personal property to the head of a family, whether he owns a homestead or not, was not in conflict with the constitution of 1868.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Exemptions, Cent. Dig. § 3; Dec. Dig. ⚡3.]

[2. Homestead ⚡72.]

Quere. Are type, press and printing material, tools within the meaning of that word as used in the homestead clause of the constitution?

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homestead, Cent. Dig. § 105; Dec. Dig. ⚡72.]

[3. Taxation ⚡576, 577.]

An exemption cannot be claimed as against an execution for city taxes, even though no certificate that it was issued for such an obligation be endorsed on the process.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Taxation, Cent. Dig. §§ 1162, 1164; Dec. Dig. ⚡576, 577.]

[4. Exemptions ⚡116.]

A sheriff is not liable in damages for levying on property exempted under the provisions of the constitution and the homestead acts. The claimant must demand the right given him by the constitution.

Before Kershaw, J., Charleston, July, 1881.

This action was commenced April 28th, 1880, for damages for a levy on defendant's property under an execution issued by the city court of Charleston, in February, 1879. The complaint alleges that the execution was "issued out of the city court for a license, in 1878," and that the "said material had been laid off and assigned to plaintiff as a homestead, in 1877, in the suit, of McCoull, Sullivan & Co. against W. J. Oliver." At the trial, according to the brief, "the plaintiff introduced the assignment of homestead in the last-mentioned case," and proved, by the *deputy sheriff of Charleston county, that it was taken from the record of that case in his office. The terms of this assignment are not given. Other matters are stated in the opinion.

In granting the non-suit, the Circuit judge said:

This execution, exceedingly irregular on its face, is produced here by the plaintiff, who complains that certain property was levied on by the defendant, who was then the sheriff of the city of Charleston, and was charged by the terms of this execution with carrying it into effect by the seizure of the defendant's property. This property was seized by the defendant, and the plaintiff claims that it was exempt from the seizure by the terms of the homestead act and the laws passed in pursuance thereof by the legislature of the State.

It was generally conceded, until quite recently, that these acts of the legislature, although different from the constitution, were valid, and they were universally practised upon up to the time of the recent decision, which has been cited here. But those decisions have declared that the powers of the legislature did not extend so far as to deal with the matter of exempting property from levy and sale by execution, because the legislature had attempted to legislate upon that subject and had lost all legislative powers. They had no power to legislate beyond the declarations of the constitution. It is generally considered unfortunate that these views of constitutional law should prevail, denying to the legislature an exercise of power, from time to time, when not prohibited by the constitution from such legislative action.

It used to be considered that all the rights and privileges of legislation proper to legislative bodies, and not denied by the constitution, could be exercised by the legislature. But that is not the character of the instrument under which we are now living, and the Supreme Court has so construed the constitution, especially in regard to this matter, much against the will of the legislature of the State. However much it is to be regretted, I am bound by those decisions, and I suppose that the Supreme Court, which pronounced the decisions, regretted it as much as I do, that those who framed the constitution did not protect the man who owned a little personal property and no real estate. But they did not so provide. The last legislature passed an amendment to the constitution, which makes these humane provisions of law applicable to the poor landless man, as well as to those having large landed estates. But this has no reference to this case. It cannot be retroactive in its effects. The claim, therefore, that this property was exempt by the homestead is concluded by the decisions cited before the court.

It is hardly necessary for me to say anything about the construction of the word "tool," and if it rested on the Massachusetts case, I would, by no means, be governed by it.

Something has been said that this is a claim for taxes, and though it has assumed the form of an execution, yet I think that upon that ground the property would not be exempt from liability. I don't know that the homestead is exempt from taxation. The municipal power is only delegated power. Its taxation is State taxation, delegated by the State to the city administration. No abuse of the process has been shown. No action of the deceased sheriff, beyond that which the execution required him as a matter of duty to perform, is shown. The plaintiff is, therefore, without status in court. The non-suit is granted.

Mr. W. M. Thomas, for appellant.

Mr. G. D. Bryan, contra.

November 14th, 1883. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. Alonzo J. White was sheriff of Charleston, and as such officer was instructed to collect an execution of the city council of Charleston against W. J. Oliver, for $119.75. In the discharge of this duty he levied upon certain printing material, type, &c., and closed up the printing office, known as the Democrat in the city, belonging to W. J. Oliver, the defendant in the execution. The office seems to have been closed for several weeks, and then the execution being paid by Mrs. Oliver, the levy was released and the property returned. This action was brought by the plaintiff, W. J. Oliver, against Alonzo J. White, the sheriff, for damages alleged to have been sustained by the suspension of his business as editor, caused by the levy aforesaid.

*The complaint alleged that the levy was illegal for the reason that, being the head of a family, he was entitled to homestead in the type and printing material, which, as "tools," were exempt by the constitution from levy and sale. The sheriff answered that he made the levy in the discharge of his official duty; that the property was restored as soon as the execution was paid, and that Oliver, the defendant, was not entitled to claim the type and printing press, as homestead. After he answered, but before trial, Alonzo J. White died, and Blake L. White administered upon his estate, and in some way the case was revived against him as administrator.

After the plaintiff closed his evidence, the defendant's attorney moved for a non-suit, which was granted by Judge Kershaw, who held that W. J. Oliver was not entitled to claim homestead in the printing material, for the reason that the constitution, as recently construed, did not allow homestead in personal property, except as an incident to homestead in land, and for the further reason that it appeared the execution was for taxes due the city of Charleston. He held that the deceased sheriff did nothing beyond what the execution required him to do as a matter of official duty. The plaintiff appeals to this court upon the grounds. 1. "Because the plaintiff was entitled to a homestead in the personalty levied upon, as being the head of a family. 2. Because the press and types were 'tools' of trade, in accordance with the constitutional exemption."

We do not clearly see how the original action against Alonzo J. White for a tort, alleged to have been committed by him, was revived against his administrator, Blake L. White, in view of the maxim "quod actio personalis moritur cum persona." The code only provides for such continuance upon the death of the defendant "if the cause of action survive or continue;" but as there probably was some good reason for it, we will consider the case, which must be controlled by the law as it stood before the amendment of the constitution in 1880 in regard to homestead.

We do not understand that this court has ever declared unconstitutional the act of 1870, "to further determine and perpetuate the homestead." 14 Stat. 380. That act provided that "whenever the personal property of the head of any family is taken *or attached by virtue of any mesne or final process issued from any court, and said person shall claim the said property, or any part thereof, as exempt from attachment by the provisions of section 32, Article II. of the constitution, whether the said person owns a homestead of real estate or not, it shall be the duty of the officer executing the said process to cause to be laid off and appraised, such property as the said person may select, consisting of such articles as are enumerated in the constitution, &c.

The precise question of the constitutionality of this act has never before arisen in this court; but other questions have been decided here connected with that act; indeed, based upon it, which, therefore, incidentally, at least, affirmed the validity of the act. The following cases have recognized the act. Prince v. Nance, 7 S. C. 351. In this case the plaintiff sued the defendant for rent in arrear, and attached part of his crop, cotton in the seed, &c. He moved to set aside the attachment on the ground that he was entitled to an exemption of one-third of his crop under the act of 1873, 15 Stat. 373. It did not appear that the defendant owned any land. The court held that, being the head of a family, he was not entitled to the exemption under the act, but was remitted to his right under the homestead provision of the constitution, which excluded the right as to rent, "an obligation contracted in the production of the crop." The court said: "The express object of section 9 of the act above mentioned is to secure exemption in the nature of a homestead of one-third of the yearly 'products or earnings' to every person not the head of a family, and not to persons who are heads of families, as they have the right to homestead exemption, in a proper case, by laying claim thereto as provided by law."

Duncan v. Barnett, 11 S. C. 333 [32 Am. Rep. 476]. This was a rule upon the sheriff because he had not sold under an execution certain personal property, viz., two bales of cotton, seed cotton and corn. The only question was whether the subsequent attempt to add to the list of articles exempted, "one-third of the annual product of agricultural laborers, by the act of 1873, was consistent with the provisions of the constitutional enactment. It was not whether the head of a family *without land was entitled to an exemption of personal property, but whether the particular articles fell within the category of those enumerated in the constitution. It did not appear that the defendant in the execution had or claimed any homestead in land, and yet it was assumed that if the articles levied had been such as are named in the constitution, there would have been no question about it.

Pender v. Lancaster, 14 S. C. 28 [37 Am. Rep. 720]. The question in this case was whether a person who married and became the head of a family after an execution against him had been levied on a horse, was entitled to claim the horse as exempted under the constitution, notwithstanding the previous levy. It did not appear that the defendant owned any land, and yet it was taken for granted that he was entitled to the exemption, unless he had lost the right by the levy before his marriage. In delivering the judgment of the court, Chief Justice Willard distinctly recognized the exemption of personal property as a matter entirely independent of homestead in land, for he said: "The right to the homestead, and that to the exemption of personal property of the prescribed kinds, must be regarded as of the same nature and attended by the same general incidents, as they are both created by the same instrument for the accomplishment of the same purpose, and only differ in the respect that one relates to real and the other to personal property."

We must, therefore, conclude that the Supreme Court has never declared unconstitutional the act of 1870, before referred to, but, on the contrary, at different times and in various ways has recognized it, and incidentally, at least, affirmed its legality and validity. It follows that when the levy was made upon the property of the defendant, Oliver, he was not excluded from claiming the exemption of his personal property, although he owned no land and had no homestead therein, provided the articles of property were such as are enumerated in the constitution.

Assuming that Oliver had the right to claim the constitutional exemption in personal property, although he owned no land, were the type, press and other printing material such personal property as fall within those enumerated in the constitution? The articles enumerated in the constitution are, "household fur*niture, beds and bedding, family library, arms, carts and wagons, farming implements, tools, neat cattle, work animals, swine, goats and sheep, not to exceed in value, in the aggregate, the sum of $500." The press and type cannot possibly fall under any class named, except it may be that of "tools." Does that word naturally and properly embrace press, type and printing material? The word "tool" is defined to be "An instrument of manual operation, particularly such as are used by farmers and mechanics."

*241

It seems to have been held, in Iowa, that it embraces printing press, type and other material, but that the contrary has been held in Massachusetts. Buckingham v. Billings, 13 Mass. 82; Danforth v. Woodward, 10 Pick. 426 [20 Am. Dec. 531]. It is not perfectly clear, but we are inclined to agree with Judge Wilde, who, in delivering the judgment in the last case cited, said: "The word 'tool' is not understood, either in its strict meaning or popular use, as designating complicated machinery, which, in order to produce any useful effect, must be worked by combining several distinct parts or separate pieces, the aid of more hands than one being necessary to perform the operation, all which is required in a printing apparatus. Nor can the several parts be denominated 'tools,' as they cannot be used separately, but, like the ax and its handle, must be united to accomplish any work. The press and forms may, with as much propriety, be denominated 'tools' as the types. All are the necessary component parts of the machinery for printing. Besides, types cannot be used as tools of trade by a printer, after he is stripped of the other parts of his printing apparatus, so that the exemption from attachment of the types alone would not enable him to pursue his trade and thereby gain his subsistence, which was the object of the statute."

But without regard to this question, the fact that the execution was for taxes was certainly enough to protect the sheriff. It is true, the certificate required by the act of 1868 was not endorsed on the process, but that requirement was for the purpose of simplifying the proof of the fact, and upon a question whether the execution was issued upon a claim for taxes, that *omission would be evidence against the plaintiff in the execution, as in the case of Adams v. Agnew, 15 S. C. 36, cited in argument, but when once the fact appeared that the judgment was rendered upon a claim for taxes, we suppose that the plaintiff's omission to have the certificate endorsed by the court could not exclude the sheriff from the protection of the constitutional provision, which in itself has no such requirement.

Besides, the act itself seems to contemplate that the claim for homestead shall be made after levy. The words are, "when-ever the personal property of the head of any family is taken or attached," &c. The sheriff is a ministerial officer, and has no right to consider and determine the question of homestead. The process in his hands is a mandate to make the money. If he sells or removes property, subject to homestead, he is liable to be indicted under the act "to punish sheriffs and other officers for violating the homestead" (14 Stat. 172); but it would seem that there is no prohibition against simply making a levy, which the sheriff being commanded to make, is the usual preliminary step to the claim of homestead upon the part of the defendant in execution. The constitution only gives the right to demand homestead, and it is necessary for the claimant to set it up and establish it as in regard to any other right. Pender v. Lancaster, supra.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

ABRAMS v. CARLISLE.

(April Term, 1882.)

In an action for claim and delivery of a mule, the trial justice rendered judgment for plaintiff and notified counsel, and on same day issued his execution under which the constable at once seized the mule and delivered it to plaintiff; defendant on same day demanded of the trial justice a return of the property, and within five days afterwards moved for a new trial, which was granted. Afterwards this defendant sued the trial justice for damages. Held—

Before Hudson, J., Newberry, February, 1881.

The opinion states the case.

Messrs. Moorman & Simkins, for appellant.
Messrs. Jones & Jones, contra.

November 14th, 1882. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. Milton A. Carlisle is a trial justice of Newberry county, and this was an action against him for damages for acting contrary to law, and for official misconduct under the following circumstances: One David Boozer, in February, 1879, brought an action against Wilson G. Abrams for claim and delivery of a mule of the value of $75. This action was brought before Milton A. Carlisle, as trial justice. Boozer gave bond, had the mule delivered to him, but on the same day Abrams, the defendant, gave the bond required in such case, and the mule was returned to him. On March 6th, 1879, the trial justice heard the case and delivered a judgment in writing for Boozer, that the mule be delivered to him, or in case a delivery could not be made, then for $75 damages. March 8th this judgment was read to the counsel on both sides, and no motion was made for a new trial or notice given of appeal. On the same day an execution was issued to enforce the judgment, which was executed, and the mule delivered to Boozer. Soon after the delivery of the mule, and on the same day the attorney of Abrams demanded from the trial justice possession of the mule, and he refused to deliver the mule, saying the judgment had been executed. On March 12th Abrams moved for a new trial, which the trial justice granted, and the case was tried again on July 4th, and judgment again given for Boozer.

July 11th *Abrams appealed to the Circuit Court of the Common Pleas, where the case is still pending. On August 7th Abrams again demanded that the trial justice should deliver the mule to him, upon the ground that he had given bond for the delivery of the mule if the final decision should be against him, but that pending the litigation he was entitled to retain possession. The trial justice refused to comply with the demand, and this action was brought against him for damages in acting contrary to law, and for official misconduct.

The presiding judge charged the jury "that if the trial justice acted within the scope of his jurisdiction and authority, and had issued no illegal execution, or did any illegal act, he was not liable; that in the absence of instructions from the plaintiff he was not bound to wait until five days elapsed before issuing execution at once; the judgment was announced to the attorneys on March 8th, and no intimation of an intention to appeal being given, he issued the execution and the same was enforced; no proceedings by the defendant Abrams, subsequent to this can operate as a supersedeas of the judgment and enforced execution; that no trespass was therefore committed by the trial justice in issuing the execution or in refusing to undo what the constable had done in enforcing the same; consequently the question of damages cannot go to the jury, and you must find for the defendant Carlisle."

The jury found for the defendant, and the plaintiff appeals to this court upon the following grounds: "Because the judge erred in charging the jury—1. That in the absence of instructions from the plaintiff in the judgment, it was the right and duty of Trial Justice Carlisle to execute the judgment he had rendered against the defendant, the plaintiff in this case, immediately upon its publication, and was not bound to wait until the time for appeal or motion for a new trial had expired. 2. That the proceedings in that case, subsequent to said judgment, did not operate as a supersedeas of the judgment and execution. 3. That the defendant, as trial justice, committed no trespass in issuing the execution and in refusing to undo what the constable had done in enforcing the same, and that the jury must find for the defendant."

"It is clear that the trial justice could not have legally delivered the mule to the plaintiff, Boozer, after the new trial was granted, for, in that case, the judgment would have been set aside, and the issue would have stood untried, precisely as it did when Abrams got possession of the mule under his bond. We take it to be also clear that, having had the mule delivered under his judgment before the motion for a new trial was made, the trial justice had no legal authority under a judgment which was then functus officio, to undo what the constable had done; so that upon this part of the case, the matter is reduced to the question, whether the trial justice was authorized by law to issue his execution on the very day his judgment was promulgated, and have it executed by taking the property from one and giving it to the other litigant, before the five days had expired, which are allowed for appeal or motion for a new trial.

We have no doubt that the trial justice, during that time, had the right to enter his judgment and lodge his execution, as it is sometimes said, "to bind property;" but this case does not make it necessary to decide whether he had the right, in an action for personal property, to have his judgment executed by seizing and delivering the property before the time allowed for appeal or motion for a new trial had expired. Under ordinary circumstances, we think it the better course for him to regard the case as still pending until the time allowed for a new trial or appeal has expired.

But Milton A. Carlisle was a judicial officer, and the subject-matter was clearly within his jurisdiction. He had just decided the case, and when he entered his judgment and execution to enforce it, he was acting judicially, as much so as when he rendered the judgment itself, and even if he did make a mistake in having the mule delivered at once, without reference to the right of the defendant to move for a new trial or appeal within five days, he was not liable in damages for the consequences, unless he acted willfully and corruptly. A judicial officer is not liable in damages for an honest mistake committed in the course of his duty. This court has lately had occasion to consider this question in the case of McCall v. Cohen, 16 S. C. 448 [42 Am. Rep. 641], and it cannot be necessary to do more than refer to that case, in which

*the court say: "It is as well settled as any legal proposition can be, that a judicial officer is not liable in damages for an injury which may come to a party by reason of an error of judgment committed in the discharge of his duty, when the subject-matter is within his jurisdiction. Without going into the long line of authorities in support of this proposition, extending back, at least, to the time of Lord Coke, it cannot be necessary to do more than refer to the case of Bradley v.

Fisher, 13 Wall. 335 [20 L. Ed. 646], decided in the Supreme Court of the United States as late as 1871, in which the subject received exhaustive consideration. * * * This is undoubtedly the law in reference to courts having general authority, and it is equally true in reference to judges of inferior courts, except, possibly, as to the right to call in question the motives with which they act, whether ignorantly or willfully and corruptly." Reid v. Hood and Burdine, 2 N. & McC. 168 [10 Am. Dec. 582]; see also Young v. Herbert, 2 N. & McC. 172 (in note to this case), and authorities.

There is no allegation here that the trial justice, Carlisle, acted willfully and corruptly. "Neither in the pleadings nor in the argument is he charged with collusion, fraud, malice or corruption. On the contrary, this is disavowed by plaintiff's counsel, who speaks in terms of praise of the ability and integrity of that officer."

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed, and the appeal dismissed.

*247

*Before Kershaw, J., Beaufort, November, 1881.

This is an appeal from the following order of the Circuit judge. Other facts are stated in the opinion.

The claim of the relator is founded upon services rendered by assistant assessors in making the assessment for taxes in the year 1876, for which the relator holds the checks of the auditor on the treasurer of Beaufort county, as provided for in section 84 of the act of 1874, p. 762.

By that act, $1,000 were set apart to pay the expenses of the assessment, which was required to be paid out of the first money collected for the year for which such assessment was made. In this instance the funds collected were paid out without providing for these claims. Here, lately, other funds have come into the hands of the treasurer on account of the taxes of that fiscal year. And the object of this proceeding is to procure a writ of mandamus to compel the application of this fund to the claims of the relator, which were not paid as they should have been out of the money formerly collected. If they had been so paid there would have been a different set of claims displaced, which would have remained unpaid, but which have been satisfied out of money applicable first to the claims of the relator. There therefore does not appear any reason to doubt the equity of the present claims, and they ought to be paid unless there be objections of a legal character preventing the relief demanded.

If the funds now in the hands of the treasurer had been paid out at the time when the other taxes for that year were collected and before any payments had been made from the entire fund so collected, there can be no question that the fund would have been charged with the payment of claims like this. And it would have made no difference whether they were paid out of the money first collected or the last. In other words, there was no specific appropriation of the identical $1,000 first collected, so as to give the assessor the right to those specific dollars, and only to those, so that when these had been improperly paid out to the other parties the assessor had no right to be paid out of other funds left in the treasury. I do not think that the lateness of the time at which this fund has come into the treasury *can affect the rights of the relator. The taxes collected on account of that year, (1876,) whenever received, constitutes a fund applicable to those claims, which, under the act, constitute a class of claims preferred to the extent of $1,000, payable out of that fund.

This special preference was necessary in order to procure an assessment to be made, without which there could have been no taxes collected. They are necessary expenses of administration, without which, the laws would be inoperative upon which the maintenance of the government depends. I do not think, therefore, that they come under the general class of liabilities of the county, to be thrown into the category of past indebtedness. The legislature very distinctly indicated this by the peculiar provisions of the act of 1874, placing them upon an entirely different and peculiar footing. I have given consideration to the various objections urged at the bar and in the return of the respondent, and find nothing to justify a refusal of the relief desired by the relator. The act providing for a division of the counties of Beaufort and Hampton, and a division of the debt between them cannot affect this question, nor can any confusion result in consequence, since reference was required to be had in such division to the unpaid taxes due Beaufort county.

It is ordered and adjudged that a writ of mandamus do issue to command the treasurer of Beaufort county to pay the claims of the relator as demanded, but without costs.

Messrs. Elliott & Fowles, for appellant.

Messrs. W. J. Verdier, J. D. Pope, contra.

November 15th, 1882. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice McGOWAN. On November 15th, 1881, John Conant, the relator, applied to Judge Kershaw for a writ of mandamus to compel R. B. Fuller, treasurer of Beaufort county, to pay him the amount of twelve warrants, aggregating $995. The affidavit of the relator set forth that at certain stated times in the years 1876 and 1877, L. S. Langley, then the auditor of Beaufort county, "drew his warrants or checks as such auditor, and directed them to the treasurer of said county according to law, and required him to pay to the persons named in said warrants or checks the amounts therein named, being in payment of the expenses of the assessment of said county for taxation for the fiscal year 1876, and to charge the sum to the assessment fund;" that thereafter said warrants or checks came to the hands of the relator, who is the lawful owner and holder thereof; that they were not paid by the then county treasurer, George Holmes, because there were then no funds in his hands applicable thereto; that respondent has funds in his hands applicable to the payment thereof and refuses to pay the same, although requested so to do, and that the whole expense of making the assessment for said year (1876) is still due and unpaid. The checks, twelve in number, were drawn for various sums from $25 to $200, and, with one exception, were in favor of "bearer" or "J. W. Brown or bearer." Eleven were dated on various days in June, July and August, 1876, and the twelfth on January 16th, 1877.

The respondent made return, in which he admits that he has in his hands county funds for the fiscal year commencing November 1st, 1876, collected lately, in May and July, 1881, amounting to the sum of $882.86, but submits that the same is not applicable to the payment of relator's claims for various reasons therein set forth.

Judge Kershaw heard the case upon petition and answer, and granted the writ, we suppose, to the extent of the money in hand for the year commencing November 1st, 1876. The respondent appeals to this court upon the following grounds:

1. "Because his Honor granted the order upon equitable grounds, whereas it is submitted it should have been granted only to compel the performance of a clear duty, made obligatory by law upon the respondent.

2. "Because his Honor ruled that relator's claims had not become past indebtedness, and that the taxes collected for the year 1876, whenever received constituted a fund for the payment of such claims.

3. "Because his Honor ruled that the act creating the county of Hampton, and providing for a division of the debt of the old county of Beaufort, between the present county of Beaufort and the county of Hampton, and the action of the commissioners appointed thereunder do not affect this question.

4. "Because the relator did not present said claims for payment at the time when the first collection of taxes, for said fiscal year were made by the then county treasurer, which said collection as claimed by him was applicable to the payment thereof.

5. "Because said claims, if valid, were payable from the proceeds of a tax levied by an act of the general assembly, approved March 22d, 1878, to be applied to the indebtedness of the county of Beaufort, for the fiscal year commencing November 1st, 1876.

6. "Because, under existing laws, respondent cannot legally pay said claims, except upon the checks of the county commissioners.

7. "Because said checks were not drawn in the manner then required by law, especially in this, that the alleged services for which they were drawn were not specified, nor were they ever audited or approved by the county commissioners.

8. "Because it is alleged in the return of the respondent, and not controverted, that said services were never rendered.

9. "Because no legal demand was made upon respondent for payment of said claim.

10. "Because respondent is not treasurer of the old county of Beaufort, but of the new county of Beaufort, and cannot therefore legally pay said claims."

The view which the court takes of this case renders it unnecessary to consider all the exceptions seriatim. It is well settled that the writ of mandamus can only issue to compel the performance of some act obligatory by law on the officer to whom it goes. He must have the ability to comply, and must be also under a clear duty in respect thereof. A writ of mandamus is the highest judicial writ known to the constitution and laws, and only issues when there is a specific legal right to be enforced, or where there is a positive duty to be performed, and where there is no other specific remedy. When the legal right is doubtful, or when the performance of the duty rests in discretion, or where there is other adequate remedy, the writ cannot rightfully issue. Hayne v. Hood, 1 S. C. 23; Ex parte Mackey, 15 S. C. 223.

Did the relator have a legal right, clear and beyond doubt, so that it was the plain ministerial duty of the treasurer to pay these checks? As we understand it, the legal right referred to embraces, not only the character of the claim, but also the form in which it is presented, and this must be determined by the state of the law and facts existing at the time the proceeding was taken. The county treasurer is a public officer, and he cannot be compelled by mandamus to pay any claim unless it is presented in the form required by law. The demands presented to him for payment in this case were simply checks of the auditor of Beaufort county for the time being, without having been investigated by the county commissioners, or having any statement attached showing the services alleged to have been performed by the parties, in whose favor they were drawn, and the question is whether it was the plain ministerial duty of the treasurer to pay them in that form.

It is alleged that the checks were given for services rendered in assessing the property of Beaufort county, in the months of June, July and August, 1876, preparatory to the levy of taxes for the fiscal year commencing November 1st, 1876, and are chargeable upon, and should be paid out of any money in hands from that levy. The respondent denies that the services were ever rendered at all, and refers to circumstances connected with the checks to sustain the allegation, and insists that he could not lawfully pay them without audit, and that the mere check of the auditor was not such audit. The Circuit judge did not think it necessary to order an issue to ascertain the fact, and for the purposes of the case, we will assume that some such services were rendered.

In several respects this case is like that of The State, ex rel. Wise v. Ransom, 9 S. C. 200, certainly in reference to the time when the alleged services were rendered, and, therefore, if there is no good reason why these services should not be paid for, they would be chargeable to the levy for which they were rendered, commencing November 1st, 1876; but the question lies back of

*that, whether the treasurer was bound to pay them at all, merely in the form of checks of the auditor under the act of 1874, which provided as follows: "That the treasurer of each of those above named counties shall pay to his county auditor, or his order, the sum specified in the auditor's warrant from the first collection of county funds of that fiscal year."

After the passage of this act, it was soon perceived that so far as it directed the treasurer to pay such county claims simply on the check of the auditor, it was not in harmony with other provisions of the law, but anomalous and dangerous, if not unconstitutional. The policy of the law, undoubtedly, is to subject every county claim to the examination of the board of county commissioners, the tribunal provided for that purpose by the constitution. In this view, doubtless, the legislature passed the act of March 25th, 1876, 16 Stat. 194, which provided as to these claims for making assessments, as follows: "And the county commissioners of the several counties shall, upon the application of the county auditors, draw their checks on the county treasurers for the several amounts to which the auditors may be entitled under the provisions of this section, and the county treasurers shall pay the said checks from the first collection of county funds of the fiscal year in which the work shall be performed. But no such check or order shall be paid by the county treasurer until the auditor shall have filed with the county commissioners an itemized statement of the services rendered by his assistants," &c.

It is true that, although passed before, this act did not take effect until after the time these services were rendered, viz., November 1st, 1876; and on that account it was held, in the case of Wise v. Ransom, supra, that it did not apply to services rendered in June, July and August of 1876. But there was another act on the statute book at that time that seems to have been overlooked, which was in active operation, and, we think, repealed so much of the act of 1874 as directed the treasurer to pay such claims as these upon the naked check of the auditor. That was the act of April 13th, 1875. "To reduce all acts and parts of acts in relation to county commissioners, their powers and duties into one act, and to amend the same." 15 Stat. 993. *Section 23 of that act, after making some regulations as to numbering audited claims, provided as follows: "And after the passage of this act no claims of any class or description, drawn against any county in this State, shall be paid by the county treasurer of any county until such claims have first been examined, approved and allowed by the board of county commissioners of such county. And the said commissioners, after examining, approving and allowing such claims, shall, if there be funds in the hands of the county treasurer subject to the payment of said claims, draw their checks for the payment of said claims upon the treasurer of their respective counties, specifying the fiscal year for which the claims were contracted or incurred, and immediately cancel the said claims, and file the same in their office as a voucher for their draft. And it shall not be lawful for any county treasurer to pay any claim against the county, except upon the checks of the county commissioners of the said county, which shall bear upon their face not only the number, amount and name of the party in whose favor they are drawn, but the nature of the claims for which they are drawn, and the fiscal year in which they were contracted or incurred," &c.

This act, as stated, was passed in April, 1875, taking effect from its passage, which was before these services were rendered or checks were drawn. It expressly "repealed all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with it," and we think it repealed so much of the act of 1874 as made it the duty of the county treasurer to pay naked checks of the auditor without the approval of the county commissioners. This act was not referred to in the case of State, ex rel. Wise v. Ransom, supra, for the very good reason that it did not apply to that case, in which the question was made upon the order of the board of county commissioners, who had examined and approved the claim. It is important to preserve the symmetry of the law, which requires that a county treasurer shall not pay any claim against the county, except upon the check of the county commissioners, who are charged with the duty of raising the money for that purpose and giving checks for all proper county claims.

The judgment of this court is, that the judgment of the Circuit Court be reversed, and the petition for mandamus dismissed.

In action by A., involving his right of way through an alleged canal over a lot of B. covered with water, both parties, deriving title through one J., who held under certain partition proceedings, the presiding judge committed no error in charging the jury that the absence of any trace of the canal on a plat made at the time of the partition was "only one circumstance to be considered and was not conclusive," it appearing that J., during his ownership, marked out the canal on an old plat, and that it was referred to as a boundary and open way in the title deeds under which B. held.

Before Kershaw, J., Charleston, July, 1881.

This was an action by Wm. P. Russell and Nathan Frye, copartners, under the name and style of the Charleston Rice Milling Co. against Charles S. Bennett and others, copartners, doing business under the firm name of C. S. Bennett & Co. The summons bears date January 10th, 1881. The opinion makes a full statement of the case.

Mr. A. G. Magrath, for appellant.

Messrs. L. DeB. McCrady, E. McCrady, Jr., contra.

November 27th, 1882. The opinion of the court was delivered by

Mr. Justice MCGOWAN. This was an action for damages caused by the alleged obstruction of a canal running into Cooper river, the use of which was claimed to belong to the plaintiffs in common with other persons, including the defendants. Without the plat, which we cannot make a part of this opinion, it is difficult to give a clear view of the locus in quo, which is necessary to a proper understanding of the case, but we will endeavor to make it intelligible.

The plaintiffs and defendants own rice mills in Charleston, situated near each other, and both within the low grounds lying between the low-water mark and the edge of the marsh of Cooper river. The mill of defendants was established first, and lies between that of the plaintiffs and the channel of the Cooper river.

The plaintiffs, having lately changed their building material factory into a rice mill, claim that there is an old canal running along the north side of their lot and through that of the defendants to the river, which they have a right to use, and which, if kept open, would enable parties in boats with rough rice to reach their mill, and that defendants, to their great damage, have obstructed that canal. The defendants, on the other hand, deny that there is any such canal through their lot which the plaintiffs are entitled to use, either by prescriptive right or by grant as an appurtenant to their lot. And these are the questions in the case.

The evidence does not disclose when or by whom, or for what precise purpose the alleged canal was cut; but there is little doubt that there was once such a canal through the marsh opening into the river. The part furthest from the river, along the plaintiffs' lot, is admitted to be there now; but the defendants allege that the lower end, connecting with the river, no longer exists, or if it does, that the plaintiffs have no right to use it.

Many years ago, one William Johnson owned all these marsh lands down to Cooper river, including the lots of both plaintiffs and defendants, and it is admitted that both parties hold under him. After William Johnson died, proceedings were instituted to partition these lands. The commissioners in partition recommended that the lands should be divided into different parcels, and sold or assigned to the parties in interest, and along with their return exhibited a rude plat dividing the land into lots numbered from one to thirteen.

It seems that sometime before these proceedings, the city had ordered a street to be opened through these lands, to be called "Concord street." The site indicated for it, however, had never at this place been filled up and made an actual street, but remained in its original state as mud or water. See Bennett v. *Bell, 10 Rich. Eq. 466. On the plat of the commissioners in partition before referred to, the site of Concord street fell between lots No. 12 and No. 13, and a dotted line marked "canal" traced its course as running along the northern border of all the new made lots from No. 1 to No. 12 inclusive, but there it struck the site of Concord street, which, as stated, was covered by water, and did not go beyond through lot No. 13, lying between Concord street and the river.

*PLAT IN THE PARTITION PROCEEDINGS.

Under these partition proceedings, lots No. 12, on the west side, and No. 13, on the east side of the site of Concord street, were assigned to John Johnson, Jr., as one of the heirs of William Johnson. About the year 1831, John Johnson, Jr., died, leaving a will whereby he devised all of his property to his executor, first to pay debts and then to his wife, Mary, during her life, with remainder over to his brother, Dr. Joseph Johnson. Sometime after, when Dr. Joseph Johnson and Mary Johnson owned all the lands through which, as alleged, the canal runs, it appears that upon an old plat of the premises, made by one Joseph Purcell, in 1821, the said Joseph Johnson drew two lines indicating the canal, which, corresponding with that marked on the partition plat, as far as that went down to Concord street, extended beyond that point to the river, and wrote between the lines the following words: "Canal in common, now twenty feet wide to the channel."

In 1834, after this declaration, Dr. Joseph Johnson and Mary Johnson conveyed lot No. 13 to Richard Fordham, with the following description: "All that tide lot * * * bounded to the north on land laid out as a canal for the use of certain heirs of William Johnson, deceased, * * * and to the west on Concord street, together with the right to use and enjoy the said canal on the north," &c. This is the lot to the east of Concord street, now owned by the defendants under this title to Fordham, to whom it was first conveyed. In 1849, Joseph Johnson and Mary Johnson conveyed lot No. 12 to William Bell, with this description: "All that water lot * * * butting and bounding to the north, on a canal twenty feet wide, laid out for use in common of sundry heirs and assigns of William Johnson, *father of the above-named Johnson; to the east on land of W. J. Bennett & Co." This is the lot now owned by the plaintiffs, under this title, to the west of Concord street.

The defendants claim that if the canal ever had an existence through their lot to the channel, as indicated by Joseph Johnson on the Purcell plat, it was discontinued, and the plaintiffs, as owners of lot No. 12, have no right now to the use of it for two reasons—first, that there was not, on the partition plat under which they held, any trace of the canal east of the site of Concord street, and, second, that the said Concord street, dedicated by the city, cuts the line of the supposed canal at nearly a right angle, and, although now merely a street in theory, would certainly, if ever filled up, cut off and render useless as a canal all that part of it lying between that point and the river.

The case came on for trial before Judge Kershaw. Much testimony was offered, especially upon the claim as to the use of the canal relied upon to give the plaintiffs a right by prescription. But upon this subject the judge charged that, as the alleged canal through the lot of the defendants was under an open sheet of water and not appearing on the surface, the evidence did not establish such a use of the water on the precise line of the unseen canal, as to give a prescriptive right to its use, and there being no exception to this charge, we need not pursue this branch of the subject farther.

Upon the other points involved, the judge charged as follows: "The plaintiffs having derived their title under this partition, are entitled to enjoy the attendant right to the use of the canal as established by the decree in partition. The question therefore is, what was that canal as established by the decree?"

* * * You will not understand me as indicating any opinion on this subject, but merely calling your attention to all the evidence and instructing you that the plat accompanying the partition is not conclusive, but may be considered by you, in connection with other circumstances, and the action of the parties under it may be determined by all the evidence before you, including the admission of the parties as contained in their deeds and all their conduct in relation to it, as indicating the understanding which followed the land into the hands of the persons who were afterwards the owners of it. My impression of that plat made by the commissioners is, that it is so ambiguous that it throws you upon the evidence in the case wherever the fact that the canal does not extend beyond Concord street, is a material point. This Concord street seems to have been dedicated at some time to the use of the public, and you are to determine from that circumstance, whether that is or is not a reasonable fact which would tend you to the belief that the canal was to stop at that street because there was to be a street there. But in regard to the effect of a street laid out and not dedicated, although the city may have opened and filled up that street at any time, that circumstance would not be conclusive of the right of the plaintiff to use the canal beyond the street, if, in point of fact, they had the right to do so attendant upon their title. The street when established might possibly abridge their use of the privilege, but until actually occupied as a street, the land is open to the use of the adjacent proprietors," &c.

The jury found for the plaintiffs damages in the sum of $315, and the defendants appeal to this court upon the following exceptions:

1. Because there was not any proof of a dedication of the alleged canal, nor proof of acceptance or user.

2. Because an act of dedication involves a designation of the object dedicated, the purposes of the dedication, and the persons to whom and for whom such dedication is made. And in all of these respects the evidence was wanting, particularly in the two last named, concerning which there was no evidence.

3. Because there was not any evidence of user to give right by prescription, and the non-user in any way had continued so long as to bar a right claimed under deed.

4. Because the plaintiff must recover, if at all, on his own title, and that to be proved as set forth in their complaint. And the right set forth in their complaint and in their title, was contradicted by the proof produced at the trial.

5. Because a dedication, public in its nature, requires more than the proof of a mere intention; it must be accompanied by certain positive acts. And if private, because limited to a certain person or persons, the right claimed by such person or persons must be clearly established by such person or persons.

6. Because the legal effect of a deed or of deeds must be decided by the terms of such deed or deeds, and these terms cannot be varied by circumstances or matters outside of such deed or deeds.

7. Because a right to claim damages results only from a wrong done in the violation of some right, and there was not any proof of a right to be violated, consequently no wrong done for which damages could be given.

8. Because his Honor, the presiding judge, should have instructed the jury as is set forth in the preceding propositions.

As we understand it, the right claimed on the part of the plaintiffs to have the use of the canal, is not a public right belonging to all persons, but a private right as an incident of the ownership of their lot, which came to them as assigns of the Johnsons, with the right to use the canal over all other lands derived from the Johnsons; that they have to that effect a covenant running with the land. If the right exist, it is a private right resting in grant, and there is no question of dedication to the use of the public or acceptance involved.

The case seems to have turned entirely upon two questions, whether the canal, which the plaintiffs were entitled to, ever extended east of Concord street to Cooper river; and if so, whether the defendants have obstructed it. These were both questions of fact, and being an action at law, this court has no right to review the evidence or do more than correct any error of law, which may have been committed.

There were no requests to charge, and we do not see that any specific error of law is charged in the exceptions, unless it may be involved in the instructions of the judge that neither the absence of a trace of the canal on the partition plat, beyond the proposed site of Concord street, nor the mere dedication of that street without its being filled up, was conclusive against the rights of the plaintiffs. We do not think it was error in the judge to tell the jury that the absence of a trace of the canal on the partition plat, beyond Concord street, was only one circumstance to be considered with others, and was not conclusive *as to its non-existence beyond that point. The canal was not traced on the partition plat, but there was no negation as to its existence beyond. That was not a case for the application of the principle of expressio unius est exclusio alterius. As said by the judge, it may be that it was not thought necessary to mark the canal "further than where it entered upon open water." It was admitted that down to the site of Concord street there was a canal as marked on the plat, and from the nature of a canal it would seem probable that it had an outlet or vent to the river.

But be that as it may, after partition, both lots belonged to Dr. Joseph Johnson and Mary Johnson; and whilst they were the owners, it was acknowledged and marked on an old plat that the canal did go to the channel. The parties, in one sense, do hold under the partition proceedings, but through Dr. Joseph Johnson and Mary Johnson, and any explanation which they made of those proceedings bound them and went along with the lands into the hands of their alienees. Elliott v. Rhett, 5 Rich. 406 [57 Am. Dec. 750].

It is true that the plaintiffs must recover upon the strength of their own case; but when the action is for obstructing a right of way, we see no reason why the plaintiffs' right to recover might not be shown by the admissions of the defendants. They had no higher right than was conveyed by Joseph Johnson and Mary Johnson to Fordham in 1834, and thence down to them. They purchased, subject to the easement as declared by the successive deeds in their chain of title. As late as 1871, in the deed from W. J. Bennett to C. G. Memminger, executor of Thomas Bennett, their lot is described as "all that tide lot, * * * butting and bounding north on a canal, laid out for the use of certain heirs of William Johnson; east, on the channel of Cooper river; south, on dock twenty feet wide, owned and used in common between Robert Eason and the devisees of John Johnson, deceased, and west on Concord street, together with a right to use and enjoy the said canal on the north, and dock on the south, in common with such other persons as are now or may hereafter become entitled to use and enjoy the same in common," &c. The defendants are estopped *from denying that the canal crossed Concord street and ran along the northern boundary of their lot held from the Johnsons.

As to the effect of the simple dedication of Concord street, without its being filled and actually made a street, we concur with the judge. Laying out a road or dedicating a street to the use of the public does not divest the title of the adjacent proprietors to the land on which it is projected; but their rights remain the same, subject to the easement created. Whether Concord street shall be filled up and prepared for use as a street, and if so, what effect that would have upon the canal called for by the title deeds of the parties, are matters between the plaintiffs and the authorities of the city, which are not before us, and as to which we make no ruling. All we mean to say is, that in the present condition of things, the defendants cannot defeat any right to the use of the canal which may otherwise exist, by showing that the proposed street, if actually made, would cross that canal.

The judgment of this court is that the judgment of the Circuit Court be affirmed.

GUNTER v. GRANITEVILLE MANUFACTURING COMPANY.

(April Term, 1882.)

[Reported and Annotated in 44 Am. Rep. 573.]

[1. Trial ⇨268.]

Where the presiding judge said to the jury concerning requests to charge "that most, if not all, of them were in accordance with the law as understood by me, and already laid down in my charge," but "were declined so far as they contained matter inconsistent with the instructions already given," a request to charge cannot be said to have been refused unless shown to be inconsistent with the general charge.

[2. Master and Servant ⇨185.]

A workman, employed by a cotton manufacturing company to keep the machinery of the mill in repair and good working order, is not a fellow-servant with a weaver in the factory in such a sense as to exempt the employer from liability for an injury to the weaver caused by the negligence of such workman.

A master is liable for any injury to his servant caused by his own negligence, or by the negligence of any person representing him; and a person employed to do anything which it is the master's duty to do—as e. g., in a cotton factory, to employ the operatives and discharge them when incompetent or careless, to provide suitable machinery, and to keep it in proper repair and safe working order—is the master's representative.

Before Kershaw, J., Aiken, September, 1881.

This was an action by Marina S. Gunter against the Graniteville Manufacturing Company, commenced October 4th, 1879, for $10,000 damages for the loss of an eye, caused by a shuttle flying from its place while a loom was being repaired, in work hours, by one Harling, the loom repairer. The case was tried in September, 1880, and a verdict was rendered for plaintiff for $2,000. On defendant's appeal, a new trial was granted; and at this second trial the verdict was for plaintiff, $5,400.
